March 11, 11.28 p.m. U428 Peking Road.—At this fire Fireman No. 196 rescued a girl aged 12 from the upper floor. She was taken to Hospital suffering from slight burns and shock.

March 21, 10.23 a.m. s.s. Korea Maru—Woosung.—Assistance was rendered by a section of the Brigade at a fire in No. 3 hold, which was battened down and being steamed. Before the fire was extinguished, two Officers and several firemen were overcome by carbon monoxide.

March 27, 7.18 p.m. 'Shanghai Times' Building, 21 Museum Road. When the Central Division arrived the first and second floors were found to be well alight towards Soochow Road and it was at once seen that a very serious fire was in progress. The building was of the godown type and extensive and, apart from the contents, of the quick-burning type. In dealing with the fire the Brigade had no facilities at all, all the windows were barred and shuttered, and it took some time to open even one. An attempt was made by means of a staircase, situated about half-way along on the Museum Road side, to get above the portion on fire, but this staircase was of wood and the doors leading to the upper floors were unopenable owing to merchandise being stacked at the back. Conditions got so bad that a number of officers and men were overcome, having to be brought down. Concurrently lines of hose were got up the exterior wood staircase at the Lyceum Theatre end and here the doors were found to be doubly padlocked and valuable time was wasted in opening them. Conditions here were also severe, men having to work in smoke helmets to prevent the fire from gripping the Lyceum. Every attempt was made to hold the main fire, but owing to the collapse of a large portion of the second floor through overloading by heavy bales of paper, there only being a few small hydrants round the south, and conditions being as described, the centre portion of the building was quickly a sheet of flame. More powerful Brigade pumps were put to work on North Soochow Road, some distance away, from the large pattern hydrants and it was by such means that it was possible to save the British-American Tobacco Co. building, the Lyceum Theatre and the Eastern Garage, also with this better supply of water the fire was held from involving the whole of the ground floor and a portion of the south end, from which there was a considerable amount of salvage.

The building and contents were insured for Tls. 390,000.

This fire again illustrates the ridiculousness of barred windows and the so-called fire shutters, the latter being of little or no protection against exterior fire and also frustrating the efforts of the Department to get water on to a building. It was only when the shutters had been burnt through that the latter could be affected.

A quantity of the printing plant of the 'Shanghai Times' was salvaged, this being sheeted up by the Department during the progress of the fire.

Mention might be made also of the conversion of a godown into printing works, as there was not a single effective staircase for fire-extinguishing purposes in the whole building.

The Lyceum Theatre was again in serious danger, the flames, until beaten back, reaching to within two or three feet of the auditorium roof.

Difficulty was experienced in protecting the British-American Tobacco Co. building and the Eastern Garage, the exterior of the former becoming ignited in three or four places, the heat being naturally severe.

SOUTHERN RHODESIA

SOUTHERN Rhodesia which was inaugurated as the youngest self governing Colony of the British Empire on October 1, 1923, and which had previously for 33 years been ably administered by the British South Africa Company possesses one of the finest climates in the world with long hours of sunshine, breezy temperate days and cool nights. For those who wish to take up farming or ranching in order to make the most they can of their capital, energy and technical knowledge, or for those who wish to retire from strenuous business or professional life and make a home, Rhodesia offers many advantages unequalled elsewhere. The business, social, sporting, educational and medical facilities bear favourable comparison with those of other countries. Native labour is plentiful and when properly managed is cheap and efficient. Taxation is light. Good land in healthy surroundings and amidst fine scenery is plentiful and not expensive.

Full information is obtainable on application to The Secretary. Southern Rhodesia Settlers' Board (attached to the Government of Southern Rhodesia), P. O. Box 372, Salisbury S., Rhodesia.

The giving of advice to prospective settlers will be facilitated if applicants will advise the Board in detail of their circumstances and the amount of capital they would be prepared to invest in a suitable venture.

COMPANY MEETING

J. LLEWELLYN & CO., LD.

An Unsatisfactory Year: Sales of Mineral Water Reduced in Value by 25 Per Cent.

The annual general meeting of Messrs. J. Llewellyn & Co., Ltd., was held at the offices of the Chamber of Commerce, 17 the Bund, on Monday the W. J. Monk presided, supported by Messrs. A. W. Burkill and Dr. L. L. Marsh.

The Chairman, proposing the adoption of the report and accounts, said:

I am afraid that after the rather optimistic tone which prevailed at our annual meeting a year ago you will to-day be feeling a distinct sense of disappointment at the result of the past year's working, and certainly there was nothing then to indicate that the nett result of the following 12 months' trading would show such a falling away as has proved to be the case. We had last year to decide on the disposal of $17,422.75 net profit and we said as the year progressed, it became obvious that we should not reach that level, it was very difficult to find when the accounts were completed [illegible] balance came on the wrong side to the extent of $2 705.74.

The accounts are presented to you in the usual form and the figures for many of the items are strictly approximate to those in the last statement that they call for no special comment. It is in regard to the figure appearing on the credit side of the profit and loss account such as "balance from general working account" that you will like to have some explanation, since this item is the nett figure resulting from various other accounts which do not appear in the report. It shows only the meagre sum of $7,28.19 as against $20,589.12 last year.

Cool Summer Responsible

Your directors have gone into the figures in detail and are satisfied that the chief factor in producing the reversal was the very poor summer we had last year from the point of view of the aerated water business. As you know, we rely for the great bulk of our business for a considerable proportion to the total profits, but the incidence of [illegible] generally decided to have been a cool summer, consequently [illegible] had a very marked effect on the sales, which [illegible] to [illegible] last year. Our general [illegible] practically the same figure—$43,[illegible], as against $25,[illegible], the slight excess being chiefly due to the rental of the western depôt, to which reference was made at our previous meeting. The effect of the cool summer is also being in a large measure [illegible] to the factory manager and his assistants. We found the [illegible] almost exactly the same value of stocks on hand as at the end of the previous year, but purchases during the year were reduced by about 30 per cent. in value, while the [illegible] volume of sales.

The nett result of this section of the business was a considerable reduction in the profit, for which the reduced volume of sales practically accounts, since as the overhead charges would have remained the same the extra business would have been to a very considerable extent additional profit.

Fair Year for Store Dept.

On the other side of our business, the store department, the volume of sales shows a slight increase over the previous year, $121,963 against $120,445, and stocks in hand showed the same value within a few hundred dollars—$81,303 against $81,750; purchases during the year were approximately the same also. Overhead charges were increased from $13,640.58 to $13,-353.55, due chiefly to increased rental and to increments of salaries under agreements.

The conversion of a profit on this side of the business into a loss of $1,697.71 can be attributed chiefly to the necessity we have been under of reducing the margin of profit on our sales. The cost of stocks increased considerably over the preceding year on account of the appreciably lower average rate of exchange prevailing in 1923 as compared with 1922, whilst on the other hand keen and increasing competition has made it impossible for us to obtain a commensurate advance in retail prices.

The figures shown in the balance sheet will need little comment. The aerated water plant and machinery was written down very heavily in the accounts for 1921 and again very substantially in the 1922 account, and your directors consider that the book value is now so conservative that no further depreciation is necessary this year. Furniture and fixtures of both departments are written down by 10 per cent. which is an ample allowance in view of previous depreciations. The motor vans now also stand at a very conservative book value. Sundry debtors are the normal outstandings at the end of the year and total just about the same as last year.

On the liabilities side of the account sundry creditors and bills payable are also normal year-end carry-overs, and are both similar in amount to the previous year. Our general reserve remains the same, $15,000, and also the reserve for bad and doubtful debts. Our overdraft with the bank is increased by $10,102.58, but we have $10,000 at the credit of staff reserve account which did not figure in last year's balance sheet.

Affected by Trade Depression

Your directors desire particularly to place on record that in their opinion the adverse result of the year's trading can in no way be attributed to any lack of effort and energy on the part of the company's staff. In Mr. Whyte we have a very conscientious and extremely hard-working general manager, who has received every assistance from the other members of the staff all of them have done their best under circumstances which were against the production of a better visible result. The general depression in the trade of this port still continues, as we all know from the experience of our own private businesses, but your directors feel that we have just as good a chance as any of our competitors to extract the maximum advantage from such conditions as may obtain during the current year, and assure you that your directors will continue to endeavour to the best of your interests.

The balance available for disposal being only $7,903.44, your directors recommend that the whole of this amount be carried forward to the new account, which I shall formally propose after first giving you the opportunity for any questions you may wish to ask or any comment you may care to make.

The resolution proposing the adoption of the report and accounts was seconded by Mr. A. W. Burkill and carried unanimously.

On the proposition of the Chairman, seconded by Mr. F. A. Ozorio, Mr. A. W. Burkill was re-elected a director of the company.

On the proposition of Mr. G. Grayrigge, seconded by Mr. A. A. Arratoon, Messrs. Lowe, Bingham and Matthews were re-elected auditors for the ensuing year at a remuneration of Tls. 300.

Bonus for the Staff.

Mr. Grayrigge—Of recent years it has been my privilege to propose a vote of appreciation of the work of the manager and his staff, followed by the tangible recognition of their services by a bonus. On last years working, the accounts unfortunately show a small Loss due to circumstances which the staff could not control. I know the value of their work and the keenness with which they attend to it. The Company's position is very sound and despite the small loss incurred I for one should not like the staff to entirely forego the customary bonus. With your permission, Sir, I have much pleasure in proposing a resolution that the staff be paid a bonus, the amount of which to be left to the discretion of the Directors.

Mr. E. Kale seconded and the motion was carried unanimously.

Mr. Kale also remarked that in giving the bonus they gave with it their real appreciation of the work put in by the staff during the year. Mr. Whyte, their manager, worked very hard for them, and he was well supported by the rest of the staff.

The Chairman said he would like to associate the directors with those expressions. They fully appreciated the way in which the staff had worked and were in entire agreement with the giving of a bonus this year as in the past.

This concluded the business of the meeting.

CLUB AND SOCIETIES

SHANGHAI CRICKET CLUB

Successful Year Reported at Annual Meeting: Projected Improvements to Pavilion

The annual general meeting of the Shanghai Cricket Club was held at the Club Pavilion on Tuesday evening. Captain E. I. M. Barrett presided, supported by Messrs. C. D. Field, R. Grimshaw, H. E. Muriel, A. W. Hayward and N. B. Ramsay.

Capt. Barrett, proposing the adoption of the report and accounts, remarked that this was a fitting occasion once more to place on record the Club's admiration for the magnificent innings played by Mr. T. E. Pearce, captain of the Hongkong team in the last interport match. He did not suppose a finer innings had ever been played in any interport. Referring to club affairs, Captain Barrett said that on the financial side the Club had made a profit of roughly $5,000, which was quite satisfactory.

Mr. C. D. Field seconded and the report was adopted.

Regarding the election of a president, Captain Barrett reminded members that Mr. Potter, the old president, was in England. Mr. Potter had never been an ostentatious president, but he always had the Club's interests at heart, and Captain Barrett thought they should not let the occasion pass without recording a very hearty vote of thanks to him. (applause). He was one of the finest all-round cricketers who ever came to Shanghai.

The proposition was carried with enthusiasm.

The Chairman then proposed the election of Mr. G. M. Billings. Mr. Billings, he said, had been a member of the Club for probably many more years than he cared to remember, and he had worked hard for them.

Mr. Muriel seconded and the resolution was carried unanimously.

Other officers elected were.

Vice President: Captain Barrett.

Committee: Messrs. G. F. Forshaw, R. Grimshaw, D. W. Leach, W. J. Monk, H. E. Muriel, N. B. Ramsay, E. W. Stagg and J. R. Weeks.

Captain Barrett said the outgoing committee wished to recommend certain improvements to the building. The windows of the Club had been condemned and they had been warned that the first typhoon would bring the lot down into the baseball ground. The Committee proposed putting in new windows with steel frames. This would cost roughly Tls. 1,000. They also recommended the inclusion of a kitchen, which would mean a 10 feet extension to the north side of the building, for which they had obtained permission from the Race Club if decided upon. This would allow them an eliptical bar to walk round and they would be able to stand on the far side of it and watch the baseball in complete comfort. (Laughter). The cost of the whole would be somewhere in the neighbourhood of Tls. 5,000, and this would include a kitchen and a store room. A kitchen was, in his opinion, highly desirable in order that members might get their teas, etc. under sanitary conditions: A store room, also, would be a great blessing, for at present they stored their gear under the pavilion, which was not too satisfactory. The work would take from six to eight weeks and would not really inconvenience members to any very great extent.

What it really came to was that they had to chose between this and a reduction in subscriptions. The latter would be absolutely out of the question if they went ahead with the improvements, but in any case he doubted whether it would be possible.

Mr. Muriel put the suggestion to the meeting in the form of a resolution, which was seconded and carried unanimously.

This concluded the business of the meeting.

THE CHINA ASSOCIATION MEETING

Melancholy Review of the Year: Lincheng and After: Lawlessness on the Yangtze: Extraordinary Account of Affairs in Fukien: The Question of Trademark Registration

The annual general meeting of the China Association was held at the Shanghai Club on Thursday evening, Sir Edward Pearce took the chair, and was supported by Messrs. A. S. Campbell, A. M. Cannan, A. C. Clear, A. L. Dickson, E. F. Mackay, C. J. Scott and A. Brooke Smith.

Proposing the adoption of the report and accounts the Chairman said:

Gentlemen,—Before proceeding with the business of the meeting I would like briefly to refer to the death of your late secretary, Mr. Langley-Smith. He was an exceedingly hard worker and had the interests of our Association keenly at heart. The sympathy of the Association to his parents was expressed in a letter kindly forwarded to them by Messrs. Hansons.

I have also to record the sad death of Mr. E. G. Hillier who for years has been a very active member of the Association and whose sound advice in British interests was always available to your Committee. He was a man of great ability and I am sure in recording our deepest sympathy to Mrs. Hillier and his family in their bereavement, I am only echoing the sentiments of all the members of the Association.

The report and accounts having been in your hands for a few weeks and having as I hope been carefully perused by you all, I propose with your permission to take them as read.

Following the usual procedure at these meetings I will deal briefly with some of the more important subjects which have engaged the attention of your Committee during the period covered by the report.

The Lincheng Outrage.

At the time of our last annual meeting the entire foreign population in China were dumbfounded by the outrage perpetrated by Shantung Bandits on the Express Train proceeding from Pukow to Tientsin at a small place called Lincheng. The matter was referred to by your Chairman at that meeting. The profound feeling of indignation created is borne out by the number of telegrams despatched by this Association in conjunction with the British Chamber of Commerce to the China Association in London and which are inserted in our annual report.

On August 10, the Diplomatic Body in Peking presented their official note of protest to the Chinese Government, since which date further exchange of notes has taken place, but I regret to say that so far the Chinese Government has ignored the demands of the Diplomatic Body.

The regrettable outstanding feature since the date of this outrage, May 6, 1923, has been the continuation of brigandage, capture and ill-treatment of foreigners, to say nothing of the recent personal attacks on foreigners within the precincts of the Legation Quarter in Peking. An appalling list of this outrages appears on Pages 16 and 17 of the report.

TAXATION.—It has to be conceded I think that the free passage of goods throughout any country with the payment of one import or one export duty is to the ultimate benefit of the trader in particular and the country concerned in general. Unfortunately in China we see nothing but divergent and irregular taxation throughout every province. I think we must acknowledge that irregular methods of taxation are one of the enemies of the distribution of merchandise.

Not only are these irregular impositions a hindrance to trade, impoverishing the country as they do, but it is doubtful whether as a result of the cost and squeeze incurred in their collection, the Provinces concerned really reap any material benefit; the Central Government as things are at present, certainly obtain no increment to their revenue from these likin sources. The coastal duties, a hindrance to interport trade, although managed by the Maritime Customs, are equivalent to a likin tax.

China needs to develop her trade. The policy of additional internal taxation, such as the surtax recently imposed by various Provincial authorities on cigarettes is hardly the way, in the words of Article II of the Washington Treaty, to prepare for the speedy abolition of likin and for the fulfilment of the other conditions laid down in Article VIII of the Mackay Treaty of 1902.

WEIHAIWEI.—I have nothing further to add to what is already stated in the annual report concerning the rendition of Weihaiwei. The question for the moment remains dormant.

THE EARTHQUAKE IN JAPAN.—From the correspondence under this head in our annual report you will have noticed that your Committee associated itself with the British Chamber of Commerce and other organizations for the purpose of raising funds and taking every possible means to relieve the appalling situation of those rendered homeless and penniless by the disastrous effect of the earthquake on September 1, which devastated Yokohama and a great portion of Tokio. I think it only right on this occasion to express our thanks to the British and American Women's Associations who did such excellent relief work for those British and other subjects who were so completely stranded by the suddenness of the disaster. Our sympathy goes out to the Japanese in their terrible loss of life and property caused by the earthquake, and its dreadful aftermath, fire!

The Trademark Deadlock.

TRADE MARKS.—So much has been said and written concerning the new Chinese Trade Mark Law, that I need not occupy much of your time in going over the whole subject, except to explain that while negotiations were proceeding between the Chinese Government and the Diplomatic Body we were advised not to register under the new law. The Chinese Government having refused to agree to the very reasonable modifications suggested by the Diplomatic Body foreign Governments were unable to recognize the law and notified the Chinese Government accordingly.

Insofar as Chinese are concerned therefore, the trade mark regulations as promulgated are now law. The law however is not recognized as such by Treaty Powers having extraterritorial rights and consequently cannot be applied by foreign courts. The official position is briefly that full protection under the Treaties will be claimed by the British Legation and for all our marks whether we as merchants register under the new China Trade Mark Law or not.

Most careful consideration has been given to this most important matter by your Committee who had also the advantage of the co-operation of the British Chamber of Commerce therein. The result has been that both Committees recommend that merchants should not register.

I would add to these remarks that the Dean of the Diplomatic Body in a letter dated April 5 addressed to his Excellency Monsieur Wellington Koo, Minister of Foreign Affairs, states the following:—

"As none of the suggestions or the conditions which I had the honour on behalf of the Diplomatic Body to convey to your Excellency in my above mentioned note of January 30 have been followed up or fulfilled, my colleagues desire me to inform your Excellency that they feel unable to advise their Governments to recognize the law or to advise their nationals to register their trade marks in the newly created Bureau.'

Lawlessness in the Gorges.

CONDITIONS ON THE UPPER YANGTSZE.—Opposing Chinese military factions have created a state of unchecked lawlessness on the Upper Yangtze, and British vessels have been subjected to frequent fire from Chinese troops on the river banks against which there has been no redress or apology.

The rival Chinese commanders have boarded our vessels in the anticipation of finding contraband, a suspicion which, so far as our vessels are concerned, has proved entirely unfounded. Several unfortunate incidents have been the outcome of these attacks, notably the death of Captain Brandt a British subject in command of the Chinese str. Tsesui. So far there has been no actual loss of life on British ships. The object of our steamers is to promote the development of legitimate trade in accordance with our rights and privileges under Treaty. The rich province of Szechuan has long been handicapped by inadequate means of transport due to the difficulties of navigation through the Gorges. In recent years British steamship companies and also those of other nationals have made a determined effort to surmount these difficulties with the costly and special type of vessel now in operation. The existing position is a serious one which is greatly exercising the minds of those responsible for developing our shipping and trading interests in this important territory. It is earnestly hoped our authorities will maintain an adequate naval protection by establishing an effective patrol over the trading routes and the stationing of gunboats at points where these attacks and boardings are occurring.

One result of the development of steamer traffic has been that the junk men who have carried cargo in their boats for centuries resented the modern development of steamer traffic and they took action by intimidating Chinese pilots of steamers and by declaring that certain products during a given season should only be shipped by junks. This is generally during low and mid water levels when junks find it easier to traffic on the River. The growing pressure and necessity for improved methods is gradually lessening this resistance It will be, however, many years before junks cease altogether to carry Szechuan produce but the improved speed in transport must prove in the long run the fallacy of the antiquated junk traffic.

Excellent work is being carried out by the Customs Upper River Inspectorate by charting the river, establishing aids to navigation and controlling and advising as to the most suitable craft for this difficult section of the Yangtze. This work has been carried out by two British subjects, first, Captain Plant to whose memory a memorial will be unveiled this season at the Hsin Tan Rapid above Ichang, and now by Captain Pitcairn.

Peking's Penury.

FINANCE.—The financial position in Peking has if possible gone from bad to worse and the default of the Peking Government in payment of interest on certain loans has culminated in the London Stock Exchange refusing to allow an official quotation for 1896 and 1898 Gold Loans and the Hukuang Railway Loan.

During the past year China imported a considerable quantity of silver amounting to 77,000,000 ozs. This silver to a great extent was coined into dollars at the Nanking and Hangchow Mints. These dollars were largely absorbed in the interior by shipments to Yangtze and Northern ports, and the heavy shipments made caused a serious shortage of cash in Shanghai at the end of the year. There has been a good deal of talk regarding the fineness of the dollars coined in the Nanking Mint, but at a recent public analysis the dollars which were assayed were found to be up to standard. The Shanghai Mint has not yet commenced operations despite the loans that have been granted by the Chinese banks for that purpose and it is still impossible to say when that Mint will commence to function as further funds are still wanted. It is to be hoped that when this Mint does open it will be under satisfactory control and that there will be no question in future regarding the fineness of dollars coined.

The Customs revenue for the year amounted to Hk. Tls. 63,378,000, an increase of Hk. Tls. 4,744,000 over 1922. The increase is disappointing in view of the new tariff having been in force for practically the whole year. There would appear therefore to have been a falling off in overseas trade which is likely to continue so long as China remains in the present state of unrest.

The Unhappy South.

SOUTH-CHINA.—The position of affairs in South China would not seem to be any brighter than in any other part of China. Ever since the autumn of 1922 the province of Fukien as is the case of nearly all the Southern provinces has been in a state of unrest and disturbance. The contending so-called armies have harassed the people terribly and the local bandits, self styled "Peoples Army," "Self Governing Army," etc., etc., have treated them even worse. It is well known that hundreds of men have been impressed to act as transport coolies without either pay or even food. Piracy has prevailed. The likin and native customs stations have been seized and administered by whatever military body happened to be in the neighbourhood. Many additional taxes have been imposed and every trade has suffered heavily. Large cities, usually through the Chambers of Commerce, have had to pay contributions towards the support of the troops. Even Amoy on one occasion had to pay $80,000. In country districts the people are forced to cultivate opium. In fact the collection of the opium tax has caused more fighting than political issues.

It would appear as if every separate commander of troops or men-of-war acts with complete independence, and that he concerns himself largely with what personal benefit he will derive from the operations in which he is engaged. The result of this habit is that nominal allies will often act in a manner that would appear to indicate that they are not in harmony. On occasions one military commander has treated with a common enemy, unknown to an allied general, and even proposed an alliance! On another occasion a general assisted another general, then fought against him and finally assisted him to achieve victory. Again two separate allied forces were in disagreement as to which of them should obtain possession of a coveted town in order to enjoy the revenue to be raised from it. On another occasion the force which gained the place did so by a payment of money and ammunition, though it was known that the ammunition would be used against the troops of the allied general!

Cliques v. Centralism.

Your Committee is of the opinion that the present state of affairs in China both politically and financially is chaotic.

The upheaval in 1911, when the Central authority of the Throne was discarded for vaguely understood Republican ideals, presented an opportunity for the self advancement of innumerable cliques. Some were headed by men of statesman-like ability and others by adventurers, all struggling for power and the plums of office. There are still statesmen and leaders in China of forceful character and ability, but for the time being most of their attention is given to consolidating their own positions whilst innumerable satellites attaching to them are fostering present disorder to provide opportunities for filling their own pockets. The power is now crystallizing round three or four well defined groups and it remains to be seen whether a workable compromise can be established amongst them.

It is hardly conceivable that the whole country can be subdued and brought under one Central Government for many years to come. There is so much jealousy, intrigue and disloyalty that civil warfare is bound to continue, and such could not be readily subdued without better means of communication than those existing at present.

The Peking Government is but a shadowy pretence maintained in office by the war lords to stave off the demands of Foreign Governments. Behind this screen, illegal taxation is levied with impunity and Treaty rights ignored. It must be admitted that such a state of affairs provides serious difficulties for the Diplomatic Body to deal with. The only possible policy under such circumstances is for foreign nations to act in the closest co-operation, as any dissession in their ranks is immediately noted and taken full advantage of by the Chinese authorities.

We must continue to urge upon our Home Government through every available channel, the necessity of maintaining all rights and privileges secured by Treaty. We would like to feel that this could be done harmoniously, reasonably and in a friendly spirit, but unfortunately all efforts in this direction are regarded as weakness by the Chinese official, and met by reactionary tactics. Such an attitude can only be successfully countered by united action on the part of all the Powers. We can rest assured that any action taken by them collectively would not be detrimental to China's interests, and would meet with the hearty, though unvoiced approval, of the vast majority of Chinese who are now silently suffering all the evils attendant upon Civil War and ill-disciplined militarism.

Home Public Ignorant.

Public opinion at home needs educating to the true state of things here, but in doing so we must avoid exaggeration. The man in the street knows little and cares less about Chinese affairs, whilst those who are interested and have had experience of the East, are difficult to convince of the present state of affairs, and that China is no longer the China of their day.

The consideration (I nearly said adulation) lavished on China at the Washington Conference has been productive of more harm than good. She wants the benefits without the obligations, although she has subscribed to the latter. To take an outstanding instance, the 2½ per cent. Surtax; this, as you are aware, was subject to the abolition of likin.

Peking would readily accede to this as it would assure funds to the Government through the Customs, but the Provincial authorities have other ideas, and in our own Province of Kiangsu have reorganized the whole Likin Collectorate and are attempting to apply the full scale of charges, so far with disastrous financial results to themselves and our local Government Railways. The official scale of charge has never been enforced, being recognized as unduly burdensome taxation, the actual charges were 30 per cent. lower. Part proceeds of likin collection used to be transmitted to Peking, but all is now retained by the provincial authorities. Is it likely under such circumstances that likin will, or can be abolished? Yet the Chinese Government continues to clamour for the 2½ per cent. surtax Progress, anarchy, corruption and generous aspirations are fantastically mingled in the China of to-day.

PROPAGANDA.—Referring to the remarks on this subject in the 1922/3 annual report, your Committee considers it is very essential to counteract any statements that appear in the Press at home, which give a false impression of the actual conditions now prevailing in China.

A short while ago there appeared in the "XIXth Century" an article written by the Chinese Chargé d'Affaires in which he stated that "Every day and in every way China is getting better and better, actually and not merely by saying so." The publication of this statement in a review like the "XIXth Century," clearly indicates how ill-informed people are at home, and the importance of pursuing some policy of propaganda to counter such fairy tales.

Association's Affairs.

MEMBERSHIP.—It is to be regretted that our numbers have fallen away to 259 members. It is to be hoped that during the next 12 months we will see an increase in the membership. The Association if I may say so is doing excellent work, and the London Association has been very helpful in British interests. In these days it is particularly necessary that British treaty rights should be watched and that no privileges secured under such treaty rights should be allowed to lapse. It is in this connexion therefore that the Association should receive every support from British subjects throughout China.

ACCOUNTS.—These call for but little comment. We had at the beginning of our year a credit balance of Tls. 715.44 which is now reduced to Tls. 7.51. The reason for this falling away of our funds is not far to seek, our membership is not as large as last year, and our expenses in telegrams have been Tls. 1,182.26 reduced to Tls. 745.44 by refund of part cost of cables sent joint account with the British Chamber of Commerce. Several telegrams which mean expenditure were despatched in connexion with the Lincheng affair, the earthquake and more particularly the new Chinese Trade Mark registration law. All these subjects and others occupied the very careful consideration of your Committee during the 12 months and we have to thank the London Committee for the great interest taken in all matters that we have laid before them.

In conclusion, Gentlemen, I should like to record our very hearty thanks for the cooperation we have received at the hands of the Committee of the British Chamber of Commerce. This is as it should be, both our interests are one in the furtherance of the welfare of the Great Empire to which we have the honour to belong.

Before moving the acceptance of the report and accounts I will be pleased to answer any questions to the best of my ability.

There were no questions, and the report and accounts were seconded by Mr. A. C. Clear and carried unanimously.

The Chairman said the secretary to the meeting had received a letter from a member enclosing a letter from the British Chamber of Commerce on the subject of trademarks. The member in question was unfortunately unable to attend but he had asked that the letter might be read. He called upon Mr. Clear to read it therefore.

British Chamber's Urgent Advice to Merchants

A member of the Chamber wrote to the Secretary of the British Chamber of Commerce asking his opinion of advice given in London to register marks "as otherwise there is grave risk of marks being registered by foreigners and their value therefore being lost."

Dear Sirs,—I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 9th instant. In reply I beg to inform you that at a joint meeting of the General and Trademark Committees of this Chamber and of the Committee of the China Association held on the 8th instant it was unanimously decided to continue the policy of non-registration.

This decision was taken after hearing what H. M. Consul-General, who had just returned from Peking, had to say on the subject, the main grounds for the decision being as follows.

1. In the Diplomatic Body's last Note to the Chinese Government it was clearly stated that whether marks are registered or not any complaints in regard to trademark rights will have to be dealt with strictly in accordance with existing treaty procedure.

2. That implies that the mere fact of registration will not be regarded by the Legation as conferring any right on a mark as against a British mark.

3. How, then, will the fact of registration confer any right on a British mark as against a non-British mark.

4. Our position will ultimately be far stronger if we base it on treaty rights than if we seek to improve it by registering in accordance with a law which has been officially rejected because it conflicts with those rights.

5. The fees for registration are very heavy, some of them four times as high as those chargeable in the United Kingdom or Hongkong. Is it worth while expending what, in many cases, would be large sums of money to obtain the exceedingly insubstantial return indicated above?

A Complete Misconception.

The statement that it is advisable to register "as otherwise there is grave risk of the marks being registered by foreigners" is based on a complete misconception (a) as to what is happening (b) as to the practical consequences of registration.

In regard to (a) the only foreigners with extraterritorial rights who have registered in any number are Japanese. No British and only one American firm have registered.

In regard to (b) as all the Legations have refused to recognize the law it follows that it cannot be applied in foreign, extra-territorial, Courts. It follows also that registration cannot be admitted as evidence of rightful ownership. It follows further that the only laws that will apply will be those of the defendant's Court. Thus a case brought by a British subject for infringement of his mark by an American, a Belgian, a Dane, a Frenchman, an Italian, or a Dutchman will be governed by the reciprocal treaty arrangements concluded between Great Britain and the countries concerned between 1903 and 1906 for the protection of one another's trademarks in China, one of the main arrangements being that the mark which seeks protection must be registered in the country from whose Court in China protection is sought. The new Chinese Trademark Law will have nothing to do with the matter and as far as the above-mentioned foreigners are concerned there is no more reason for registration to-day than there was before the new law came into existence.

The Japanese Position.

As regards the Japanese the position also remains what it was before the new law was promulgated, that position being.

1. That there is no reciprocal arrangement with Great Britian for the protection of trademarks.

2. That in order to get protection against Japanese infringements marks must be registered in Japan, where such registration would entitle the owner of the mark to stop the manufacture of goods bearing an infringing mark.

The only way in which the new law affects the position as far as Japanese are concerned is that whereas, prior to its promulgation, it was possible to take proceedings against a Chinese for selling Japanese goods bearing an infringing mark; now, as a result of the law, the Chinese Courts might, and probably would, refuse to admit that the mark was an infringement unless the mark claiming to be the rightful one had been registered.

But it is extremely doubtful whether registration would be any remedy against this. If your company, for instance, found that the Japanese had registered, or were about to register, a mark which infringed one of yours you could only protest to the registration bureau. Your protest, even if it were backed by the Legation, might not be upheld, for the Japanese Legation would, naturally, support the claim of its subject to register the mark in question. The upshot would almost certainly be that both marks would be registered. What guide would such registration be to the Chinese Court ultimately called upon to decide the question? What is the value of registration when identical marks can be registered? And this is actually happening at the present time, Chinese and Japanese marks closely resembling one another having been accepted by the registration Bureau.

Where Is the Gain?

The only other foreigners concerned are Germans, Russians and other foreigners who do not enjoy extraterritorial rights. They are on precisely the same footing as Chinese. The Diplomatic Body has said that whether registered or not our marks are not to be infringed by Chinese. If the Legation does not prove strong enough to prevent infringement by Chinese of British unregistered marks, what reason is there for supposing that they will prove strong enough to prevent the registration of Chinese marks which infringe British marks? And if they are not able to prevent the registration of Chinese marks which are infringements of British marks, what is to be gained by registering, by paying heavy fees for something which will have no evidential value whatever?

I trust that this letter will be of service to you.

Yours faithfully,

(Sd.) E. M. Gull,

Secretary.

The committee was elected as follows:—

Sir Edward Pearce, Maj. A. H. Hilton-Johnson, and Messrs. A. S. Campbell, A. M. Cannan, A. C. Clear, A. L. Dickson, E. Gordon Lowder, E. F. Mackay, C. J. Scott, A. Brooke Smith.

This concluded the business of the meeting, and on the proposition of Mr. C. M. Bain a vote of thanks was passed to the Chairman and the members of the outgoing committee.

MR. H. E. Morriss has arrived safely at Moscow, states a telegram from that city dated the 12th instant. It will be remembered that Mr. Morriss left Harbin on May 2.

On the 6th instant, the Community Church held its fourth annual meeting in the Navy Y. M. C. A. About 160 people were present. The new officers for the coming year were elected. Dr. J. B. Fearn, Dr. J. C. McCracken and Mrs. R. M. Vanderburgh, members of the old board were re-elected. Mr. H. H. Cameron, Mrs. P. H. Dunbar, Mr. R. J. Corbett, Miss Mabel Jansen, and Mr. Egbert Hayes were also elected. Mr. W. W. Lockwood was toastmaster of the evening.

THE Association for the Protection of Chinese National Territories, the formation of which was an outcome of the North Szechuen Road incident, has requested the National Road Construction Association to carry out its proposal to make a survey of the Settlement in order that roads may be built round it to prevent "encroachment" on the part of the Municipal Council. The Association has also sent several delegates to see Mr. Hsu Yuan, the Commissioner of Foreign Affairs, to request him to give his support in preventing such encroachment in future.

AMERICAN RED CROSS IN CHINA

Annual Meeting in Shanghai: Period of Reorganization Past: Detailed of Account of Russian Situation: Resume of Work in Earthquake Relief: Hopes for Future

The annual meeting of the American Red Cross China Central Committee was held on Saturday at the Union Club. The following is a portion of the report:—

The American Red Cross has been functioning in China for a period of years and has made a serious attempts during that time to carry out the original ideals of the American National Red Cross, in a foreign land—to give service both in time of war and peace.

On July 10, 1922, it was decided that a complete reorganization of the China Central Committee should be made on a basis that would insure more effective work and it was decided to enlarge the committee, and to operate under by-laws drawn up by the Committee and approved by National Headquarters. In this connexion it was suggested (1) that the Honorable Jacob Gould Schurman, American Minister to China, be elected Honorary Chairman and Judge C.S. Lobingier, Field Representative; (2) that in addition to the honorary chairman and the field representative, the committee consist of nine members to be elected at the annual meeting of the committee to be held hereafter during the last week of April, three of such members to retire each year subject to re-election; (3) that the by-laws provide for representation of active chapters in China and all local contributing American organizations; and (4) that Mrs. Lansing W. Hoyt, wife of the American Trade Commissioner; Mr. Paul Page Whitham, president and general manager of the Asia Development Company, Ld., Dr. J. B. Fearn, superintendent and secretary of the Shanghai General Hospital, and Major Arthur Bassett of the British-American Tobacco Company (China) Ld., be invited to serve on the committee.

The year 1923 will remain a memorable one in the history of the American Red Cross. On September 1, 1923, one of the most severe earthquakes ever recorded in history wrecked Yokohama and Tokio, Japan, and reduced to ruins scores of other smaller Japanese cities. Vague rumours were spread during the first few days following the earthquake but soon more definite reports were available as to the actual damage done. Shanghai residents received an urgent appeal from the community in Kobe to assist in raising relief funds for thousands of destitute foreigners in Japan. A medical unit of four doctor and 11 nurses with supplies was immediately despatched to Kobe from Shanghai and was the first aid to arrive in the vicinity of the earthquake. The American Chamber of Commerce and American Association of China assumed the responsibility of financing this unit and transportation was donated by the China Merchants' Steam Navigation Company.

The personnel of the unit was carefully chosen from well-trained persons who were among the first to volunteer their services and included: Doctors:—Morris Booth Miller, A. C. Selmon, J. W. Colbert, Thomas B. Dunn. Nurses:—Elsie K. Pape, Edith A. Shaw, Jessie Kay, Mary Opal Powell, A. Maude Anderson, Llewellyn Lissak, C. Maude Hewitt, Christine England, Frances Kelley, Edna Nelson and E. G. Leatherdale. Dr. W. W. Peter was requested to go as representative of the China Central Committee, American Red Cross, and also offered his services to the unit despatched by the Chinese Red Cross. Mr. Warwick M. Tompkins accompanied as Disbursing Officer.

The following figures compiled by the American Red Cross accountant serve to show the generous response made to the people in Japan:

Russian Refugee Relief in China.

While no definite figures can be obtained of the number of Russian refugees who have come into China and Manchuria, it was estimated during the late summer of 1923, that there were more than 40,000 or 50,000 refugees in Manchuria and about 7,000 in Shanghai, besides a large number in the other treaty ports of China. The arrival of the Russian refugees in large numbers dates back to December, 1922, when a fleet of Russian gunboats under command of Admiral Stark, arrived in Shanghai with 700 Russian refugees who remained in Shanghai when the Russian feet sailed to Manila, Philippine Islands. The problem of housing, clothing and feeding these refugees, naturally arose and became a community responsibility. The China Central Committee cabled Washington the details connected with the Russian refugees in China and were immediately requested to make a thorough investigation. On January 19, the Washington Headquarters appropriated G. $25,000 (G. $10,000 of which was from Russian sources), for Russian Refugee Relief work in Manchuria and China. Mr. Morgan W. Palmer was appointed director of Russian Refugee Relief work in Manchuria. During the first months of 1923 the China Central Committee started relief work in Shanghai. The American Red Cross during the entire year of 1923 continued to administer relief to destitute Russians in Shanghai, providing meals at the soup kitchens, and giving free medical attention and hospital space at the Shanghai General Hospital. Mr. Palmer, at the same time, was administering relief in Manchuria.

Dr. Greig's Visit.

Dr. James A. Greig, who was in charge of the American Red Cross in Russian Refugee Relief work in Kirin, Manchuria, arrived in Shanghai in January, 1924, and informed the Chairman of the China Central Committee, that he had been appointed by the League of Nations to investigate the Russian situation in China and to make a recommendation to the League as to the best solution of the problem. Dr. Greig visited all the treaty ports and consulted with everyone interested in giving relief and informed the Committee the consensus of opinion seemed to be that the only solution was repatriation, although considerable difficulty would be experienced in persuading the Russians to be repatriated. Dr. Greig estimated that of the Russians in China, two per cent. were willing to be returned home, while 98 per cent. desired to remain in China or go elsewhere. The Chairman of the China Central Committee informed Dr. Greig that although the American Red Cross had terminated its relief work among the Russians in China, the Committee would like to be kept informed of the progress of his work.

Morgan Palmer's Special Fund.

Mr. Morgan W. Palmer, while in charge of the American Red Cross in Manchuria, received from an anonymous donor M. $3,000.00 to be used to assist in providing transportation of worthy Russians of the labouring class to America. Mr. Palmer notified the China Central Committee that it was the idea of the person who made the contribution to hand the China Central Committee, M.$1,000.00 of the fund to be used in Shanghai, but only M.$500.00 was received for this purpose. Each emigrant should not be loaned more than $100.00, the remainder of his expenses to be obtained elsewhere. The person helped should secure his visa at the point from which the emigrant begins his journey, and none could be helped after the quota was full. The following figures show the number of Russian citizens who have been helped as well as the number who have refunded the money which they understood was a loan, therefore making it possible for other deserving Russians to go to America when the immigration regulations would permit.

Assistance at Lincheng.

While most of the relief work was carried on by the China Central Committee, American Red Cross, for foreigners captured by Chinese bandits in Shantung Province, China, on May 5, 1923, was contained in the annual report of last year, the work was concluded during the present fiscal year. In summarizing the relief work done during the full period, a brief history of the affair is given herewith. On May 5, 1923, a train carrying a large number of Chinese passengers and more than 40 foreigners from Shanghai to Peking was attacked by Chinese bandits at Lincheng station, who wrecked the train, looted the baggage and captured some Chinese and most of the foreigners, marching them back in the hills of Shantung Province. Immediately upon hearing of this, Mr. Carl Crow, of the China Central Committee, American Red Cross in Shanghai, went to Lincheng, the nearest spot to the captives and gave relief to those captured. Mr. Crow supplied them with medicines, food, clothing, and other things for their comfort.

Civilian Relief.

Civilian relief work in Shanghai consists of aiding destitute Americans, the greater number of which are former seamen who become stranded in Shanghai. The latter usually are recommended by the U. S. Consulate and are given aid without further investigation. However, during the past year numerous other cases of Americans in need of help have come to the attention of the Committee and the individual cases are thoroughly investigated by the Committee and assisted according to their respective needs. Some are returned to their homes, others provided with maintenance at the Wayport Rooms, that institution making a special rate of M. $2.00 a day for board and lodging, others given clothing, and in a few instances children have been placed in schools. The individual cases are ordinarily determined as deserving or not by some member of the China Central Committee. The civilian relief work is financed by the American Association of China and by several other organizations in Shanghai. A brief financial report is included herewith showing the amount and nature of the civilian relief work done by the China Central Committee, American Red Cross, Shanghai.

While there was no particular activity in Junior Red Cross work in China during the past year, 1923-1924, very successful enrolments were made during the Junior Red Cross drive, which fact in itself promises a better future for Junior work in the American schools in China.

Literature from National Headquarters, American Red Cross, has been received at frequent intervals throughout the year and accordingly transmitted to the various American schools with a request that the teaching staff exercise special efforts to stimulate interest among the Juniors. Some of the literature received was devoted to the enrolment, while some contained suggestions for service programmes to be carried out by the Juniors. It was estimated in August, 1923, there were more than 10 American Schools in China and nearly 850 American school children.

The 100 per cent. enrolment of Juniors in the Shanghai American School during the November, 1924, drive, and the following report of the work among the Juniors, submitted by Mr. Charles L. Boynton, principal, shows a keen interest in the Junior Red Cross work in that particular school:

Grammar Grades of the Shanghai American School.

Eigth grade:—41 enrolled in Junior Red Cross—100 per cent. enrolment. Each pupil has given a 10 to 15 minute talk on first aid, health rules, balanced diet, etc., prepared posters to illustrate the talk demonstrating bandaging and illustrating the first aid method. These talks were given in one of the other seven grades of the school.

Seventh grade:—32 enrolled in Junior Red Cross—100 per cent. enrolment. Each pupil has in preparation a booklet and descriptive letter to be used for correspondence with some school in America. A story of "Safety First" has been written by each pupil.

Sixth grade:—31 enrolled in Junior Red Cross—100 per cent enrolment.

Fifth grade:—20 enrolled in Junior Red Cross—100 per cent. enrolment. Each child has prepared a booklet of Chinese scenes with the idea of sending it to some child in America. Letters have been written to other American schools.

Fourth grade:—24 enrolled in Junior Red Cross—100 per cent. enrolment. Letters to other schools in America have been written.

Third grade:—22 enrolled in Junior Red Cross—100 per cent. enrolment. The children have assumed responsibility for keeping flowers in the room in good condition.

Second grade:—22 enrolled in Junior Red Cross—100 per cent. enrolment. The children have cared for a small garden and for flowers in the room.

First grade:—17 enrolled—not 100 per cent. enrolment. The children have cared for the flowers in the room and the idea of doing a good deed each day has been stressed.

High school grades:—No definite report was given for the High School but Mr. Boyton said there was a 100 per cent. enrolment and that included about 140 members.

Budget and Office Personnel

On December 20, 1922, the China Central Committee was instructed by Washington to revise its budget to cover 10 months from September 1, 1922 to June 20, 1923, in order to coincide with Washington's fiscal year. On March 23, 1923, a budget for 12 months from July 1, 1923, to June 30, 1924, in the amount of G.$6,250.00 or Mex. $10,000 was approved by the Committee and submitted to Washington. An approval of this budget was received on June 5, 1923. On February 18, 1924, we received a cable requesting us to draw up our budget for 1924-1925, which we mailed on March 8, 1924, to Washington. No report from Washington has been received up to date.

During the month of January, 1924, Miss Luella Delamarter, Secretary of the American Red Cross, China Central Committee, for the past year, departed on home leave to America. Miss Margaret C. Powell was appointed to succeed Miss Delamarter and assumed duties as Secretary on February 1, 1924. Miss Edith Vaughan, stenographer for the past 18 months in the office of the American Red Cross on February 1, 1924, resigned to accept another position. Miss Vaughan continued on half-day time until Miss Kathryn Roche was employed to fill the position. Mr. H. Schmuser is accountant for the China Central Committee.

Messrs. Haskins & Sells continue to audit the accounts of the Committee. On April 13, 1923, the China Central Committee accepted the offer of the Council on Health Education for office space on the top floor, separate room, 4 Quinsan Garden, at a monthly rental of M. $20.00, not including light and heat. In March, 1924, the Council on Health Education notified the American Red Cross they had taken office space in a new building, 21 Yuen Ming Yuen Road, and would vacate the present premises some time in June. The American Red Cross was offered space in the same building and the privilege of mission rates. It was voted by the Committee to accept this offer and move to the new room, which was rented at Tls. 235 a year.

Our market on the whole has been quiet and fairly steady, with not very much doing. The market is slightly firmer than it was on Thursday and at the moment there are sellers of T.T. at 3/2 1/16d. THE SILVER MARKET

Reporting from London on April 9, Messrs. Samuel Montagu & Co. state:—

The market has continued to be quiet and prices have been inclined to vacillate. A rather better undertone has been apparent. China sales have been less in evidence. Indeed, there has been some inclination to cover previous sales had prices eased. The Indian bazaars have both bought and sold, though purchases within the last few days have preponderated. America has shown lately more disposition to sell in this market.

The official returns of the U. S. Department of Commerce show the following annual movements of silver to and from the United States since 1912:—

	Imports.	Exports.
1913	35,867,819	62,776,631

1923	74,543,530	72,468,789

The silver quotations to-day for cash and two months delivery are ⅛d. below those fixed a week ago.

THE GOLD MARKET

Reporting from London on April 9, Messrs. Samuel Montagu & Co. state:—

The Bank of England gold reserve against its note issue on the 2nd inst. amounced to £126,284,360, as compared with £126,283,130 on the previous Wednesday.

Indian and Continental inquiry being on a small scale, it is probable that the bulk of the moderate amount of gold this week will be ent to the United States. Gold valued at $5,000,000 has arrived in New York from Holland.

The selection by Germany of sterling as the basis of the new Gold Discount Bank—so-called—presents one advantage at least over the adoption of gold itself as the basis, for Germany will benefit automatically by a successful return on the part of Great Britain to an effective gold standard. The policy of this country cannot bear fruit without great self-denial on the part of the British people, incurred through heavy taxation and incidental trade unemployment, and of these sacrifices Germany will thus obtain under the new scheme a not inconsiderable benefit. That is to say, the reserves of the new German Discount Bank will gain to the extent of about 12 per cent. in gold, whenever the efforts of this country have brought its exchange to a gold par with other countries.

It is announced in the French Press that 240 boxes of gold, worth 250,000,000 gold francs, were sent from Paris and shipped to England yesterday by the destroyer Turbulent. The consignment was made by the Bank of France.

SHANGHAI MARKET REPORT

Bad Weather Causes Dull Markets all Round: Marked Depression in Cotton and Yarn

May 17.

A great deal of Shanghai's trade is very much dependent on the weather, some of it almost entirely, and, with a continuance through the past week of rain and low temperatures, there has been a corresponding slump in business, so things have been even more dull than in the preceding holiday week. In piece goods there has been the further difficulty of higher cotton prices to contend with, whilst the produce exporters, who just now should be very busy with egg products, if nothing else, have found the season very much delayed.

Piece Goods.

Manchester still is ahead of Shanghai and indent firms found the rise in cotton upset their business very badly. Some sorting-up business has been done, but very little in bulk. The opinion has been expressed that the heavy rains and the cold weather combined have so delayed the spring trade that a great deal of it has been lost altogether for this year, necessitating the carrying forward of far greater quantities than last year. In this connexion a tribute was paid to local piece goods dealers, who, it is said, are a different type to the cotton men who played such scurvy tricks at Tientsin. There is always the possibility, in carrying goods forward, of incurring a big loss, but it is said they are not the class who secure a period of grace until business is possible and then refuse to pay if they are unable to make the profits of the time.

Cotton, Yarn, etc.

China Cotton.—Business has been very depressed throughout the week and all reports are of a most pessimistic nature. The latest quotations on the Chinese Cotton Goods Exchange are:—May, 47; June, 46.60; July, 46; August, 45.25; September, 41.50; October, 39.05. Spot quotations:—Tungchow, 48.50-49; Shanghai, 46; Shensi, 46.50-48; Hankow, 45-45.50.

Yarn.—This market has followed the course of cotton and, if possible, was even more depressed. The latest quotations on the Chinese Cotton Goods Exchange are:—May, 179.40; June, 176.80; July, 174.70; August, 172.60; September, 169.50; October, 165.60.

American Cotton.—The market advanced as a consequence of unfavourable crop reports and, although a decline followed, the New York quotations on Thursday, when the market was steady, still were considerably higher than last week's, the figures being:—July, 29.35; October, 25.56; December, 24.90; January, 24.55; March 24.60; spot, 32.05. At Liverpool, on the same day, when the market also was steady, the quotations were:—Fully middling, July, 16.92; October, 14.73; spot, 18.16.

Egyptian Cotton.—Sakellarides, July, 43.70.

Indian Cotton.—The Bombay marked on Thursday was firm at the following quotations:—Fully good Bengal, May, 530; fine Oomra, May, 548; fully good Broach, April/May, 567; new crop, April/May, 513.

Sampin.—Yesterday's quotations were:—

	Opening	Closing
May	Y.318.00	Y.316.60
June	312.30	312.10
July	309.90	308.90
August	307.40	306.20
September	305.00	304.80
October	302.60	302.70
November	299.90	299.30

Produce.

There has been a slightly renewed interest in the produce markets generally. During the week there was a fairly strong inquiry for ground-nuts, but European buyers' ideas are considerably below local values. As to egg products, local values now are proving more attractive to American buyers. Normally, large quantities of egg products are contracted for by this time and it is expected that the late commencement this season will reduce the volume of business.

The tone of the local share market has been weak during the past week and the business recorded calls for no special comments. "Rubbers" continue a very depressed market and the price for rubber has declined further to very approximately 35¼ cents per lb. in Singapore and 10½d. per lb. in London. "Cottons" continue flat with very few clerks moving. Shanghai Tug & Lighter Co. have risen to Tl. 90 buyer with sellers in the market at Tls. 91. New Engineering & Shipbuilding Works' stock show a marked improvement there being a little investment enquiry and business has been done in them to-day at Tls. 6.10.

RACE CLUB'S SPRING MEETING

Patsfield, Newbigging up, Wins a Fine Grand National: Old Bill and Petersfield Placed

Saturday's races, to conclude the Shanghai Race Club's Spring Meeting, were preceded by a merry gathering in the coffee room of the club, where the Stewards entertained to tiffin a large company of owners, jockeys, visitors from the outports and a number of the leading Chinese sportsmen, prominent amongst the latter being Mr. Chu Pao-san, Mr. T. U. Yih, Mr. Chang Nieh-yun, Mr. Chun Bing-him, Mr. Y. S. Day, and Mr. S. K. Chen. Mr. S. Barton, C.M.G., H. M. Consul-General, was amongst the distinguished guests at the table of Mr. A. W. Burkill, Chairman of the Stewards.

After a course or two, the Chairman said that he noticed Dr. Edgar was suffering so terribly from nerves that he was unable to eat anything and therefore, to save him from a slow death from starvation, he would immediately present him with the Jockey Cup, so that he could deliver his great speech and eat some tiffin. The cup was presented amidst much applause and Dr. Edgar, after returning thanks, said that he wished specially to thank the Stewards for having included another novice jockeys' race in the card that day. Novice jockeys wanted the encouragement that went with more races for their special benefit and he hoped the practice would be continued.

Later, the Chairman said that, before calling upon "the ever-youthful Chu Pao-san" to present the Chinese Cup to Mr. Sokoloff, he would like to express the sincere thanks of the members of the Race Club for such a handsome gift. It was only another instance of the cementing of friendship between Chinese and foreigners. They might differ in business and in politics, but in sport always they were able to agree, and he trusted that in the future this friendship would be still more firmly cemented.

The cup was presented to Mr. Sokoloff, who made a brief reply, and then Mr. Chang Nieh-yun made one of his always delightful speeches, in which he judiciously mixed prohibition, Old Bill, Young Bill, Columbia, their owners, trainers and jockeys, Chun Bing-him, H. W. Stevenson, the Union Club and various other ingredients into a most palatable oratorical cocktail.

Taken in general, the racing was not particularly interesting, but there were several instances of very clever jockeyship and the Grand National was a glorious race.

Nine ponies were saddled for the Grand National. The company was somewhat too good for California and the clever little Jack Flint, whilst Joss House, of course, could not be considered, but the rest were all first-class 'chasers. They were released to a level start, but when they settled down Petersfield was sent out to three lengths, going at a smart pace. Behind him ran Social Union, while Jack Flint and Exchequer Bill were nine lengths behind the main body. Passing the stands the second time, Petersfield had a lead of a length from Patsfield (Old Bill and Social Union with Theatreland beginning to go up. By this time there was no danger of Joss House finishing less than a quarter of a mile behind the eventual winner and Exchequer Bill also appeared to have had enough of it. Social Union was beaten half-way down the back straight. At Probst's the remainder began to crack on the pace, Petersfield still held a length's lead from Patsfield and Theatreland was next, but the latter's style was not flattering and probably he was feeling the effects of his hard work on the flat. Rounding the bend, Petersfield went up in great style, gained the lead with a glorious jump over the last ditch and [illegible] Mumtaz Mahal (Old Bill) along in the [illegible] Theatreland finishing [illegible] Patsfield in front [illegible] Petersfield [illegible] beat! [illegible] by two lengths.

Probably the most interesting game of H. W. Stevenson's series was played at the Shanghai Club on Monday, when he conceded Capt. E. I. M. Barrett 600 points in 1,000 up and was beaten at 1,000-878. In the early part of the game Capt. Barrett did not seem to be playing up to his usual form and had it not been for the fact that Stevenson, with a wholesome respect for his opponent's prowess, played extra carefully, with a view to getting position and keeping it, and in consequence gained either big figures or nothing, Barrett probably would have been well beaten. Towards the end they both improved wonderfully, but even a 236 break was not sufficient to counteract 75 and 34 in quick succession by Barrett, who ran out with an unfinished 27.

The game stood at 631-36 before Stevenson gave a glimpse of his best play. Then he got the balls to the top of the table, scored 46 and at his next visit 72. There followed a number of small breaks, the highest being 32. Barrett put on 35 and 31 and then Stevenson came into play with a superb effort for 143. It was practically all top of the table play, but he introduced all manner of shots—nursery cannons, plain and run-through massés, deadly winning hazards, cushion and kiss cannons, in bewildering variety and at such a speed and with such perfect confidence that the audience could not help laughing even more than applauding. He made 64 in four minutes and the full break in 10 minutes. Three or four times he played in hand, but only twice did an object ball go as far as a middle pocket. He broke down at a screw cannon off the cushion.

By way of variety, Stevenson followed this with 55 by losing hazards and then, after having been in play for 1¼ hours, he made his best break of the evening—236. In this one saw the true Stevenson, for it was practically all nursery cannons and at one period he reached the limit of 25 successive direct cannons. The score then was 836-724.

Stevenson made another break of 109 in eight minutes, again mainly by nursery cannons, and was in such a position that he well might have run out—the score was 938-878—but by this time Barrett really was dominating the game. Just before this break he had played a superb 75, which he followed with a 34. At one time he was left with the three balls close together in a straight line at right angles to the cushion and called for the rest with the obvious intention of digging down for a jumping cannon. "He cannot surely do that, anyway," said Stevenson, adding a second later, "But he has! A very fine shot." With Barrett 28 off game, Stevenson gave him a most puzzling succession of safeties, but Barrett got possession in the end and ran out with an unfinished break of 27, Stevenson enthusiastically congratulating him.

THERE has been very little news from Aberdeen of late, and the following recent arrival seems too good to keep: The customer of an Aberdeen grocer ordered four dozen eggs, which the grocer instructed his assistant to pack and despatch. The assistant, absent-mindedly, packed seven rows of seven eggs and had the order delivered, and it was not till some time after that the grocer, checking up, discovered to his horror that an egg too many had been sent. He rushed round to his customer, a cheery, good-natured individual, informed him of the calamity and requested return of the surplus egg. The customer laughed and said that as he was so heavy a buyer he wasn't going to bother about a little, solitary egg. Anyway, as the grocer was obviously tired after his hurried journey, would he have a drink. The grocer said he would, and on being asked what he would like, replied, without hesitation, "Egg and milk."

MR. Charles Watney, Home hon. secretary, China Tea Association, in a letter to the Home Press, says people sometimes think that the import of China tea is a relatively unimportant matter because the volume imported into Britain from China is comparatively small. It is only 10,938,344 lb., which shows a very considerable drop from the amount of importations just before the war, when they were practically 13,000,000 lb. The China Tea Association has always laid stress on the fact that this is no question of any proposal being made of serious import to Indian and China tea production. Board of Trade figures show how relatively unimportant it is, and the amount of duty collected is equally negligible. The entire importation duty from China, including Hongkong and Macao, only yields £364,899, and the amount obtainable from the differential duty is £61,000. No doubt the removal of the duty might help the China tea trade a little, the more so as the commodity is making headway, but no alleviation of the burden of the duty would ever make it a serious rival to the British Empire-grown article.

LAW REPORTS

MRS. ROWARTH AND MRS. DAVIS FOUND GUILTY

Suppression of Witness: The Other Charges Not Pursued: Sentences of Twelve and Six Months Respectively, Both with Hard Labour

At H. M. Supreme Court last Friday Mrs. Judith Rowarth and her daughter, Mrs. Margaret Davis, were found guilty of having conspired together to obstruct and defeat the course of justice by preventing a witness, Wong Foo-mei, from attending at the trial of Mrs. Rowarth on a charge of attempted murder, and were sentenced by his Honour Judge Grain respectively to 12 months and six months' imprisonment with hard labour. There was a large attendance of the public to hear the case for the defence, that for the prosecution having closed the previous afternoon.

The Crown Advocate (Mr. H. P. Wilkinson), assisted by Mr. E. T. Maitland, prosecuted, and Mr. S. H. Lewis defended.

Before proceeding to open the case for the defence, Mr. Lewis submitted that the prosecution had failed to produce sufficient evidence to show conspiracy in the case. The bulk of the evidence was extraneous, relating to an offence which occurred last year; and the only evidence which possibly could be taken as showing anything in the nature of conspiracy was the evidence of the amah, and her evidence did not show there was any conspiracy at all between Mrs. Rowarth and Mrs. Davis.

His Lordship—I am afraid I am against you there, Mr. Lewis. I think there is sufficient evidence to go to the jury.

Mr. Lewis then briefly opened the case for the defence, contending that the evidence which had been given in support of the charge of conspiracy was flimsy and impalpable. The whole story of the prosecution was without foundation.

Mrs. Rowarth in the Box.

Mrs. Rowarth then gave evidence, briefly repeating her story that on the day of the attack upon the Indian she went to the house of her daughter (the second accused), arriving there at between 2 and 3 o'clock in the afternoon, and staying until about 9 oclock, when she went to the picture show with her husband. Witness went on to say that she knew nothing about the amah leaving her daughter's house, had nothing to do with her leaving, and did not know she was working there. She had no interest at all in her daughter's servants. As to the story of the amah, that witness had taken her food and money, this was not so. She had taken neither money nor rice, and knew nothing about it.

The Crown-Advocate (cross-examining)—When did you first hear of the assault on Pakhar Singh?—When I saw it in the newspaper.

You have heard it stated that the amah left your daughter's house a fortnight before you were arrested. Were you at your daughter's house at all during that fortnight?—I was there every day.

Did you discuss the Pakhar Singh case with your daughter?—No.

But it was rather a cause célèbre in Hongkew, and would be especially interesting to his debtors?—I never discussed it with her.

Recognizing the Amah.

Witness admitted that in the Police Court she said she had never before seen the young amah who gave evidence, but while the girl was giving evidence on the previous day she did recognize her.

Witness now recognized her because she had a better view of the girl in this Court than in the Police Court. She had seen the girl about the house once or twice and thought possibly she was a friend of the servants; but usually she noticed her playing about in the alleyway. She never "missed" the girl from her daughter's house at all. Later on, Mrs. Davis mentioned that inquiries were being made about this girl, but witness took no notice.

The Departure to Macao.

Your leaving Shanghai on March 3 was a pure accident?—My daughter was sick and wanted to go to Macao, and I said I would go with her.

The decision to leave was a rapid one?—She had waited for the money.

How did you come to leave Macao?—The Superintendent of Police told me I was wanted at Hongkong. He did not say what for, and I did not ask him. We had intended to come back on April 15.

Can you make any suggestion as to why the amah should have told the story she has?—I don't know.

Asked by Mr. Lewis why she did not assist in looking for the amah, witness said that when the police questioned her she told them she knew nothing about the girl.

Mr. G. W. King, Registrar of the Supreme Court, produced the record made by himself as Magistrate in the Police Court proceedings against W. H. Goulbourn. In answer to Mr. Lewis, witness said the amah gave evidence that Maggie's mother (Mrs. Rowarth), and "Dolly" went to see her at the Chinese house, but that Mrs. Davis never called.

Mrs. Davis's Statement.

The second accused, Margaret Warwick Davis, next gave evidence. She recalled that about the beginning of May last she gave a dinner to her eldest brother, on the occasion of his going away, and there were nine or 10 people present (whom witness named), including Mr. and Mrs. Rowarth. Mrs. Rowarth had been in the house all the afternoon and remained until dinner, at 8.30, after which a party of them went to the picture show. When Det. Sub-Insp. Quayle called on June 6 and informed her that her mother had been arrested, he asked if she had an amah, and witness told him that she had had an amah, Ah-mei, a Cantonese girl 14 or 16 years of age, who had left her. The Inspector did not ask where the amah was; he only asked if witness had got an amah.

Mr. Maitland—Where is that girl, Ah-mei?—I think she is in Court now, but I have never been able to see her properly. She always turns her face away from me. Will you ask her to come forward, so that I can see.

A Question of Names.

The young amah was then called forward, and was closely scrutinized by the witness, who, after a pause, said: Yes. That is Ah-mei.

In the Police Court you told the Magistrate you knew nothing about her?—Yes, but I did not know her by the name of Wong Foo-mei.

But you were looking at the girl when you said it?—She was not in court when I gave evidence.

Didn't I point her out to you?—I don't know. I didn't pay any attention. I was too sick.

Why did you send her away?—I did not send her. Her mother came and fetched her, saying she was big enough to get married.

You did not mention that to the police?—I don't know.

When did you first hear of the attack on Pakhar Singh?—I went to his house to pay some interest, and the Chinese servant told us that Pakhar was sick. That is all I know about it.

Questioned as to the many lending transactions with Pakhar Singh, and incidentally explaining why her husband did not act as guarantor, witness said the Indian had declared that he would have nothing to do with men, and would only do business with ladies.

A String of Denials

Did the amah come to you on the night of the assault and tell you the Indian had been attacked? counsel next asked.

"No, sir," witness replied.

You did not say you would speak to your mother about it next morning?—No sir.

Did you ever discuss the matter with your mother?—Never.

It was not sufficiently interesting?—No.

Questioned as to whether she was a visitor to the house in Chaoufoong Road, where the amah is alleged to have been kept "out of the way," witness denied it and, rising from her seat, declared with excitement: "I did not go. If I am not telling the truth may God curse me."

The amah has said that you yourself promised to rent the room for her?—I did not. She is a fibber.

How can you account for her living at her ease in this Chinese house and having her expenses paid by foreigners?—I cannot explain it.

Why do you think she should come here and tell the story she has told?—I do not know. I have no ill-feeling against the amah or the Indian.

Witness in a Faint.

Upon leaving the witness box, the witness collapsed in a faint, and the proceedings were adjourned until the afternoon.

With the court's permission, Mr. Maitland then put the following question to Mrs. Davis. Is it not a fact that when you left your house to go away on March 3, your husband did not even know you were going?

Witness—That is quite right.

W. H. Goulbourn, a son of Mrs. Rowarth, described again the party at Mrs. Davis's house on the night of the assault, and repeated that Mrs. Rowarth was there and remained there until going to the pictures in company with other members of the party.

In cross-examination, witness admitted that the amah who had given evidence was the amah who had been in the service of Mrs. Davis.

E. Pereira, J. L. Stewart, and F. Marques also gave evidence as to Mrs. Rowarth being at her daughter's house on the night of the party, leaving to go to the pictures after dinner.

This was the case for the defence.

Counsel for Defence.

Addressing the jury on behalf of the accused, Mr. Lewis said it took two to make a conspiracy, and unless the case against both the accused was proved, the charge must fall to the ground. Counsel then reviewed the evidence, in detail, and suggested that a mass of it was wholly irrelevant to the charge of conspiracy. Counsel characterized the evidence of the amah as the flimsiest story ever told, adding that it contained several contradictions on vital points.

Prosecution's Reply.

The Crown Advocate in his closing address, said the line of defence taken by Mr. Lewis was in accordance with the methods usually adopted by an advocate who had no case. Beyond question, there had been a murderous assault on the Indian, and the amah who, the prosecution said, assisted to lure him to the scene was in the service of Mrs. Davis. In the police court there had been some suggestion that the girl who had given evidence was not Mrs. Davis's amah, but this denial had now been abandoned. If the accused were innocent, why had they not made some attempt to assist the police in finding the amah, and why had they left Shanghai very hurriedly when the amah was found? Counsel suggested that they had made their last gamble in the case when, coming back to Shanghai without troubling about extradition proceedings; they declared in the police court that the missing witness who had been found was not the amah.

The Judge Sums up.

His Lordship, in summing up, told the jury that if they came to the conclusion that the accused did anything actively or indirectly to further the concealment of the amah in order that she should not give evidence, they were entitled to find them guilty.

Unless the amah had been telling an absolutely fabricated story somebody must have been paying her rent and providing her food, and in this she was corroborated, whilst there was also some corroboration that she disappeared from the house two weeks before the police called to make inquiries. Originally in the police court the accused denied that this was the amah, but now they admitted this was the girl. Thus in most of the details the amah's story was corroborated from beginning to end. If they could rely upon the girl's evidence, could there be any doubt that the accused con-spared together to keep the amah out of the way during the trial of Mrs. Rowarth on a charge of attempted murder?

Guilty.

The jury then retired and, after being absent for 40 minutes, returned with a verdict of guilty.

The Crown Advocate intimated that, in view of this verdict, the Crown would not proceed with the two other charges against the accused.

Asked if he had anything to say in mitigation of sentence, or as to whether there should be any discrimination between the accused, Mr Lewis pointed out that both had been in custody since March 12. As to discrimination, the probability was that Mrs. Davis was the mirror party in the affair.

His Lordship, in passing sentence on Mrs. Rowarth, said: You have had a very fair trial in this case and have been ably defended by Mr. Lewis, who has placed before the jury everything he possibly could in your favour. The jury have found you guilty, and I entirely agree with their verdict. On the evidence before them, and accepting the story of the amah, there is no doubt you were guilty of this offence. It is a most serious offence, and one involving the greatest danger, to tamper with the administration of justice, and it is an offence which ought to be punished most severely, not only as a punishment to the person concerned, but to stop other people from interfering or tampering in any way with the administration of justice. But there is one point in the case which may cause me to be more lenient in the sentence I am about to pass, and it is that I do not want it to be thought in any way that I am taking into consideration the other charges which have been brought against you. You have been tried for attempted murder and you were acquitted by the jury, and therefore you are purged entirely of that offence. That is the only reason why I now pass a sentence which I think is somewhat lenient, viz., 12 months' imprisonment with hard labour.

Lenience to Daughter.

Addressing Margaret Davis, his Lordship said: I do think that in some degree I can discriminate in the sentence I pass on yourself and your mother. You are not the person charged with the offence your mother was charged with, and the temptation must have been extremely great that you should assist in every way you possibly could to prevent your mother being convicted. I think therefore I am justified in taking into consideration the fact that the temptation was almost more than you could stand, because it was your mother you were attempting to save. I also cannot help thinking, on the evidence before the Court, that your mother was the leading spirit in this conspiracy and was the mainspring in carrying it out. I agree with the verdict of the jury that you were a party to it and no doubt knew what was going on, but on account of the temptation you have had, I do think I can mitigate the sentence I otherwise should pass on you. The sentence I do pass is six months' imprisonment with hard labour.

Mrs. Rowath accepted the result in stolid fashion, but her daughter collapsed on hearing her own sentence pronounced.

FREEDOM FROM PENALTIES GRANTED

Hongkong Companies Ordinances Again

Application was made to his honour Judge Sir Skinner Turner at H. M. Supreme Court on Monday by the Stanley Trading Co., Ltd., for an order that the time for filing returns of allotments of the company's shares, in accordance with section 39 of the Companies Ordinance, Hongkong, 1911, be extended till the expiration of seven days from the date of the order with freedom from penalties.

In an affidavit by Mr. H. V. Hawley, secretary to the company, it was explained that the company was inaugurated in August of last year with a capital of $25,000 divided into 25 shares of $100 each. On September 3 and September 5 last year the company allotted 85 of its shares, and no return was made to the Registrar.

Mr. A. G. Money, appearing on behalf of the plaintiff company, explained that the omission was entirely due to inadvertence and ignorance of the law on the part of the plaintiff company.

The application was granted.

JUDGMENT FOR TLS. 98.457 AGAINST GARAGE

For Goods Sold to Central Garage by Local Firm: Further Claim of Tls. 29.186

Judgment for Tls. 98,457.12 was given against the Central Garage Co., of 9 Hongkong Road, in H. M. Supreme Court on Monday by his Honour Judge Sir Skinner Turner. Plaintiffs were Probst Hanbury & Co., Ltd., who claimed from the Central Garage: (1) Tls 96,278.83 for goods sold and money advanced to, or paid on behalf of the defendants by plaintiffs at defendants' request, and in accordance with the statements periodically rendered to defendants by plaintiff; (2) Tls. 2,149.70, being agreed interest on the first mentioned sum at 7 per cent. per annum, from January 1 to the date of the writ; (3) Tls. 29,186.06, being commission on goods supplied to the defendants, and for goods and machinery supplied. Mr. R. E. S. Gregson appeared for plaintiffs; defendants were not legally represented. Mr. H. G. Wright watched the case, on cabled instructions from England, on behalf of the owners of the land on which the Central Garage is situated. An affidavit was filed by Mr. F. Rayden, of the plaintiff company, stating that the defendants were justly and truly indebted to the plaintiffs for the sum of Tls. 98,457.12, and he believed that there was no defence to the action in so far as it referred to the first two paragraphs. In respect of certain of the items set forth in the third paragraph there was a dispute proper for the decision of the Court.

Mr. Gregson pointed out to his Lordship that in Home practise under Order 14, Rule 4, if it appeared that the defence set up by the defendant applied only to a part of the plaintiff's claim, or that any part of the claim was admitted, judgment should be given judgment for such part of the claim as was admitted, or to which there was no defence. In this case there was no defence to the first two items at least, and these were to all intents and purposes admitted by the defendants. The action was, in fact, of a "friendly" nature. He asked for judgment for the first two, and suggested leave be given to defend for the rest.

His Lordship pointed that he could have no idea of what the defendants wanted to do, and the only thing he could suggest would be that the order pleadings on the third paragraph of the clause, and give judgment for plaintiffs on the first two paragraphs, reserving the costs of the whole matter.

Mr. Gregson agreed, and judgment was given accordingly.

WRONG NUMBER PLATE

Garage Employee's Lapse: Fined by British Magistrate

T. C. Leach, of the Taylor Garage, was fined $5 by Mr. G. W. King at H. M. Police Court on Tuesday for driving a car with a wrong number plate. Defendant's explanation was that the car was a new one which had been sold, and he was driving it to get a licence for the new owner. He told his coolie, he said, to put one of the garage's trade licences on the car and he had evidently put the other on by mistake.

The original charge was one of driving without a licence, but was afterward amended as stated.

Mr. E. T. Maitland, prosecuting for the police, told the Court that Mr. F. C. Millington, a schoolmaster at the Ellis Kadoorie School, took his car plates to the Taylor Garage to be exchanged for new ones. The number on those plates was 1653.He was given the new ones and fixed them on to his car leaving the old ones at the garage. On April 19 he was driving his car in Nanking Road when he saw defendant's car ahead with his own number, 1653, attached.

Mr. Millington, in evidence, said he was brought to the Court on a subpœna. He explained that some time ago he had an accident with his car and took the number plate to the defendant's garage to be changed. The change was effected and on April 19 while driving in Nanking Road he saw a car ahead carrying his number, 1653. He drove on till he drew level with the other car and found defendant was the driver. On being informed that he had witness's number plate up Mr. Leach at once apologised, and later sent him a letter of apology which he quite willingly accepted.

Defendant told the Court that the plate was put on by accident by his mechanic at the garage in mistake for one of their trade licences. The first he knew of the mistake was when Mr. Millington told him.

The Magistrate pointed out to Mr. Maitland that if he wished to secure a conviction he would have to summon Leach under the article providing that no motorist shall attach a wrong number plate to his car.

The amendment was made and defendant was fined $5.

LESLIE HAYNES IN SHANGHAI

Accused of Obtaining Credit by Fraud while an Undischarged Bankrupt

Leslie Haynes, undischarged bankrupt and director of the firm of McDonald, Leslie & Co., Ld., London, appeared before Mr. G. W. King at H. M. Police Court on Tuesday to answer charges of (1) obtaining credit from the Hongkong & Shanghai Hotels, Ld. (Palace Hotel) without informing them that he was an undischarged bankrupt; and (2) on or between January 1 and April 30 of this year engaging in trade or business in Shanghai under a name other than that under which he was adjudicated bankrupt, without disclosing to persons with whom he had dealings who he was, or that he was an undischarged bankrupt.

Mr. E. T. Maitland prosecuted for the police.

The Magistrate called Mr. Maitland's attention to the fact that a third charge had been added, charging prisoner that he did, between January 1 and March 31 of this year, obtain from Mr. W. H. Hartman the sum of £500 by false pretences and with intent to defraud. His Worship wished to know more.

Mr. Maitland explained that prisoner was trading in England as a director of the firm of McDonald, Leslie & Co., Ld. He was the "Leslie" of the company, in spite of the fact that he had been adjudicated bankrupt under the name of Leslie Haynes and had not at that time been discharged. It was while with the firm that he engaged Mr. Hartman to come out to Hongkong for the company. He represented to him that it was in a flourishing condition, and took £500 from him. In reality the firm was not in a flourishing condition, as the victim discovered on his arrival, but meanwhile prisoner had received his money and had left England for Shanghai.

The Magistrate pointed out that if this were the case, then under the Orders in Council prisoner could not be tried in Shanghai for an alleged crime committed in England.

Mr. Maitland suggested that the fact of the victim's coming out to this part of the world constituted a continuation of the fraud, which justified the police in proceeding against the accused.

The Magistrate replied that this was not a continuation of the false pretences and fraud as prisoner was not gaining any money by it.

Mr. Maitland –But it is a continuation of the fraud in as much as he is getting rid of the victim and so giving himself the opportunity to get away with the money. He is sending his victim 10,000 miles away.

Victimized and Victimizer Here

His Worship disagreed, and Mr. Maitland suggested that it seemed rather unfair that both victimizer and victimized could be in Shanghai together, and yet the victimizer be allowed to go free because his crime was committed in England.

The Magistrate asked Mr Maitland to look at the position from the point of view of the other man. Why should he be charged out here for an offence he was alleged to have committed in England. Probably all his evidence for his own defence would be in England, so that he could only refute by his own tongue any allegations that might be preferred against him. The knife cut both ways.

Mr. Maitland—I take it, then, that you will not proceed with this charge, your Worship?

The Magistrate—No, we will proceed with the others.

Chief Det.-Inspector Reeves stated that he apprehened the prisoner at 1 Carter Road at 8.15 yesterday morning, on a warrant. He read the charges over to him, and Haynes replied that he did not know the bankruptcy applied in Shanghai. He said nothing else.

Hotel Manager's Evidence.

Mr. Henry Wilton Heppell, manager of the Palace Hotel, stated that defendant engaged a room on monthly terms at the Palace Hotel towards the end of March.

Prisoner—It was March 22.

Witness went on to say that he remained at the Hotel till Saturday last when witness locked the door of his room and refused to allow Haynes to re-enter it. Haynes paid his account for March, but since then he had only paid $100 on account of his wine bill after being pressed. He owed the Hotel $438.-72, and witness locked him out because he believed him unable to pay.

Asked whether he was able to find bail prisoner replied that he could not, but he wished to be let free so that he could obtain his papers from his office to answer the charges. He knew very few people in Shanghai.

The Magistrate—There is no danger of his running away I suppose?

Mr. Maitland—Well, we understand he has a passage booked.

Prisoner denied this. He stated that Thomas Cook & Son had had instructions from his father to provide him with a passage, but they had not done so. He had no intention of absconding and was willing to surrender his passport.

Haynes was admitted to bail on his own recognizances in $500.

The Case Dismissed

The Magistrate (Mr. G. W. King) refusing to take jurisdiction in Shanghai for offences based on an alleged bankruptcy in England, the charges against Leslie Haynes were dismissed in the British Police Court on Wednesday, and the prisoner discharged.

Mr. E. T. Maitland again appeared to prosecute for the police.

The charges originally preferred against Haynes were that he obtained credit from the Palace Hotel without informing the management he was an undischarged bankrupt, and also that he engaged in business in Shanghai under a name other than that under which he was made bankrupt, without disclosing to the persons with whom he had dealings that he was an undischarged bankrupt.—Yesterday a fourth charge was added, viz. that he did, on or about March 20, 1924, at Shanghai, being an undischarged bankrupt, obtain credit for upwards of £10, to wit $145, from Y. Sing Yee, without informing him that he was an undischarged bankrupt.

One Charge Withdrawn.

Mr. Maitland, before proceeding with the evidence, said he wished to withdraw the charge against Haynes of carrying on business under a name other than that under which he was declared bankrupt, without informing his clients. His reason for this was that Mr. Hartman was to have been the chief witness on the charge, to give evidence of certain transactions in regard to which the Magistrate had refused to take jurisdiction because they took place in England. Furthermore, the other witness on that particular charge could not be found.

The Magistrate recalled that he had intimated on the previous day there would be some difficulty as to the jurisdiction of the Court in all these cases. He would ask Mr. Maitland to show him that the Court did possess jurisdiction.

Mr. Maitland replied that jurisdiction was obviously granted by the Order in Council, Article 35/2, which provided that the jurisdiction of that Court should be exercised, subject to provisions in the Order in Council, in accordance with English Law. The offences with which the prisoner was charged were offences committed under the Bankruptcy Act of 1914, which Act applied in Shanghai as well as in England.

Relative Position of Courts.

The Magistrate.—Then can you show me that a man made bankrupt by the Supreme Court of China, who goes to England and obtains credit there under similar [illegible] those alleged in this case, [illegible] convicted by the English [illegible] that he would come within their jurisdiction?

Mr. Maitland expressed the opinion that he would. The Supreme Court was, after all, merely a branch of the Supreme Court of England. It was His Britannic Majesty's Supreme Court.

The Magistrate.—Really, Mr. Maitland! This is a branch of the Supreme Court of England?

Mr. Maitland.—Yes, so I would suggest. Here we have a Court for British subjects, tried under British Law. It is applying English law in English Courts to British subjects in China.

The Magistrate reminded him that the Supreme Court for China actually had crignal jurisdiction in China. Other territorial limits were as defined in the Order in Council. The Court had no jurisdiction in England, nor even in Hongkong. When Mr. Maitland said this Court was an annexe to the High Court in England he was entirely against him. "Would you" he asked "supposing you obtained judgment in a case in England be able to enforce it in this Court in China simply because it is a judgment in a Court in England?"

Mr. Maitland.—Yes, certainly, if I can prove my judgment.

The Magistrate.—The High Court of England and the Supreme Court of China are two absolutely different courts. There is no question of their being ancillary. In fact there is a particular clause in the Order in Council referring to Hongkong, and Hongkong judgments, which illustrates that the Hongkong Court is totally different to the Supreme Court in China. In the same way the High Court of England is totally different to the Supreme Court in China." The whole question, his Worship went on to say, turned on whether that Court did possess territorial jurisdiction in the case. The English Courts had no power to take jurisdiction in any case not committed within the body of the Realm. An offence committed on land abroad could only be tried on the authority of the Statute. The same applied in Shanghai.

Mr. Maitland reiterated his contention that British subjects in Shanghai are within British jurisdiction, and in this case the charges came under the Bankruptcy Act which applied here as much as it applied in England.

The Magistrate's Decision.

The Magistrate said his mind was quite made up on the point, and he did not intend to take jurisdiction in the case. Briefly summed up, his reasons were that the jurisdiction of H. M. Supreme Court in Shanghai was limited by the Order in Council of 1904, Art. 35, which mentioned the principles under which law should be administered in that Court. It could not alter the territorial jurisdiction of the Court. Bankruptcy was not recognized beyond the territorial limits of the country in which the decree was made, and that equally applied to Shanghai. Assuming they could prove that Haynes had been made bankrupt in England and that he was undischarged, on those facts the Court could not take jurisdiction. Equally the Magistrate was convinced that if a man were made bankrupt in China and went to England and there obtained credit for upward of £10, no English Court could convict him. The jurisdiction of all English Courts was territorial, and only where they had statutory offences could they try offences committed out of the Court's jurisdiction. The charges against Haynes were dismissed and he could go.

The Magistrate added that if Mr. Maitland wished to appeal he was able to do so.

"MADE MOTORING HISTORY"

Magistrate's Retort to C. P. Rakusen: Fined for Disobeying Nw Traffic Regulation

C. P. Rakusen was fined $5 by Mr. G. W. King at H. M. Police Court on Thursday for failing, as the licensee of the car, to give information to the police which might lead to the identification of the person driving car No. 4574, on April 19, the said person having committed an offence against the traffic regulations.

Mr. E. T. Maitland, prosecuting

for the police, stated that the driver of the car committed an offence against the regulations north of Seymour Road in Bubbling Well Road on the day in question. When Chief Inspector Kinniple sent him a registered letter asking who was in charge of the car, he failed to reply.

Chief Inspector Kinniple, of the Traffic Department, corroborated, and added that he sent a further letter on a later date which was also left unanswered.

Defendant, asked for his explanation, told the Bench that he was so busy on the day he received the letter that it slipped out of his mind. He added that Chief Inspector Kinniple seemed to take a very friendly interest in his car. He had locked up his chauffeur for three days on one occasion because the car was parked somewhere where it ought not to have been for ten of 20 minutes.

The Magistrate—I know nothing about that.

Defendant—No, that was on another occasion.

The Magistrate—Well, you know Mr. Rakusen you have made what we might call motoring history in Shanghai.

The Magistrate went on to say that this regulation was a new one, but very important and licensees of cars should give the police every assistance. It was for the safety of the public and licensees alike, for it helped them to find out if their boys or unauthorised persons took cars out joy-riding. Defendant would be fined $5.

WINTERGARDEN CAFE BRAWL

Alleged Assault by Manager on Former Dancing Girl and Friend

Charges of using unlawful force and violence, preferred by Pauline Shmakova and Manne Martinson, against L. E. Brown, manager of the Wintergarden Café, were heard by Mr. N. E. Lurton, U.S. Commissioner, in the Lower Court on Saturday morning.

Miss Shmakova stated that she had been in the Café on April 30, in company with Mr. Martinson, where she had formerly been employed as a dancing girl, but had left that service two days before the alleged violence had taken place. In reply to questions by Mr. Schuhl, who appeared for complainants, she said that they had had several drinks, she cherry brandy and her escort whiskey and water and although she did not remember how many dances had been played; she was certain that she had danced but once. On that occasion one of the girls in the place had kicked her and then when passing again, aimed another blow at her but struck her friend instead. After the dance finished Brown asked Martinson to take her away, to which he replied that he could not see why, for she was all right and not misbehaving (it was the other girl). He (Brown) then came to her and told her to get out, calling her by a bad name and then pushed her over, but she retained her balance by clutching a table. Brown then struck Martinson on the head, with what witness could not remember, after which a sailor who was with Brown joined in the mêlée.' "I then took hold of the sailor's arm, trying to persuade him to stop fighting, when Mr. Brown struck me on the head and kicked me, and took hold of my dress and made a large tear in the front. After that I do not remember much, because I was half-asleep (witness tried to make clear her meaning; "half-unconscious").

Percentages to Get

Mr. Schuhl—Why did you go to the Wintergarden Cafe?—I still had some tickets and wished to get the money for them. On the dance cheques, the girls get 25 cents each and the management takes 25 cents also. Those small counters are given us for drinks, redeemable at 10 cents each, that large one is for champagne, it nets me $1.

Mr. Schuhl then presented the cheques, the torn dress and crumpled slipper as exhibits.

Mr. H. R. Snyder, cross-examining, elicited from witness that she had taken $45.30 worth of receipts to the Café, but witness stated definitely that she had not spoken to Brown about them, though she had asked the boy where the manager was. She had spoken to but one girl, though several had addressed her while she sat at the table.

Mr. Snyder—Did you ask the girls to strike?—I do not understand.

After the phrase had been made clear to her, she stated that when the girls struck for wages two months ago and many had left, she was one of the few to remain loyal.

Where Complainant was Hit

Mrs. MacDonald, a former employee, stated in very broken English that she saw Brown strike both complainants. She continually insisted that she should have an interpreter, but Mr. Lurton said that he must first be satisfied that she could not make herself clear.

Mr. Schuhl—You saw Mr. Brown strike Shmakova? —Yes.

Mr. Schuhl—Did you see Mr. Brown hit Martinson—Yes.

Mr. Schuhl—Where—blank looks on witnesses face—I do not understand.

Mr. Schuhl—Where did Mr. Brown strike Martinson?—Why, in the Wintergarden Café (Smiles—an interpreter was then called).

Dr. Pourpelain presented certificates as to his examination of the injuries. Mrs. Shmakova had bruises on both thighs, arms and chest and Martinson disclosed abrasions on the forehead, chin, face and thorax, with a coloured and closed eye.

M. Cesdi, after stating that he had seen Brown call Martinson to the cash register, was very positive that he had struck him behind the ear with a bottle. Complainants had not been drinking much, nor were they under the influence of liquor or creating a disturbance. Continuing witnessed declared, "Brown then threw the woman down the back stairs after tearing her dress."

Mr. Snyder—You saw Martinson threaten Mr. Brown with clenched fists, shaking them in his face?—No, I did not.

Mr. Snyder—Nor hear him swear at Mr. Brown?—No. Mr. Snyder—You state that you saw Mr. Brown strike Martinson with a bottle, is that statement as true as the others you have made?—Yes.

U.S. Quartermaster's Story.

Mr. C. R. MacDonald, quartermaster in the U.S. Navy, with 14 years' service, saw Brown and a sailor come up from below and walk quickly round the entire hall and then motion to Martinson to come where they were standing. Brown struck him, but he did not see any bottle. After the sailor had joined in the mêlée, Mrs. Shmakova tried to stop the trouble, but Brown hit her on the head and dragged her to the back door. He could not tell what happened outside, not having gone over.

The case was adjourned.

Screams and Cusses

The hearing was resumed on Tuesday.

Mr. Martinson, examined by Mr. Schuhl, corroborated the evidence given by Mrs. Shmakova last week, stating that witness and she had entered the hall and had several drinks, when one of the women insulted Mrs. Shmakova. He was sure that Brown struck him and the man Sharp previously alluded to as a "bouncer" by Mr. Schuhl, also struck him. He saw Brown strike Mrs. Shmakova.

A witness from the Huron, cross-examined by Mr. Snyder, was asked:—Did you talk to Mr. Brown about the affair?—Yes, I spoke to him a week later. I told him that Martinson was evidently looking for trouble and got it.

Wanted to Scratch Her Face

Mrs. Schepomaga, a Russian dancing girl employed at the café, stated that while she was dancing with her partner, Martinson and Shmakova passed her and he called her vile names which she did not care to repeat. Her partner asked her why Martinson behaved in this manner. She then told Mr. Brown that she was afraid that this man was going to beat her, and later Martinson came to her table again, when Brown told him to let her alone. Mrs. Shmakova wanted to scratch her face.

Another of the girls, who said was she sitting near the cash register, saw Brown lead complainant outside, but did not see him strike her, nor did she know what happened outside. As she was sitting only five or six feet away she heard Martinson swear at Brown and saw him stick his fist in the latter's face, but she did not see Brown strike him.

Another Affair

Mr. Schuhl—If Brown struck Martinson you did not see it?—No.

Mr. Schuhl—You applied at this Court some time ago for a warrant and you swore to certain facts and then later admitted that they were not true—That is another matter, that was my affair.

Mr. Snyder—I object to this questioning.

Mr. Schuhl—I was merely showing that this witness's evidence is unreliable, I was testing her credibility, but I will dismiss her.

Brown's Evidence

Defendant was next called. He stated that he was the manager of the Winter Garden Café, an incorporated company. Prosecutrix came to the café, but he was not sure when. It was about 10.30 p.m. Mrs. Shmakova, who had worked for him for three months, was dismissed by Mrs. Brown on April 28 because she was a trouble-maker. His wife told him that, while she was away in Chefoo, he was not in any circumstances to engage the woman. On the evening before the trouble she and Martinson came in. Martison gave her money for the tickets.

A Trouble-maker

The next night Martinson and Shmakova came in again and within a short time there was trouble with the girls. Both of them were very excited. "I tried to smooth them down, Martinson all the while reiterating that I had to discharge Anna (the previous witness, Mrs. Shepomaga) and re-engage Mrs. Shmakova, but I told him that Mrs. Brown had dismissed her and that I could not hire her again."

Mr. Snyder—Did you ever ask the police to furnish you with protection?—Yes, on two occasions.

Police Would not Intervene.

Defendant, continuing, said that he went to the office thinking that the matter was settled, but when he came down again they were dancing once more and then there was more trouble. "Martinson told me that he would close the place, called me vile names and shook his fist under my nose. I told him that I had to keep order and he dared me to throw him out. He seemed to want to be thrown out. Shmakova was very excited and I told her she had to leave, as other patrons were leaving because of her conduct. She dared me to put her out, so I walked over to Martinson and told him to take her out. He wouldn't, so I took her down the back stairs. She bit my thumb during the journey. I did not strike her."

Threw a Bottle

Mr. Snyder—Did you see any fight?—I did not, but as I passed Martinson, he swung at me and I ducked, but continued on my way. I did not strike him. I led her all the way down and came up the front stairs and just as I stepped into the ballroom I saw Martinson throw a bottle at Sharp, which luckily did not strike him.

Heard Much Cursing.

Miss Ethel Bish, accountant at the Winter Garden Café for four months, said she worked in the office until 10 p.m., when she retired to her room. She was awakened by loud talk, came to the banisters and looked down, and heard much cursing. Martinson was cursing violently. She heard a loud scream and saw Mr. Brown leading Shmakova down the back stairs, holding her arm.

J. J. Sharp, a Huron bluejacket, said: "I saw Brown leading the woman downstairs. Martinson made a pass and a swing at Brown, who continued to lead her away. I tried to stop the fight and Martinson made a pass at me. I followed it up.

Wilbur Le Marte, U. S. S. Huron, said Brown got the woman by the wrists and was "towing her out." "She put one hand on the bulkhead, but he got her loose and I saw him lead her all the way down."

In reply to Mr. Schuhl witness was sure that he did not notice that her dress was torn, nor was her hair disordered.

J. W. Pleasant stated that he saw Shamakova go to many tables, talking loudly and motioning with her hands. To Mr. Schuhl's question, he replied that he did not hear any vile names mentioned.

Lester H. Thompson, U. S. Marine Corps, said did not see Martinson and Shmakova inside, but he saw them outside, when Martinson joined Shmakova at the front door. Martinson's face was bloody, but he could not see any injuries to Shmakova. Witness told him that he was the man who hit him, and asked him to go to the station. "His nose looked as though someone had smashed it for him. The lady told the Chief of Police that she had an injury on the leg and wanted him to look at it, but he said, 'I am not a doctor,' and refused."

The defendant was remanded until Saturday.

MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL FAILS

Judge Lobingier's Decision in Russo-Asiatic Bank Case Upheld: If Kolchak Had Won

Argument was heard by Judge M. D. Purdy at the U. S. Court on Tuesday in support of the motion for a new trial by Max Wulfsohn & Co., against whom judgment was recently given in favour of the Russo-Asiatic Bank for G. $160,000 in a dispute over exchange contracts. This was one of the last cases decided by Judge Lobingier. It will be remembered that defendants offered a trunkful of roubles amounting to R. 42,000,000 several months ago in submitting to judgment.

Mr. F. J. Schuhl appeared for the bank, and Mr. R. T. Evans for defendants.

Mr. Evans stated that, although the exchange contracts had been signed in October, November and December, 1919, and in January, 1920, the Soviet authorities had seized Irkutsk in January 1920, and it was impossible for business to be conducted at the local office of defendant. It was their submission that the roubles were to be paid in there and there was the sum of R. 2,000,000 that had never been paid. The bank kept an overdraft account for them in roubles, but no gold account, and when gold payments were paid in New York they applied the difference to the rouble account. The relation of the debt and credit account in roubles made it evident that had Koltchak been successful in his counter-revolution, the bank would have claimed more than R. 33,000,000 instead of G. $160,000.

The second point he raised was that plaintiffs were not a legally constituted banking corporation and that they could not bring any action, for when the Soviet nationalized the Banks of Russia in 1917 this organization became the Peoples' Bank No. 1, though a body of men styling themselves the Russo-Asiatic Bank had a head office in Paris, not constituted in accordance with Russian banking laws, nor according to the bank's by-lays themselves. He now had in his poossession the specific decrees.

Mr. Evans cited the case in America in which his clients acted as plaintiffs against the Soviet Government, where the decision of the lower Courts was reversed by the Appellate Courts, and it was held that the Soviet was a de facto Government and that their property could not be attached and maintained. If his honour's Court maintained such a position, he held, that here in China the Bank was abolished by the acts of a Government and suit could not be brought and successfully held by that group of men.

Judge Purdy was in doubt whether money was paid in the Orient or in New York, and Mr. Schuhl informed him that it had been paid in both China and America.

The Judge—I am not satisfied that if this action had been heard by me, I would have reached a different conclusion, and if this presents anything out of the ordinary, it would be better for the interests of both parties to have it settled at once by a speedy Appellate Court decision. The motion is denied.

Another of the Late Judge's Decisions Upheld

In the afternoon the Judge also heard arguments for a new trial in the case of the China American Trading Co., of Tientsin, v. Fearon Daniel & Co., in which action plaintiffs were awarded Tls. 16,000. Mr. R. T. Evans and Mr. S. Fessenden appeared for defendants and Mr. Schuhl for plaintiffs.

His Honour overruled the motion, stating that a jurist who takes the place of another is often confronted with intricate problems. He was certain that Judge Lobingier would have acted likewise.

OIL IN THE HUANGPU

And Port's Water Supply: Another U. S. Captain Charged with Allowing Leakage

Capt. Lustie, master of the str. President McKinley, was charged before Mr. Lurton at the U. S. Commissioner's Court on Wednesday "with polluting the Huangpu," by allowing oil from the vessel to leak into the river on March 16.

Mr. M. Reader Harris prosecuted for the Chinese Maritime Customs; Mr. H. D. Rodger appeared for the United States; and Major C. P. Holcomb for the U. S. Shipping Board.

Capt. Tanner, berthing officer, stated that he was moving down stream, and when about two cables length (1.200 ft.) away from the wharf he noticed a stream of oil issuing from the ship, amidships, probably 18 inches above the waterline. It seemed to be four or five inches in diameter, though he could not definitely tell at that distance. The ship was in port 36 hours and he had not noticed any oil on the water before she left. His launch was in oily water for 20 minutes.

In answer to the Commissioner, witness said the oil seemed to be flowing from a regular discharge pipe.

Capt. Longworth, Assistant Harbour Master, stated that he was informed of the incident and went down to the river. He saw that in Section 10 the whole stream was covered.

Replying to Major Holcomb witness said the oil moved up and down with the tide, getting on the piers jetties, shipsides and intake pipes of the Waterworks plant. Oil could get into the pipes, even though they were below the surface, first by being washed against them and later working into them.

Charles Hess, River Police, said he saw oil at 10 a.m. The McKinley was the only oil-burning vessel to enter or leave port that morning.

Mr. Rodgers elicited from witness that he noticed burnt oil for more than two miles in patches 15ft. by 70ft.

Menace to Shanghai's Water

Mr. H. E. Hillman, Harbour Master produced a letter from the Waterworks, which mentioned the danger from oil on the river. The letter stated that no oil went into their settling tanks on this occasion, but great danger did exist, for should large quantities get into the works, it might be months before enough clean water could be got to supply Shanghai. Shanghai would be in imminent danger of a water famine.

Replying to Mr. Rodger, witness stated that entrances, working and clearances of vessels might be prohibited, but that they preferred to work with shippers.

Mr. Holcomb asserted that the U. S. Shipping Board desired to co-operate with the authorities in all ports, particularly in such a vital matter as this.

Defendant told the Court that it was impossible for oil to appear on the port side, for there were no discharge pipes on that side amidships. He volunteered to have the ship inspected.

Charge Dismissed.

After the lunch adjournment, the Court inspected the vessel. When the hearing was resumed the Chief Engineer gave evidence that he was on deck and saw the oil through which they were steaming. He had had a defective tank, but it had been cleaned out with live steam.

Capt. W. I. Eisler, American Lloyds Surveyor, corroborated this.

Mr. Lurton, in dismissing the charge, declared that sufficient doubt existed to prevent defendant being found guilty.

MR. Whitamore, British Assessor, at the Mixed Court, on Thursday of last week gave a decision in connexion with motor-car traffic on a point not touched upon in the regulations. Complainant, represented by Mr. N. F. Allman, of Fleming & Allman, charged accused, a chauffeur in the employ of the S.M.C., with having bowled him over, while he was driving his car past a stationary tram on the right side, instead of the left at Kungping and Seward Roads, on April 29. Complainant had spent two weeks in hospital. In imposing a fine of $10 and hospital costs on the chauffeur, the Bench stated that passing a tram on the off-side would be held by that Court as contributory negligence, should any accidents occur by such acts.

TANGLED LITIGATION OVER FUR DEAL

More Revelations Concerning Sipailoff: Parties now Disputing the Accounting

The case of the Fur & Wool Trad[illegible] Anderson, Meyer & Co., a dispute [illegible] moved for a new trial on the grounds of the alleged perjury of [illegible], advanced a further stage on Thursday. Judge Lobingier originally found for plaintiffs, ordering an account[illegible] the attention of Judge Purdy at the U. S. Court throughout yesterday.

The successful party alleged that defendants had more than 120,000 skins of various animals, which they valued $189,360, when their agent Matvei Noskoff was killed in Urga at the order of Sipailoff in April, 1921, but for which skins they paid 28 cents each.

Mr. R. T. Evans appeared for plaintiffs; Mr. W. Chalaire and Mr. C. S. Franklin for defendants.

Mr. R. T. Evans, in the course, of a speech lasting several hours, said his clients differed with the accounting rendered by defendants' auditor, particularly with reference to the division of profits accruing from the sale in New York. According to the stipulation drawn up in Tientsin, he was of the opinion that this document provided for the formation of a trust on the part of defendant, in which capacity they could only act. It appeared, as was found in the transcript of the evidence, that Messrs. Fox, of New York, sold the furs and billed the consignment for one-half of the profits, but he also claimed that this firm acted with defendants, who allowed that percentage. He denied this.

Continuing Mr. Evans, declared that this constituted a joint adventure and that had all the facts been known to him at the time of trial, they might have been made joint defendants. That point [illegible] statutes provided that one party of the whole—a Mr. Gold acted for both defendant and the New York firm.

Sipailoff Accused of Killing Dane.

[illegible] city of the vicinity was in the path of the armies and when Baron Ungern, a Russo-German, closed in on the city and finally took it, great [illegible] various times to both Koltchak and Simionov, though historians fail to disclose that either of them acknowledged him. With him and on the most of his ventures, was one Sipailoff, who is at present in Harbin, awaiting trial on charges of [illegible] of a Danish citizen. It was his misdeeds that brought about this suit, for when he murdered Noskoff, the black spot on the Mon[illegible] he took the loot from the widow and sold it to defendants for M.$40,000, for which they received in New York G.$90,000.

Upon resumption after tiffin, Mr. Chalaire directed his argument to [illegible] and declared that it was purely [illegible] which his clients acted as agent and [illegible] just proportion of the profits.

Supporting this arguments, Mr. C. S. Franklin concluded the argument and cited law.

Final speeches will be heard this [illegible] which Mr. Evans will given 10 days in which to prepare a brief.

"EVENING NEWS" PLEADS FOR LENIENCY

In [illegible] Action by China Press to Recover Alleged Printing Costs

At the Mixed Court on Monday, Mr. Jacobs and Magistrate Li heard a motion for judgment by default [illegible] against the "Evening News," edited by Mr. C. H. Lee, for $14,607.23, alleged to be due for printing and publishing the latter newspaper for [illegible] 1922 to September, 1923

Mr. H. R. Snyder appeared for plaintiffs; Mr. J. W. Schoenfeld for defendants.

Mr. Snyder moving the Court for judgment by default, said it had been nine months since the action had been filed and there had been no formal pleadings to date, although on November 12, 1923, the defence had asked for a bill of particulars, which was sent them.

Mr. Schoenfeld, opposing the motion, said the original petition had been filed by Mr. Alexander Fishman and received by Messrs. Musso & Fischer, who put in for the bill of particulars, but they, at a subsequent date, withdrew from the case, as they represented the Commercial Bank of China, mortgages for $10,000 and interest.

Defendants' Plant Barely Worth Tls. 3,000

"Paragraph five of the petition claims $1,400," said Mr. Schoenfeld, "but does not say in what way this sum was incurred—there is no itemized statement. Since the filing there have been conferences between all parties concerned, including the mortgagee, who holds liens to three times the value of the "Evening News." Mr. Fischer told me that he had never received the bill of particulars and we had every reason to believe that the action would never go to trial, for the mortgagee holds a prior interest. Printing presses and machinery, etc., are barely worth Tls. 3,000. The paper is now in the hands of two Americans, who are trying to set it on its feet and liquidate the debts.

"I would like, therefore, to move for setting a date, so that we can look through the bill of particulars, and request that the motion for judgment by default be dismissed. I might state incidentally, that it is not the policy of courts in Shanghai to give judgment by default if both parties are willing to proceed."

Mr. Snyder—There is no reason for not proceeding now. If the "Evening News" has assets worth 10 cents, we have a right to go ahead with this; there is still no answer in my hands and I am ready to proceed. The rules of the Court are that if no answer is filed within 20 days, judgment by default may be given and the defendants have had the bill of particulars for six months and now they plead for leniency. I submit that there is no reason for not proceeding and judgment should be given.

Mr. Jacobs—Do you admit that negotiations were made toward a settlement?—Yes, up till three months ago, there have been none since.

Mr. Jacobs (after consultation with the Magistrate)—The Court feels it its duty to go ahead with the case. The answer is in; cannot we proceed?

Mr. Snyder—At this time I am not ready.

"Misled by Negotiations"

Mr. Schoenfeld—Defendants were misled by the negotiations and it is not entirely their fault. (To Mr. Snyder). You don't want to try [illegible] afraid to proceed on the merits.

[illegible] reason for this action?"—asked [illegible] afraid to take this on its merits, you have been putting off for nine months?

Mr. Jacobs—The Court will deny the motion for judgment by default [illegible] r. You yourself have stated [illegible] negotiations have b[illegible]

[illegible] Will the Court set [illegible]?

Mr. Jacobs—There are 55 cases in which Americans are interested [illegible] pending before the American Assessor and I'll not set a date at this time.

NORTH SZECHUEN ROAD TROUBLE AGAIN

A Chinese Schoolmaster Charged at Mixed Court with Being One of the Ringleaders and Inciting Loafers to Riot: A Question of Jurisdiction

Fue Ming-chu, a Chapei schoolmaster, was charged at the Mixed Court on Wednesday afternoon before Messrs. Whitamore and Li, on a complaint filed by Mr. W. Brandt of Messrs. Brandt & Rogers, to the effect that he and two others not in custody "did by violence and threats prevent the servants and workmen of the complainant from carrying out certain demolition and building work at Yoo [illegible] Szechuen Road, contrary to Article 358 of the Chinese Code."

It will be recalled that on May 1, a squad of foreign police, Chinese, Japanese and Sikh constables, were sent to North Szechuen Road in response to a riot call, when agitators were thought to have obstructed work and when a large crowd of Chinese gathered round the buildings.

Evidence as to the jurisdiction of the Mixed Court was heard in the presence of a large body of Chinese, some of whom appeared most interested, while the majority looked on apathetically or dozed through the proceedings. Several, however, reminded one of a figurative impression of a Chinese Bolshevist, of the theoretical type, while another large, fat citizen continued to stroke his lips or scratch his nose with long slender fingers, not at all in keeping with the remainder of his anatomy. Armed foreign constables stood guard at each door, while several higher officials of the department stepped in occasionally.

Question of Jurisdiction.

Dr. Fischer moving for a dismissal of the charge, on the ground that the Mixed Court had no jurisdiction, stated that by treaty it was axiomatic that Chinese must commit crime within the Settlement before they came under the decrees of that Court, further that the property belonged to Chinese and not to a British citizen (Messrs. Brandt & Rogers) who only served as agents.

Mr. Whitamore, interrupting: They are the registered owners.

Mr. Fleming joined in the motion, adding that defendant was not legally arrested, but that he had been enticed from his home, dragged into the alleyway and kidnapped into the Settlement where he was arrested.

In rebuttal Mr. Brown declared that Mr. Brandt owned one fourth of the property and held a 25-year lease on the remainder; he might be looked upon as the real and proper owner. It was not admitted at all that accused had been taken from Chapei and if it were true he had the proper remedy; it was sufficient for this case to know that he was arrested in the Settlement on a properly executed warrant. The police had complete control of the Municipal roads where the offence was committed. To the third objection that Mr. Brandt was not qualified to make a complaint counsel argued that this was a highly technical point, and under Court procedure it was not customary for justice to be obfuscated.

Mr. Whitamore said that if an action were to be brought against the property, it would have to be charged to Mr. Brandt and further that by common law any citizen could make a complaint in respect of a criminal action, which this surely was.

Wong Kau-san, the contractor, stated in reply to Mr. Brown, that he saw defendant on three occasions threaten workmen, twice in Jukong Road and once in North Szechuen Road and that he was beating a gong, blowing a whistle and carrying a white flag.

To the Assessor's question where he saw him in North Szechuen Road witness replied that it was at the entrance of the Yoo Loh Yee alleyway, and to a further query still maintained the same reply.

The Assessor—Was he in the alleyway or was he in the road? did he have one foot or both feet on the road?—Witness answered to successive queries—at the entrance, nearly upon the footpath, I saw him come out of the alleyway; yes, I saw him outside the alleyway, I am quite sure. He stopped the men from building the bamboo fence.

Mr. Fleming—You have evidently schooled yourself to say he was at the entrance of the alleyway. Did he come out?—Yes he came out and beat the gong. He directed the workmen to stop work, and asked the people to fight, to beat [illegible].

Mr. Fleming—Where was this?—On the kerb.

Mr. Fleming—Haven't you worked up a story to get the action into the jurisdiction of the Mixed Court?—No.

Witness later declared that they went with the schoolmaster to the Chinese Police Station and that he would not accompany them to the Settlement Station. He told the agitators that he had a foreign building permit and an authorization from the Chapei officials. Two people were hurt, and he sent them to hospital.

Afraid of the Mob.

Zen Ting-dah, foreman, stated that accused was at the works as many as six times. He saw him himself and at different times he carried the flag, the gong or the whistle. Accused paraded round the alleyway, went behind the houses and came on to North Szechuen Road.

"At the time of the erection of the fence he shouted for the people to come out, to stop the workmen from building the fence, to beat them and to throw tiles from the roofs at them. This was at the entrance of the alleyway. Sometimes he used the handle of the flag to beat us."

To Mr. Fleming's question why he did not call the police witness replied that he was afraid of the many people, that they would beat him. He was outside on the road at the time of the riot on May 1.

Accused declared that the evidence of the two witnesses was untrue, except that he had gone to the Chinese Police Station. He never went on to the road nor did he carry flags or beat gongs. He absolutely never interfered with the workers, although he did explain to the foreman that as the case was still pending in the Chinese Court it might be better if they did not continue with the work.

The Alleged Kidnapping.

Referring to the kidnapping allegation he stated that he was dragged by six men including workmen, one of them a clerk, from his house into the alleyway, where after stopping for a moment they drew him into North Szechuen Road.

Mr. Brown—You took no part in obstructing the building operations, nor are you a leader of the Tenants' Association, nor one of their representatives—I did not obstruct the men, but I represent my school in the Association.

Mr. Brown—You went to the Chinese Station with the two other accused on behalf of the tenants?—Yes. I went on two occasions.

Witness then denied having any part in stirring up the men or blowing whistles or beating a gong, for he had neither. He was positive that he did not tell tenants to throw tiles at the men from the roofs. He further denied this act even though Mr. Brown warned him that two witnesses would give evidence that he had done so. He had been at the Police Station all day.

Two other witnesses, one of them employed at the Dollar Garage, told of seeing accused dragged from the alleyway and subsequently arrested.

The case was remanded to a future date, during which time the Bench will come to a decision as to the jurisdiction.

A petition has been lodged by the wife of Dr. F. C. Tong, the Cantonese who was sentenced to a term of imprisonment some time ago in connexion with the suicide of a young Chinese woman, for the remission of the sentence. It will be remembered that following his conviction and subsequent appeal to the Soochow Court, Tong was accused of being a Bolshevik agitator and committed to the Military Prison, Lunghua.

MANSLAUGHTER CHARGE

Nine Months for Chinese Joy-riding Car-washer: Woman's Instant Death

For driving an Essex motor-car (6230) from a garage at 326 North Chekiang Road and running down a Chinese woman who was instantly killed, a Chinese named Tser Ah-san was sentenced to nine months' imprisonment at the Mixed Court on Monday on a charge of manslaughter.

It was stated that after running over the woman, whose ribs were crushed and who died from haemorrhage of the lungs, prisoner next crashed into a building on the opposite side of the road.

A chauffeur stated that he brought the machine into the garage to be washed. He turned off the engine, which could not be started again without pressing the self-starter. The car was not in gear—the gear was in neutral.

Sub.-Insp. Webb told the Court that he had examined the car shortly after the woman was run down. He had found the gear control very stiff, as was the self-starter. This was over on the left-hand side of the car far beyond the shift, which was in the centre, the car being a right hand drive. It was not probable that the machine could be accidentally started in any way, though just the proper position of one's body cramped on the floor of the tonneau—a most awkward position—could bring this about.

The Court adjourned to the yard and the Assessor took the wheel, tried the self-starter and the gears, explaining the mechanism to the Magistrate.

When the Assessor and Magistrate resumed their seat the defendant declared that he was washing the car and got inside. As he pressed his thigh against something the car went off with a crash. The engine was not running before he got inside.

THE Ministry of Foreign Affairs has notified the Commissioners of Foreign Affairs here and elsewhere to stop issuing passports to Chinese labourers who desire to go to Russia, as there is no work for them there.

A rather novel but most despicable form of obtaining money under false pretences, under the guise of charity, came before Messrs. Martin and Kuan at the Mixed Court last Friday morning and was most severely dealt with. Accused's method was to obtain business cards of influential Chinese citizens and then draft letters to others, purporting to come from those whose cards he held—letters which stated that the writer was known of the other, that he had lost all his property in the September catastrophe in Japan and that his wives and children were in immediate need of funds to keep them from starvation. With the biography of the accused and a well-worded appeal for a small gift, the letter was frequently successful in its purpose and defendant lived a comfortable life by this means. For the next 18 months, however, the Municipality will furnish him with food and lodging, after which he will be escorted to the boundary and told never to return.

THE FRENCH GOVERNMENT DEFEATED IN GENERAL ELECTIONS

Sweeping Successes of Left Parties Throughout the Country, but Paris Loyal to M. Poincare: M. Herriot the Probable Premier of the Radical Party

Paris, May 11.

The general elections to-day coincided with the Joan of Arc fête-day. They were carried out in fine weather. There was heavy polling. The earliest returns are in favour of the Government.

May 12.

Provisional estimates on the elections indicate that the parties of the left are gaining some ground, principally in the South, which is a recognized Radical stronghold, but there is no marked change in the state of the parties.

Voting is considerably heavier than at the last election.

M. Maginot, Minister of War, M. Marin, Minister of the Liberated Regions, and the ex-Premier, M. Briand, have all been elected.

Later.

The first results of the elections show the following have been elected:—

Conservatives	7
Republicans	6
Radicals	3
Radical Socialists	29
Republican Socialists	9
Socialists	26
Communists	3

Later.

The elections took place very calmly throughout France.—Reuter.

Paris, May 12.

Out of 584 seats, 309 results have hitherto been declared. Those elected include 12 Conservatives, 63 Republicans, 41 Left Republicans, 21 Radicals, 82 Radical Socialists, 20 Republican Socialists, 58 Unified Socialists and eight Communists.

The notabilities returned include the ex-Ministers, MM. Thomson, Colrat and Reibel; the former Minister, M. Malvy, who was banished from France; the Communist, M. Marty, who served a long term of imprisonment for participation in the Black Sea mutiny; M. Franklin Bouillon, the author of the Angora Agreement and M. Herriot, the Radical Socialist Mayor of Lyons. Those defeated include the former Minister, M. de Lasteyrie; Prince Murat, and M. Tardieu, a bitter opponent of M. Poincare.

The "Matin" points out that, although the Leftists are apparently winning in a rather large number of departments, the bloc national remains steady in several departments.

Later.

A rough division of the parties shows that 133 Rightists have hitherto been elected, namely, Conservatives, Moderate Left Republicans, and Dissident Radicals, while 108 Leftists have been elected, namely, Radical Socialists, Republican Socialists, United Socialists and Communists. The Rightists had 26 gains and 130 losses, showing a net loss of 104, whereas the Leftists won 97 and lost 15, a net gain of 79.

M. Peret, President of the Chamber of Deputies, has been re-elected.

Prominent Persons Defeated.

Noon.

While it would be premature to say that France will soon have a Radical Government, the results of the elections up to the present mark an undoubted reverse for the Poincarists. The success of the Left Parties probably surpasses their expectations. The Left holds a clear majority on the 449 results hitherto declared.

The question of the hour is how far the last 100 returns will modify this.

Prominent personages defeated include the Royalist, M. Leon Daudet; the Catholic leader, General de Castelnau, the brilliant Clemenceau, M. Mandel, and the former Minister, M. Maginot.

[illegible] the Minister of the Colonies, M. Brandon, the ex-Premier and M. Caillaux, the Conservative leader, are among the candidates returned, while M. Sadi Lecointe, the aviator; M. Worth, the head of the dress-making firm; M. Philippe Barres and his son, M. Maurice Barres, are among those defeated.

The money market's sense of an impending change is evidenced by the remarkable fall of the franc from 73 to 78 for £1 and from 16.75 to over 18 for $1.

3 p.m.

The results still arriving indicate that, while Paris is loyal to M. Poincaré, the Left has swept the country. The question on all lips is when M. Poincaré will resign. The Governmental organ, the "Intransigeant," admits that the majority in the next Chamber will be Radical Socialist and Socialist. It says that M. Poincaré is not likely to resign until the Chamber meets, when his resignation will be automatic. M. Briand or M. Herriot will probably be invited to form a Cabinet.

The Left press also demands the resignation of President Millerand, owing to his close identification with M. Poincaré's policy and the fact that he has been represented as taking a more direct part in politics than is customary for the President. According to the best information, however, a Presidential crisis is not likely.

Later.

The results of 527 constituencies out of the 584 give the Right parties 243 seats, including Moderate Republicans 117 and Left Republicans 82. The Left parties have 280, including Radicals and Radical Socialists 124, Socialists 91 and Communists 26.

There will be second ballots in four constituencies.

The Right losses total 157 and the Left gains 104, namely, Radicals and Radical Socialists 46, Socialists 44 and Communists 14. The Communists gained nine seats in the Fourth Seine Constituency, which embraces the industrial area around Paris.

Those elected include M. Klotz, M. Painlevé, M. Georges Leygues and M. Bokanowski, the Minister of Marine.

Colonies' Returns Awaited.

Later.

At five o'clock this evening the returns were complete except for the Colonies and one in the Nord department, while there will be four second ballots.

The result is as follows:—

Republican Socialists	39
Socialists	101
Communists	29
Right 274, namely Conservatives	11
Moderate Republicans	137
Independent Radicals	34

A Narrow Majority

Later.

All the Ministers who sought re-election have been returned.

With 574 results available, the united Left retain a majority of 22 over all the other groups.

The newspapers emphasize the vulnerability of any Government based on such a narrow majority without a common constructive policy and whose only point of cohesion is opposition to the bloc national. A wide field of speculation is opened by the suggestion [illegible] in order to safeguard [illegible] chance of survival, the new Government must first secure the support of the Left Centre groups and form a [illegible] Republican concentration, though such a combination [illegible] Left considers a direct [illegible] Premiership.

The Colonies [illegible] to elect [illegible] assembly [illegible] from the elections, notably, whether M. Poincaré shall resign immediately [illegible] shall appeal to assembly of Parliament. If the latter course is adopted, M. Poincaré will keep his engagement at The Chequers on May 19.

Later.

M. Herriot, who is mentioned as a likely successor to M. Poincaré, is a distinguished educationist. He is a pioneer of local government and is known as "the king of mayors" on account of his success during many years' mayoralty of Lyons.

M. Herriot was Minister of Transport during the war. He shares with M. Loucheur the reputation of being one of the first economic authorities in France, and he organized the Lyons Fair. He has been identified with attempts to restore Franco-Russian commercial relations and went with a mission to Moscow in that connexion two years ago.

M. Herriot is credited with pro-English leanings.

It is semi-officially stated that the experts' plan will probably remain the base of the French reparations policy and that, even if M. Poincaré ceases to direct public affairs, his successor is unlikely to abandon altogether the policy of the present Premier.

May 13.

M. Poincaré told President Millerand to-day that he himself and the Cabinet would resign on June 1.—Reuter.

Berlin, May 12.

The press here is elated at M. Poincaré's discomfiture, though there is a difference of opinion with regard to its effects on the Ruhr policy.—Reuter.

Radical Ex-Premier on Germany's Obligations

Paris, May 13.

The Radical Socialist ex-Premier, M. Painlevé, in an interview in which he explained the attitude of the Left bloc, laid stress on the fact that France's desire for peace was based on the principle of reparation, and that bad faith on the part of Germany would have for her very disastrous consequences. "Europe," he said, "could only enjoy a peaceful future if the goodwill and conciliation of France met with goodwill and honest and continued execution of obligations on the part of Germany."

Latest Results at the Polls

Paris, May 14.

The official list of the election results gives the state of the parties as follows:—

Conservatives	20
Radicals and Radical Socialists	139
Republican Socialists	35
Socialists	102
Communists	29

Results still awaited are: Colonies 10; second ballots 4; the Department of the Nord one. On the basis of these figures the right and Centre parties muster 264 seats, against 305 of the Left, including Communists, or 276 without Communists.

The new Chamber will thus be divided in almost equal masses of the Right and Left. Much depends on the direction of gravitation of the Deputies on the Borderland between the two main bodies. The balance of parties seems to justify the prophecy of small majorities and frequent crises in the Chamber.—Reuter.

Paris, May 14.

Official checking has revealed a miscount in one Seine constituency, with the result that a Communist has been returned instead of a Poincarist.

Seven out of the 10 Colonial returns have now been received. They comprise three Radical Socialists, two Republican Socialists one Left Republican and one non-Party, thus slightly increasing the Left majority.—Reuter.

LONDON, May 14.—Mr. Frank Gray, M.P. (Liberal) has been unseated as the result of the hearing of a petition against his election for the City of Oxford on the ground that his election expenses exceeded the amount allowed.—Reuter.

MR. MACDONALD AND M. POINCARE

Paris, May 9.

It is stated at the Quai D'Orsay that, failing an unforeseen hitch, an early meeting between Mr. Ramsay MacDonald and M. Poincaré is certain and will probably be held towards the end of the month. It is emphasized that very careful preparations is necessary in order that the meeting may attain the maximum of usefulness.

Later.

M. Poincaré has accepted an invitation from Mr. Ramsay MacDonald to pay an informal visit to the Chequers on May 20 and to stay the night.—Reuter.

London, May 10.

It appears that Mr. Ramsay MacDonald's invitation to M. Poincaré was despatched only on Friday afternoon. Acceptance was received in the same evening to meet at Mr. MacDonald's convenience. The date of the meeting has been altered to May 19. The reparations experts' reports will be discussed. According to the "Matin," M. Poincaré will be attended by an interpreter only.—Reuter.

London, May 12.

The opinion is expressed in London that the meeting between Mr. Ramsay MacDonald and M. Poincaré at The Chequers will inevitably be abandoned as a result of the French elections.

A meeting between Mr. MacDonald and the new French Premier is regarded as certain, but this will necessarily be delayed to give M. Poincaré's successor time to look round.

M. Poincare's Visit to Chequers Off

Later.

It is understood that M. Poincaré has decided not to go to the Chequers, in view of the result of the elections.—Reuter.

THE INQUIRY INTO MINERS' WAGES

Court Agreed that Profits are Unable to Meet Men's Requirements

London, May 9.

The report of the court of inquiry into the question of the coalminers' wages says that the profits of the industry are inadequate to meet the increases demanded, but the miners' claims for re-organization of the industry involve a political question with which the court is incompeten to deal. It suggests resumption of negotiations with a view to modification of the 1921 wages agreement.

The report says that it is really undisputed that the agreement of 1921 has failed to provide adequate wages. In many of the poorer districts the real issue is far more fundamental. The miners assert that they are entitled to secure full living wages for all engaged in the industry, primarily out of the total profits. If these are inadequate, it rests with the mine-owners, by altering the organization of the mines and the disposal of produce, to increase the amount and, if it is still insufficient to pay the wage, the character of the coal mining industry, which is the foundation of all other industries in the country, requires that other more fundamental measures should be adopted. The court is not concerned with the merits of this contention, it being a political question.

The court is unable to express an opinion with regard to the economic possibility and effect of increasing the price of coal or reducing costs sufficiently to enable the present claim to be met, but from the figures before the court it appears that, under present conditions, the profits of the industry, particularly in some districts, are unable to meet the miners' claim fully. The owners showed an aggregate profit on the whole of the coalfieds from October, 1921, to December, 1923, of £37,318,000. It is estimated that, had the miners' present claim operated during this period, £102,500,000 additional wages would have been paid. In any case the Sankey wages of two shillings a shift would alone cost annually as much as the whole profits of 1925.

The report suggests resumption of negotiations with a view to modification of the terms of the agreement of 1921, which appears to offer immediate and practicable means of effecting a new wages agreement.

The court expresses the opinion that a minimum wage should have precedence over distribution of profits, but it cannot specify conditions with regard to the basis on which that minimum wage should be fixed.—Reuter.

MR. BALDWIN'S VOTE OF CENSURE

Debate on Removal of McKenna Duties: Motion Rejected by Large Majority

London, May 13.

Mr. Stanley Baldwin's motion of censure of the Government, declaring it inexpedient to remove the McKenna duties amidst the present distresses, was rejected by the House of Commons to-day by 317 votes to 252.

Later.

The House of Commons was crowded to-day for the debate on Mr. Stanley Baldwin's vote of censure.

The former Premier, moving that it was inexpedient to remove the McKenna duties amidst the present distresses, said that British motor-cars known on the Australian market were superseded by American cars during the war and it was still doubtful whether we could recover the market. This decision would make it still more difficult. Furthermore, Canada benefited by the preference given her under the McKenna duties and the production of Canadian motor-cars had increased largely, aided by American capital invested in Canada to get the benefit of the preference. He feared that the Government had dealt a blow to Canadian trade, which, coupled with the Government's action in regard to Imperial preference, would make the Dominions less responsive to any idea of reciprocity. He suggested an impartial inquiry into the question of the McKenna duties.

No Need for Protection

Mr. Philip Snowden, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, declared that the motor trade had ample notice of the change of conditions. He aroused much opposition by attacking an agitation alleged to have been carried on by employers among workers, and asked what good the duties had done to the motor trade, seeing that 75 per cent. of British manufacturers were in the hands of banks. Exports in 1922 had been lower than in 1913, while during the same period imports had doubled. The effect of the duties had ceased to be protective because British manufacturers specialized in a British type to the exclusion of American competition. The British motor-car trade, Mr. Snowden declared, would find that it did not want protection when it got rid of watered capital and put its affairs on a sound financial basis. There could be no compromise over the withdrawal of the duties.

Vigorous opposition to abolition of the duties was voiced by Mr. A. A. Purcell, Labour Member for Coventry, on behalf of his constituents and also by Major-Gen. J. E. B. Seely, Liberal Member for the Isle of Wight.

The motion of censure was rejected by 317 votes to 252. Nine Liberals supported the motion. No Labour Member voted against the Government, though Mr. Purcell abstained.—Reuter.

FOREIGN POLICY OF LABOUR GOVT.

Premier's Statement at the Albert Hall: Effort to Bring Peace and Union

London, May 13.

Defining the Government's foreign policy at a Labour Women's Demonstration at the Albert Hall today, the Prime Minister, Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, declared that he was a convinced and unbending Nationalist. He respected national traditions and characteristics. It would be a very bad day for the world if the diversities of humanity, created by so many experiences of race, creed and clime, became cooperated into one feature. But neither was it his ideal to make Nationalism so hard that it became a pest to anyone trying to make peace. Nationalism [illegible] aggression but self-respect. Therefore the Labour Government's foreign policy was to bring about great peace and union. He appealed to the small European nations, no less than the Great Powers, to come in and enable the advancement of a policy of disarmament.

Referring to the Dawes report, Mr. MacDonald admitted that there were some things in it of which he was a little bit suspicious, but he believed that the adoption of the report as a whole would give Europe a new chance of finding its feet. He urged all the Powers concerned to take up the same attitude and trust to the sense of justice of the world to see right done in the end.—Reuter.

A HOME RULE MEASURE FOR SCOTLAND

Scottish Labour Scheme for Separate Parliament: Uproar in House

London, May 9.

Pandemonium reigned for a time in the House of Commons this afternoon in consequence of the Speaker allowing the Bill providing for the establishment of a single chamber Parliament of 148 members for Scotland to be talked out.

The second reading was moved by a Scottish Labour Member and in the course of the debate Mr. William Adamson, the Secretary for Scotland, on behalf of the Government approved the general principle of the measure and hoped that it would pass its second reading with an overwhelming majority. He declared that the Government was prepared to appoint a committee to examine the whole devolution question and to report to the House. The Liberals also supported the Bill.

The Speaker's action in declining to accept closure of the motion in order to enable a division to be taken evoked an uproar from the Labour Members who angrily contested the fairness of the decision. The Speaker was finally obliged to adjourn the House.—Reuter.

BRITAIN'S HOUSING POLICY

A Government Subsidy and Rentals Based on Pre-War Rates

London, May 15.

An important item in the Government's housing policy is contained in a Ministry of Health circular to the local authorities, announcing that an agreement was reached at the recent housing conference, providing for a subsidy of £13. 10s. annually for each house for a period of 40 years, the Government providing two-thirds and the local authorities the remaining third. It is also stipulated that the rentals shall equal those before the war.—Reuter.

THE UNSEATING OF Mr. FRANK GRAY, M.P.

An Honourable Acquittal: Election Agent Found Guilty of Fraud

London, May 14.

In regard to the unseating of Mr. Frank Gray, M.P., (Liberal), on the ground that his election expenses exceeded the amount allowed, the judges found that Mr. Gray's election agent, Mr. Johnstone, was guilty of fraud and perjury. Mr. Gray had done much that was foolish and reprehensible, but not corrupt or dishonest and should be honourably acquitted.

Mr. Johnstone and others were granted certificates of indemnity under the Corrupt Practices Act.—Reuter.

QUEEN ALEXANDRA'S HEALTH

London, May 11.

It is officially announced that Queen Alexandra's health continues satisfactory, but, in order to avoid unnecessary fatigue, it has been decided that it would be better that she should not take personal part in the public celebrations of Alexandra Day on June 25, nor has a date been fixed for her return to London.—Reuter.

BRITISH AIRSHIP SERVICE

Burney Scheme Rejected but Government Willing to Encourage Enterprise

London, May 14.

In the House of Commons to-day the Prime Minister, Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, announced that the Government had rejected the Airship Guarantee Company's scheme of Imperial airships, commonly known as the Burney Scheme, because it would create a virtual monopoly and contain features objectionable on financial and technical grounds. The Government, nevertheless, were of opinion that it was essential to carry out as soon as possible a constructive programme of airship development. It was proposed to authorize the Air Ministry to initiate forthwith a comprehensive programme of lighter than air research and experiment, including full-scale experiments with an existing airship, and to undertake the construction of a new airship with a capacity of 5,000,000 cubic feet and also the construction of terminal intermediate bases overseas to enable these two ships safely to operate between England and India. At the same time the Air Ministry would give the Airship Guarantee Company the first offer of a contract to construct a second airship for commercial purposes.

The contract would include a clause permitting the constructors to re-purchase the ship from the Air Ministry at a reduced figure on the completion of satisfactory trials provided that it should be operated in connexion with an approved British commercial airship service and that it should be available for use by the State.

The existing airship stations at Cardington and Pulham would remain State property instead of passing into private hands, while the ownership of the new base would also be vested in the State.

Expenditure of £1,200,000

A three years' programme only would be authorized in the first instance and it was estimated that the net expenditure for the three years would not exceed £1,200,000. A supplementary estimate in this connexion would shortly be submitted to the House.

In reply to a question, the Premier refused to state where the overseas base for airships would be situated, as it was not in the public interest.—Reuter.

"DERATIZATION" THE NEW WORD

Shipowners' Objection to Having to Smoke out Rats at £50 Apiece

London, May 14.

A new word, "deratization," was mentioned at the resumption of the International Shipping Conference to-day and was explained as the fumigation of ships every six months with the object of killing rats. The discussion showed that deratization was unpopular among shipowners, often working out at £50 per rat. It was asserted that it had cost one ship £467 to kill one rat. A committee was appointed to consider the whole question of sanitation.

The Conference passed a resolution urging the abolition of policies or acts of flag discrimination, which impeded the free flow of international commerce.

A discussion of port facilities, which chiefly concerned delays in British ports, ended in the adoption of a resolution urging maritime nations to do their utmost to secure that seaports should keep pace with the modern requirements of trade.—Reuter.

Landing Stages Unsatisfactory in the Kuriles

Colonel Broome, who has arrived here from Hakodate, where the Canadian trawler Thiepval arrived on Tuesday from Hitokappu Bay, in an interview, declared that he was pessimistic regarding the success of the world flights in the neighbourhood of the Kuriles unless the present selected landing-places were changed. Bettobu; Kashiwabara and Hitokappu Bays were all unsatisfactory because they were exposed and dangerous.

AMERICA AND NAVAL DISARMAMENT

Comparison of Strength of Ships of Naval Powers: Strategic Naval Bases

Washington, May 11.

Mr. Theodore Roosevelt, the Assistant Secretary of the Navy, in a report to the Chairman of the House of Representatives Naval Affairs Committee, agrees with the suggestion, made during the controversy proceeding here, that a fair comparison of the fighting strength of the British, American and Japanese Navies is represented by the figures 5: 4: 3, instead of 5: 5: 3 as provided in the Washington Naval Treaty. These figures did not take into account strategically located naval bases, nor the relative strength of the various merchant marines.

Mr. Roosevelt refers approvingly to the Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Wilbur's recommendations in his last annual report for the complete modernization of American battleships at a cost of $30,000,000, and also to the fact that Congress has been asked to authorize the modernization of six coal-running battleships and the construction of eight 10,000-ton light cruisers. He says that the Navy is in good shape, except for these deficiencies.—Reuter's American Service.

Japanese Press Views as to Further Conference.

Tokio, May 5.

Reports of the views expressed in America and Great Britain on the question of calling a conference for the further limitation of naval armaments find an echo in the Japanese press, which, however, urges that each nation taking part in such a conference must insist on retaining that standard of naval and air equipment constituting the minimum strength essential for self-defence and protection.

The "Kokumin" holds that the Washington Conference failed to find favour in France, because the plan proposed for the restriction of auxiliary vessels disregarded France's ideas as to her essential defence needs. Any similar conference, says the paper, is bound to fail, if that principle is slighted.

The "Asahi" attributes to the naval authorities the statement that a second conference to complete the work begun at Washington is both welcome and necessary, though they are reported as rather sceptical about tangible results in the present complications on the continent of Europe. The journal claims to have learnt that preliminary investigations into the scope of such a conference and the basis of Japan's participation are already in hand.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

OIL RING'S DEAL WITH SOVIET

Attempt to Acquire Monopoly over Russian Oil-fields: Two Agreements

Paris, May 9.

Additional details of the agreements of the Royal Dutch, Shell and Standard Old Companies for the acquisition of oil concessions in Russia show that the first agreement, relating to the division of the markets of the world, also included naphtha and by-products of naphtha already purchased or which the Royal Dutch had arranged to purchase in the course of the year from the Soviet Government, either directly by the Anglo-Dutch organization or by the two organizations.

With regard to the second agreement, relating to the concession of oil enterprises in Russia, the Standard Oil acted on behalf of Nobel Brothers as Nobel Brothers controlled 35 to 40 per cent. of the production of Baku before the revolution. It is believed that division of concessions and exportation was made on that basis.

It is reported that one condition of future concessions is that the concessionaires shall pay the Soviets £25,000,000, and also undertake to indemnify the former proprietors or come to an arrangement with them. The success of the arrangement is considered doubtful as many of the Communist leaders in Moscow are opposed to it.—Reuter.

London, May 11.

Sir James Craig, the North Ireland Premier, in an interview on the Irish boundary question, declared that the only course open was to drop the whole idea of a Commission, which aims at an arbitrary settlement that would only lead straight to serious troubles, and aim instead at a settlement by mutual agreement between the two Governments concerned on the principle of give and take, which would leave no grievance or bitterness behind and would command the assent of the peoples and of the two Parliaments. SATURDAY'S TELEGRAMS

THE ANGLO-SOVIET CONFERENCE

Claims of British Subjects in Russia Discussed: a Divergence of Opinion

London, May 15.

The communiqué regarding to-day's plenary meeting of the Anglo-Soviet Conference states that the British have excluded from the scope of the Conference peace treaties to which other countries are co-signatories unless the latter are consulted.

Questions were discussed concerning claims by British subjects in Russia since the Revolution and inter-Governmental claims, on which divergence of opinion resulted.

The Conference adjourned to afford the Soviet delegates an opportunity of studying the British proposals and will meet again on May (? 22).—Reuter.

Moscow, May 15.

Russian imports during April were valued at 31,000,000 gold roubles and exports at 12,000,000.

M. Kameneff, at a Communist Party conference, anticipated a favourable issue of the Anglo-Soviet Conference. In such a case, if credits were given, part of Russia's orders might be placed in England. He stated that private capital in South Russia governed 83 per cent. of the retail trade and 50 per cent. of the wholesale. This percentage was too large. The State should be masters in the home markets.—Reuter.

Satisfactory Progress

London, May 16.

Official circles here profess satisfaction with the progress of the Anglo-Soviet negotiations and the hopefulness of a successful outcome, notwithstanding a certain acerbity which, Diplomatic correspondents state, has been apparent several times.

Yesterday's Conference Communiqué reveals a divergence of opinion on the subject of inter-Governmental claims which the British representatives requested should be postponed on account of the technical difficulties of assessment. The Soviet representatives, however, objected on the ground that a postponement would mean shelving the only claims which they had advanced, whereas Great Britain was only shelving part of her claims. The British representatives also formally proposed that compensation be paid to dispossessed British proprietors in Russia, and the Soviet representatives promised to consider the proposal, after pointing out the difficulties of evolving genral formulæ which were complicated by the difference between the British and Soviet social systems.—Reuter.

BUILDING TRADE WAGES

Employers' New Terms: An Immediate Increase and Stabilization Later

London, May 15.

The building trade operatives' executives have decided to submit a ballot embodying the new terms by the employers with a recommendation for their acceptance. The offer of the employers is an immediate increase of a halfpenny per hour until the statutory revision next January, when the employers are willing to stabilize wages at 20 pence per hour for Grade "A" towns, with subsequent reductions of a halfpenny per hour for every leap of 11 points in the Cost of Living Index figure.—Reuter.

THE INQUIRY INTO MINERS' WAGES

Recommendations of Court of Inquiry Agreed upon Provisionally

London, May 15.

The conference of representatives of coal-owners and miners, in accordance with the recommendation of the recent Court of Inquiry, resulted in an agreement to-day on the subject of wages on terms which will be submitted to a conference of the men's delegates on May 29.

Later.

The main provisions of the proposed coal agreement allow for standard profits to consist of 15 per cent. of the standard wages instead of 17 per cent. as at present. The minimum rate of wages would be increased to 33½ per cent. and the division of surplus profits would be 88 per cent. to wages and 12 per cent. to profits. No able-bodied adult's wages would fall below 40 per cent. of the lowest-paid class day wage of the workmen in the particular district.—Reuter.

Allahabad, May 16.

Squadron-Leader MacLaren left here at daybreak to-day for Calcutta. He was unable to start yesterday owing to sand and water, which had accumulated during storms, choking the jets of his engine.

Squadron-Leader MacLaren proposes to halt until Wednesday in Calcutta, where the Vulture will be overhauled and a new low-compression engine fitted.—Reuter.

Tokio, May 16.

Reuter's correspondent at Paramushiru in a message, dated May 14, says that hopes are entertained that the American flyers will jump off from Attu on Thursday as the weather is ideal. The destroyer Ford, which returned on May 12, has wirelessed daily to the flyers urging immediate departure. The answer from Attu is to the effect that the weather is still unfavourable.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Rome, May 15.

At the opening of the International Emigration Conference to-day, in the presence of the King, Cabinet Ministers and members of the Diplomatic Corps, the Premier, Signor Mussolini, welcomed the delegates of the 59 States who are attending the Conference. He stressed the necessity of collaboration for the safeguarding of their interests and in order that laws for the protection of emigrants should be inspired by principles of humanity and justice.—Reuter.

STUDY OF SOUND WAVES

Experiment in France by Explosion of Melinite

Paris, May 15.

Ten tons of melinite were exploded at Lacourtine at 7.30 this evening, and provided a "big bang" for which listening posts on the ground and in the air had been established in most countries in Europe with the object of studying the behaviour of sound waves. The experiment, which was made under official international auspices, is a continuation of the test made at Oldebroek in Holland in 1922. Similar explosions have been arranged for Friday and Saturday.—Reuter.

Squadron-Leader maclaren flew from allahabad in six hours.—Reute .

BEWARE OF IMITATIONS

FROM THE FOUR WINDS

THE PILGRIM'S WAY

On Foot Through England

Manchester, April 16.

Patrons living and working in other [illegible] Wembley. With all its wonders, [illegible] monopolise all their time. The greatest of exhibitions pall if they [illegible] renew a flagging zest for either machinery or "Mountain" Railways it is advisable to spend an occasional recuperative week in more normal surroundings. There may be a few returning exiles for whom Home is just England, inasmuch as they lack relatives or friends in the Homeland. They are homeless at Home. How, we have been asked, could these brief sojourners in the motherland best spend those periods when they want a rest from Wembley?

Hotel life, we are told, is much the same in every great civilized city. An evening with Norma Talmadge in Leicester Square can be little different to an evening with Norma Talmadge in a cinema at Calcutta or Shanghai. [illegible] cannot be realized in cinemas, hotels, seaside resorts, or the great business and amusement centres. And despite the clever railway posters to the contrary it cannot be enjoyed from the windows of our railway trains.

The Herd v. Freedom.

There are, of course, the char-à-banc tours. These supply a long felt want, but in most instances it is the want of people in whom the herd instinct is excessively developed. They are an uncongenial method of getting about to men accustomd to standing alone, or to those in whom the sense of freedom and pleasing oneself is well developed. Everything on them is timed to a minute. Personal predilections for any particular spot can only be indulged by abandoning the tour. And the "sights" they visit are in most cases spoilt by ruthless commercial exploitation. Most of these sights boast turnstiles, tickets of admission, and a small army of touts and petty traders. The sights of Great Britain immortalized by her singers and poets are best left unseen by those imaginative people who only know them in the immortality conferred by songs and poems. If the visitor will see them it is best to pick a day for the purpose on which char-à-banc visits are least likely. Even then the disappointed romantic will probably find the storied "ruin" covered with scaffolding, on which a small army of industrious workmen will be busily employed forcing cement into the old stones to "preserve" them for the benefit of the tourists of the future. England can never be seen or felt on a char-à-banc tour. Packed in their swift unwieldy vehicle the tourists run sviftly along the main roads. The flowered hedgerows are thicky coated with dust. The hills, meadows, and villages are seen for a moment and then passed. The only personal contacts are with the, often uncongenial, company on the tour.

Motor and Caravan.

How then, it may be asked, is the home-loving exile to establish [illegible] with a motherland so difficult of approach. We have heard of several men who have attempted to solve the problem by hiring or buying a motor-car and travelling [illegible] just where they [illegible] It has not been an altogether satisfactory solution of the difficulty and it has been a very expensive one. Possession of a car in England, [illegible] a definite social status. The possessor has to pay accordingly. And if with a car it is possible to motor fast on long [illegible] it is still impossible to stray from the road and explore the hundreds of [illegible] that lead to the most ideal [illegible] unless you are a real Englishman.

A couple of [illegible] drawn caravan [illegible] written up as being the ideal [illegible] Its period of popularity was brief and few adventurers tried it twice. Although hotel expenses are saved by those who take their accommodation with them the trouble and worry attached to caravanning ill compensate for the economy. And everyone who essays it acquires a new understanding of the squalor and dirtiness of the compulsory caravan dweller. Shortly afterwards the old canals of the country were discovered by enthusiasts to be more beautiful than its famed lanes. "Bohemians" hired old barges and waxed lyrical over the buttercup strewn meadows on either side of these waterways. The bargee was described as one of nature's unspoilt gentlemen. Imitators found that the eulogists were more concerned with pretty book-making than with truth. The meadows were there, but so were the long noisome tunnels, and for every water lily there were a score of dead cats and dogs.

Shanks's Pony.

The two choices left for the man or woman who wishes to see unspoilt England are cycling and walking. The motor with its dust and speed has spoilt most of the enjoyment of the former. It has also the chief disadvantage of the motor-car. It ties the user to the roads. So there is nothing left but to walk. There is, we may also say, nothing more delightful than to walk, if the walker knows the rules of the game. No country in the world is like England and Wales in one respect. It is criss-crossed in every direction, over hills, meadows, moors, and fields; through farmyards, parks, and sometimes through orchards, with foot-paths over which there are ancient rights of way.

The sophisticated rambler buys at a second hand book-seller one inch to the mile ordinance survey maps of the country over which it is his intention to walk. The thin dotted lines which indicate foot-paths are picked out, and a route planned eliminating all avoidable tramping on the highroads. All footpaths marked on the map are not public. If the dotted line finishes at a farm or house it can usually be assumed that it is private. If it carries on, and eventually runs into a road or another path it may safely be assumed to be public. A rucksack with an extra shirt, collar and pair of socks is all the luggage necessary.

Our Ancient Traditions.

To walk through England on foot is ideally in keeping with our ancient traditions. In the States it may be only the hoboes who trudge it. But in a country where, only last week, three men were tried at the Old Bailey for infringing an Act passed in the regin of Richard 11, the ancient way of getting about involves no loss of face. There is still a Pilgrim's Way in England,—the modern title for a road made by the Romans. And walking has a literature all its own. Borrow immortalized the gipsy-haunted by ways of Britain. Belloc is a eulogist of more modern times.

No rights and privileges in Great Britain are more jealously guarded than that of the "right of way." The Squire may be, and often is, a little god in his village; but let him attempt to curtail in any way the ancient rights of way and his subjects are up in arms at once. The disputed path may not be used once in a year. It may pass through his most jealously guarded plantation or across the prettiest prospect in his park. He may offer the most admirable alternative advantages. In 99 cases out of 100 it is all of no avail. The path is as much the property of the community as the park may be that of the Squire. Britons were always commendably chary of bartering away their birthrights.

A week or two ago the Marquis of Granby closed and built obstructions across a path leading to Haddon Hall, one of the most beautiful mediæval mansions in Derbyshire. The surrounding farmers and villagers, re-inforced by a large part of respectable citizens from the neighbouring township of Bakewell, immediately marched to the spot and with crow bars and pickaxes demolished all the obstructions. They then ceremoniously walked from one end of the path to the other. Such drastic measures in a country where law and order are so respected show how innate the sense of the rights of the wayfarer are. Such incidents are continually happening, but the result is usually the same. In many cases the path is so little used that the only indication of its existence is the slight slope there is in the angle of the grass.

The Ideal Walk.

There remains for the present day pilgrim, the choice of direction and place. The Highlands of Scotland have to be ruled out. The man with the gun is supreme there and rights of way are few and far between. Northumberland and Westmoreland are fine for those who like lake, mountain, and moorland. So is the West Riding of Yorkshire. Derbyshire has delightful dales but they are a trifle over-run with the tourists from the nearby industrial centres. North Wales is also tourist-ridden, and in the summer the passes are almost impassable from the numbers of motor char-à-bancs. The southern countries are delightful for rambling, especially those in the West. But of all parts of England there is none so unspoilt, so essentially English, so out of the way, and so quiety beautiful as Gloucestershire. There are no super "sights" in the county, so it is blessed with a minimum of char-à-bancs. Ruins there are in plenty. The number of churches and abbeys gave rise to the old saying, "as true as God's in Gloucester." Foot-paths there are by the hundred. Every thatched cottage is rose embowered. The ancient sleepy towns dream in the summer sunshine as if time stood still. The much advertised Chester seems garish and "got up" beside the quiet unpretentions antiquity of Tewkesbury and Cirencester. The grey abbey and cathedral towers seem to have grown in the fat black soil. A time before they existed seems almost as incredible as the fact that they will ever cease to be. The inns have a charm unlike the inns anywhere else in England. Prohibition would lose its charm for an executive member of the United Kingdom Alliance if he lived for a week in a good Gloucestershire inn and possessed any historic sense. We commend Gloucestershire to the homeward bound traveller when he is surfeited with the concrete and bright lights of Wembley. Back again in strange lands it will not be the least pleasant memory of his 1924 visit. But let him do it all on foot.

EARLIEST MAN

The Discovery in California

Considerable interest has been aroused among archæologists by the report from California that the skull of a man who lived half a million years ago had been discovered in glacial sands beneath the Pleistocene clay strata. One of the foremost protagonists in the famous discussion that raged over the Piltdown skull remarked to a "Morning Post" representative that it was really not possible to fix the age of the skull to the limits assigned of 250,000 or 500,000 years, and added that many of the skulls previously found in California had proved to be of no real scientific interest.

"It will be noted," he said, "that the report does not bear the name of any recognized man or recognized society, and in such circumstances one is bound to sceptical. Only last year, for instance, a skull was found in Patagonia which excited much interest as a result of the first reports. This, on investigation, proved to be a piece of stone, and the supposedly ancient wall near which it was discovered, when critically examined, was found to be an outcrop of basalt which had been so altered by the weather as to give the appearance of human architecture."

Sir Arthur Keith, the Curator of the Museum of the Royal College of Surgeons, remarked that the statement from Los Angeles had a possibility of being true, but, he added, "of all discoveries of this sort, some 20 in number, that have been made during the last 50 years, not one has proved to be what it was believed to be by the original discoverer. In every case the remains found have been of the Red Indian type, but, despite this, there is a possibility that America will provide remains of ancient man. The deposits of the Ice Age in North America yield unimpeachable evidence of the existence of man who made implements. It is perfectly clear that man dates back to a very ancient period, and that there were human beings in existence long before the Pleistocene Age, and that they were very widely scattered. America at the time was quite accessible, as there were land connexions with it, and that is why there is reason to expect the discovery of ancient human types in that country. Before expressing any definite opinion, however, one must wait for fuller data as regards the discovery announced from Los Angeles."

GERMANY'S REPARATIONS PAYMENTS

A Total of 8,411,339,000 Gold Marks in Cash and Kind: The Manner of Distribution: 470,913,000 Paid Last Year

The customary half-yearly statement recently issued by the Reparations Commission, showing the total amount of payments made by Germany on Reparations account since the Armistice, is chiefly interesting because it furnishes bulk figures that, by comparing them with those issued a year ago, enable one to arrive at the amount that has been received by France and Belgium since the German Government, after the occupation of the Ruhr, refused to continue Reparations payments to those countries. The statement shows that down to December 31 last Germany had made total payments amounting to 8,411,339,000 gold marks in cash (1,903,544,000 gold marks), shipping, cables, State property, and payments in kind, etc. Of this total, however, 2,719,093,000 gold marks remain undistributed or in suspense, and out of the balance of 5,692,246,000 gold marks that has been distributed among the Allies, 2,613,-611,000 gold marks has been utilized for the repayment of the cost of the armies of occupation and the control commissioner (without taking into account the 1,071,805,000 gold marks which is the estimated cost of the United States army of occupation), in repaying the advances made to Germany for purchase of coal after the Armistice and other charges distinct from Reparations.

Out of the amount which has actually been distributed among the Allies, France has received 1,804,192,000 gold marks (143,995,-000 gold marks in cash, 1,358,155,-000 gold marks in kind, and 302,042,000 gold marks in ceded property). Out of this total, however, the amount actually applicable to Reparation payments down to the end of 1923 was only 189,777,000 gold marks, the balance (including the repayment of 1,373,496,000 gold marks in respect of the cost of the army of occupation) having been disposed of in other directions.

How the Allies Have Shared.

The amounts distributed to the various Allied Powers during 1923, if the figures given a year ago be subtracted from those now issued, will be seen to be as follows:—

	Gold Marks.
France	13,389,000
Belgium	12,760,000
Great Britain	168,358,000
Italy	155,138,000
Serbia	111,815,000
Roumania	28,770,000
Czecho-Slovakia	1,963,000
Greece	9,551,000
Poland	415,000
Portugal	10,440,000

The amount actually paid by Germany during the year was 470,913,000 gold marks (of which 462,480,000 gold marks was in kind and the rest in cash). The difference between this total and the total distributed was due to the fact that 37,076,000 gold marks was taken from the accounts previously in suspense. As the cost of the French army of occupation in the Rhineland (exclusive of the Ruhr) in 1923 amounted to 112,495,-000 gold marks, it follows that France during 1923 received from Germany 99,106,000 gold marks less than her expenditure on her army of occupation. The same figures also show that, whereas in the amount received by France down to the end of 1922 there was a balance of 291,031,000 gold marks available for passing to her reparation account, this had been reduced at the end of 1923 to 189,777,000 gold marks. In other words, France had in hand, out of her total receipts from Germany, on December 31, 1923, 101,254,000 gold marks less in actual reparation payments than she held at the end of 1922.

It must not be overlooked that the Franco-Belgian receipts from the Ruhr during the past 12 months have not yet been handed over to the Reparations Commission. The bulk, if not the whole, of these, however, down to the end of 1923 were absorbed by the expense involved in the operations there, although it is stated here that the occupation now shows a steadily increasing balance on the credit side. The 13,389,000 gold marks received by France in reparation payments during 1923 represents payments made from January 1 to 11, when the occupation of the Ruhr began, and from November 23, when passive resistance ceased and the Dusseldorf agreements were signed, down to the end of the year.

FROM THE EARTH TO THE MOON

Prof. Goddard's Scheme for this Summer.

Th American papers just now are devoting much space to the coming attempt of Professor R. H. Goddard to fire a rocket with such initial velocity and directness of aim that it will reach the moon, a distance of rather less than a quarter of million miles.

The Professor, who is a director of the Physics Department at Clark University, Worcester, Massachusetts, has been working at the project for several years, and has the financial back of the famous Smithsonian Institution of Washington. Under the auspices of that organization experiments have been carried out with rockets so devised that after they are fired they are carried to great altitudes by successive discharges of explosives in small combustion chambers, and when the rocket has attained its maximum height a second rocket is discharged at a velocity sufficient to carry it beyond the resisting medium of the earth's atmosphere.

The rocket is made of steel and is shaped like a cigar, with a narrow tapered head. It contains inside "a small internal combustion engine, ignited by smokeless nitro-cellulose, and once free of terrestrial gravitation continuous discharges of the internal apparatus by means of an ingenious reloading mechanism will do the rest."

Provided the rocket obeys the theoretical calculations of its designer, it is expected to hit the moon 36 hours after it begins its flight, and to ensure that it will reach its billet it will be necessary to calculate—not a difficult problem, as the motion of the moon in its orbit is known with refined accuracy—exactly where the moon will be at any time, and range on that part of the heavens.

So that the arrival of the projectile on the moon can be seen it will contain a quantity of Victor flash powder, which will be ignited by the impact, and calculations show that the brilliant light this gives off will need less than 3 lb. to enable the flash to be visible in a 12 in. telescope. The attempt is to be made in the early summer, most probably when the moon is in the crescent phase, so that the flash which will signal the contact of the rocket with our satellite may occur on the dark unilluminated region, and thus increase the prospect of its visibility.

That the project is not so visionary as it seems is evident from the co-operation of the Smithsonian Institution. It has been discussed and approved by the American Association for the Advancement of Science, and, speaking of Professor Goddard's pioneer experiments, the late Sir James Dewar expressed the opinion that the pointed to the possibility of ultimately attaining the necessary high velocity to overcome the earth's gravitation.

NOTIFICATION has been received from London that Mr. A. G. P. Dewing of the Municipal Finance Department, son of the local Police Superintendent, Mr. C. Dewing, has been elected an Associate Member of the Chartered Institute of Secretaries.

INDIAN GOVERNMENT'S TROUBLE IN THE PUNJAB

The Agitation Among the Akalis Reinforced by a Flood of Mendacious Propaganda and Assisted by Indians in High Places

Whatever may be the solution of the Sikh problem in the Punjab, and however unhappy the Punjab authorities may have been in handling the Akali agitation, says the "Pioneer" of India that agitation, under the direction of the Shromani Gurdwara Parbandhak Committee, now declared belatedly an unlawful assembly yet still managing to function in some way or another, has grown into a grave political menace. The outstanding fact in the situation has been the persistence of the propagandists enrolled in support of the Akalis and the difficulty experienced by the Government in coping with the constant stream of mendacity and misrepresentation poured out by the Parbandhak Committee and their offshoots, like the "Akali Sahayak Bureau." The events occurring at Jaito on February 21 were plainly and promptly described by the official reports issued as soon as the necessary information could be collected. The first of those reports published from Delhi on the next day was proved by the later and official inquiry by a Sikh Magistrate to have been extraordinarily and substantially accurate. Yet, on February 29, a 24-page pamphlet issued from Amritsar by the Parbandhak Committee described the "Jaito affair" in the most inflammatory language and made the most disgraceful allegations against the Nabha authorities. The crowd of Akalis in this pamphlet was represented as displaying "calm restraint, cool courage" against "official fury," the casualties inflicted were alleged to be far in excess of the official figures, and the explanation of the discrepancy is given by the infamous suggestion that the authorities secretly disposed of the dead bodies of their Uncontrolled Mendacity.

The Government took such action as was open to them to prevent the circulation of this pamphlet, but it may be assumed that the mischief had been done and once more persistent and uncontrolled mendacity had asserted itself, greatly helped "victims."

by the championship of Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya, who, speaking in the Legislative Assembly, appeared to take for granted the accuracy of what to a man of his intelligence should have been a blatant and obvious fabrication. The methods adopted by the pamphleteer were those of denying point blank the Government's statements without any attempt at detailed disproof, and of making against the Administrator and his officers the wildest accusations unsupported by evidence or probability.

This pamphlet is only one of numerous and constant efforts made by the Akali propagandists to vilify the Government. For the last two or three years this process has been at work, and it is not surprising that it has been so successful in poisoning the minds of a large section of the Sikh community that the Government are faced with a most difficult task in their endeavour to expose the purely revolutionary character which the movement has now assumed. What the outcome will be it is not our intention to discuss at the moment. The Parbandhak Committee are determined to continue sending to Jaito and Bhai Phern as many jathas as they can collect, hoping eventually by filling the Punjab and Nabha gaols to paralyse the Government and so to win a further victory. The recent affair at Nankana Sahib and the events at Jaito on February 21 sufficiently show that at any time this campaign may lead to serious bloodshed; and it may also be assumed that the Governor-designate of the Punjab, when he takes over charge, will devote his earliest attention to the Sikh problem. He is of all men the least likely to permit his term of office to be permanently troubled by the contumacy of a section of the Sikhs who are intolerant alike of the rights of other members of their own community and of the freedom of the greater communities in the Province.

Government Hampered.

The considerations which immediately arise from the apparent success of the Akali propagandists are not merely provincial in their application. Propaganda can be met best of all by counter-propaganda, and when the truth is on the side of the counter-propagandists the result should be certain. The difficulty is that the Government of the Punjab and all other Governments, including the Central Government, have been hampered by the new Constitution in carrying out effective publicity. The ingrained sympathy of many of the elected members of the Legislatures with the Congress exponents of Revolution has come to the aid of the anti-Government propagandists, who, while carrying on a relentless campaign against the Government and expending many lakhs of rupees collected by devious methods, have had the satisfaction of being able to deprive the Government of the power of using the very weapons which they themselves unstintedly and unscrupulously employ. It would be interesting to estimate, were it possible, how much money and how many lives would have been saved had the Government possessed sufficient funds and foresight in 1918 to counter the mischievous anti-Rowlatt Act agitation in the Punjab or in 1921 to prevent the inflammatory speeches of the makers of "Khilafat Kings" in Malabar. As matters stand now the Government, well-meaning and patient, attempts to sweep away a veritable flood of mendacity with a Mrs. Partington's broom. An example just to hand will clinch the point. The Punjab Government on April 8 issued a communiqué categorically denying a statement, made by the Parbandhak Committee in the middle of February, to the effect that the Administrator of Nabha had reduced the financial resources of the dowager-Maharani since the withdrawal of the Maharaja from the State. The facts now affirmed are that, on the contrary, the lady's allowances have been increased. That such a falsehood should circulate for nearly two months without contradiction, especially when contradiction ought to have been forthcoming in 24 hours, is eloquent of the need for an intelligent and well-equipped publicity organization.

In the same journal we read the following:—

Lahore, Apr. 11.

The following Press communiqué is issued:—

In March, 1921, the Punjab Government introduced a Bill to deal with the management of the Sikh Gurdwaras and shrines in the Province, but the Bill encountered considerable opposition, and was ultimately dropped. During the following year several further attempts were made by the Government to frame a measure, but none of them obtained the requisite support. Ultimately, a Bill was passed in November, 1922, but it was not approved by the Sikh members of the Council and has not actually been put into force.

The Government understands that a considerable number of Sikhs would be glad to see an Act passed with the same object, either in amendment of, or in substitution for, the Act of November, 1922. It has for some time past let it be known that it was ready to consider any proposals made to this end, provided that they were reasonable, and would be likely to receive substantial support from the interests concerned. No such draft measure has, however, up to date been put forward for the consideration of the Government.

The Government thinks that in deference to the wishes of so many of the Sikh community a further effort should now be made to ascertain the lines on which a measure for dealing with the gurdwaras might be framed, and, in order to assist the community in the matter, His Excellency the Governor-in-Council has decided to appoint a committee to ascertain the wishes of those considered most competent to advise, and to report as to the principles on which a measure might now be framed for dealing with the administration and management of Sikh gurdwaras and shrines. The Committee will at the same time be asked to report as to the best means of dealing with the question of kirpans. The Committee will be presided over by General Sir William Birdwood, General Officer Commanding-in-Chief in the Northern Command. The names of the other members will be announced shortly. Mr. H. Calvert, I.C.S., M.L.A., will act as Secretary of the Committee.

OUR SCOTTISH LETTER

Why People Vote "Red": Horrors of Glasgow Slums: Cancer Spot of Empire

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Edinburgh, Mar. 26.

Mr. Ramsay Macdonald has been dined by his "brither Scots" in the House of Commons, the function being entirely non-political. The Scottish members representing constituencies in England and Scotland number just under 90, and about two-thirds of them sat down under the chairmanship of Mr. Ian Macpherson to discuss a menu which was so characteristically Scottish in its composition as to be almost a caricature of any meal ever set before a Scottish company. The non-party character of the gathering may be inferred from the fact that its organizers were Sir Wm. Lane-Mitchell, Mr. J. M. Hogge, and Mr. David Kirdwood.

Glasgow: the Cancer of Empire

The 19,000 "ticketed" dwellings of Glasgow and its model lodging-houses for women again come under the lash of Mr. William Bolitho in the "Outlook," and perhaps the strongest sentence in all his powerful articles is the confession that he finds no one to blame for the deplorable state of affairs. Often when I hear people condemning Clydeside for sending a gang of "Reds" to Parliament (I am constantly condemning them myself), I am forced to interject the remark, "You would not wonder at Glasgow sending such men to the House of Commons if you had ever gone through the slums of that city."

Mr. Bolitho made his visit to these slums at night accompanied by an inspector, and he writes, 'Door after door as he knocked was opened by a shirted man, suddenly and softly, as if impelled forward by the overpowering slum smell behind him. It is this smell which is the most oppressive symbol of such lives—choking, nauseating, the smell of corrupt sweat and unnamed filthiness of body.

Regarding the women's common lodging-houses, Mr. Bolitho is reminded of "that deep den inadequately described by Patrick Macgill in 'The Rat Pit.'" "There are," he avers, "dozens of 'rat pits' in Glasgow, where these lone, forlorn women, who have no claims to a home of their own, may come for 9d. a night—beggar-women, rag-pickers, charwomen, the abandoned, the depraved."

Then comes the astounding fact that Mr. Bolitho finds no one to blame for the distressing state of affairs. "As the cancer of Glasgow housing in its effects is," he sums up, "widespread, and threatens the whole political system of Britain, so in its causes it is profound and difficult to trace. In a sense no one is to blame. The roots of the sore burrow and twine deep among the very ones of our economic life. There are rich men in Glasgow; new rich and war rich. They have the usual unamiable, uncultured, quite stupid and dull life of their like all over Europe, but they have little to do with the overcrowding of Glasgow. There are no great and grasping slum proprietors to be checked and punished by the public conscience. The 40,000 one-roomed homes of the city are owned by a great number of small landlords, many of them little better off than their tenants."

As Others See Us.

They have still plenty of queer notions about this country, many of those Continental friends of mine. Even the war had not completely succeeded in shattering the notions that had been stored in their minds by years and years of tradition. They are gradually getting clearer on some points regarding "England," but the process of enlightenment is slow, very slow. I don't think they believe any longer, as their fathers firmly believed, that you could spot an Englishman in a crowd by his teeth, just as you would recognize a donkey amongst a lot of ponies by his ears. For a long time the Americans were thought to be Englishmen; but now most Continentals can tell the difference at once—an American has better-filled pockets than an Englishman, and wears goggles. Scotland, or Ecosse, I have always noticed, has some sort of romantic associations in the Continental minds. Nevertheless, they think Scotland is a part of England, just as Normandy is a part of France, and the Ruhr a part of Germany. And as a Norman or Breton is a Frenchman, a Scotsman is an Englishman.

Those romantic associations with Scotland remind me of a Continental I lately met. He was a romantically disposed man, and a bit of a poet. I told him something about the "wild men" in the British Parliament, and said that they all came from Scotland. He exclaimed "Ah!"—and added: "The sons of the mountain clans." And I'm sure that when he pensively gazed into space he saw a group of warriors in gorgeous national garments, brandishing some sort of tomahawks in the midst of "phlegmatic" English M.P.'s, and ejaculating the wild and glorious battle cries of their forefathers. For when he was eight or nine he had read of those forefathers in a book by a charming writer for the young called Valters ott.

The Mighty Fallen.

I met young Laidlaw in the street the other day, and we exchanged nods.

Any stranger who chanced to witness the encounter gave it, I am sure, no second thought. It was not, in his eyes, the most commonplace kind of incident—a chance meeting of two of the bowler-hatted, one very young, the other not so young.

But I had been more or less familiar with young Laidlaw in very different circumstances, and our encounter set me thinking. A few months ago, when I saw him last, he was a very great personage, indeed; and though I have referred to my familiarity with him, I should like to make it quite clear that such familiarity was very strongly infused with respect.

For then, he was one of the most important members of his community. He had a position, in the eye of a considerable public, akin to that of a popular matador. His friendship was an honour, even for men like myself, old enough to be his father. His approval and encouragement counted more with his peers than any mere scholastic success. He was one of the stars of a corps d'élite, members of which were distinguished from the envious and respectful by a special head-dress.

In short, a few months ago Laidlaw was captain of his school 1st Fifteen, and now he is in a city office.

No fallen potentate had ever to make the best of a change so disconcerting—or, at least, so it seems to one who remembers the awe with which he used to regard the Rugger Captain in his time, and who knows only too well the insignificance of "the boy" in an office.

I suppose young Laidlaw's duties will include posting the letters at the end of the day, possibly after copying them. He may very likely index the letter-book, when he has been instructed how—for that is the sort of thing schools do not teach. And yet, so short a time ago, the youngster was at the top of a ladder. He had won the position to which belongs the greatest respect paid to any position in a school. Even the masters had to treat him with a hint of deference. I know nothing about his brains, but he has a lot of personality, has grown accustomed to carrying responsibility, making decisions, and representing his ancient school in a larger world—and he is a first-rate three-quarter. And now, suddenly, he finds himself struggling awkwardly on the bottom rung of another ladder, learning how to index a letter book.

The Fighting Marquess.

It was only last year that the Marquess of Douglas and Clydesdale came to light as a boxer, and his active association with the "noble art" has been all for the good of the sport. When he took part in the Scottish Championships last year the Marquess showed little cleverness, but he demonstrated that he possessed plenty of pluck, and his bouts were no milk and water affairs. Though beaten, he was not discouraged, and during the past year he has spent a lot of time improving his attack and defence. He gained his reward in Glasgow when he won the title of Middle-weight Amateur Boxing Champion of Scotland.

His Presbyterian Ancestors.

I do not know whether advocates of Sunday golf may use Mr. J. E. Lawler's experience as a proof that the Fates support the Sabbath round, but there is something almost supernatural about that player's performance at Wembley. For two successive Sundays Mr. Lawler has gone out with a 13 handicap, and has on each occasion holed out at the second hole (155 yards) in one stroke. I am reminded by this of a Sunday golf episode in my own experience. I was playing with a friend on Muirfield one Sunday some years ago. He was playing very badly, and I ventured to suggest to him that such was the case. "Badly! I should think so; but what is a man to do when every time he swings a club ten generations of Presbyterian ancestors keep shouting inside him, 'You've no right to be doing this. You've no right to be doing this?'"

Ancient and the Modern.

Tradition and innovation clashed to a remarkable degree in an experience I had a short time ago. I had reached Tibbie Shiels's ancient hostelry after a walk in drenching rain round St. Mary's Loch, and Tibbie's hospitable successor made me at home beside a roaring fire in the old kitchen, which has hardly changed since Scott and Hogg used to foregather in it. My hostess commented on this fact with pardonable pride, and showed me the relics which are always produced to visitors. She informed me that I was sitting in what had always been Sir Walter's favourite seat. Then, in almost the same breath and with hardly as much as a "by the way," she invited my opinion as to whether in that lonely wind-swept place they would be able to reach the Glasgow wireless station on a crystal set!

Another Dig at Aberdeen.

The listening-in joke that wins a prize in a London weekly's wireless postcard competition at the week-end is an Aberdeen wheeze again. An Edinburgh man tells the joke—and by the way, lifts the two-guineas prize. Here is the joke:—"On the day Aberdeen Station opened a man in Edinburgh tried to pick up its call, but for a long time was unsuccessful. He thought for a moment; then rustled a £1 note at the headphones! Aberdeen came through immediately. He never has difficulty now, for Aberdeen is still calling."

TRAGEDY OF A FAMOUS SONG

"With the death of Mrs. Harriet Danks in a Brooklyn boarding house the beautiful prophecy in 'Silver Threads among the Gold' remained unfulfilled for the woman who inspired it," says the "Telegraph's" New York correspondent.

"Mr. Hart Pease Danks, a young musician and singer, composed to his wife in 1874 one of the tenderest love songs of the ages, but when prosperity came to the young couple as a result, domestic unhappiness came with it.

"Danks and his wife parted, and twenty-one years ago he was found dead in a Philadelphia boarding-house kneeling beside his bed. On an old copy of his famous song he had written: 'It is hard to grow old alone.'

"Last week Mrs. Danks, who was 82 years old, died alone in similar circumstances after years of unhappiness that so strangely followed the writing of the song. For years there has been litigation over the distribution of the royalties, and the two surviving children are even now estranged."

THE CONDITIONS OF IMMORTALITY

Sermon Preached by the Rev. A. N. Rowland in Union Church, Shanghai, on April 30, 1924

"If thou wouldst enter into life keep the commandments."
Matt. 19.17.

On any other lips than those of Christ these words would be regarded as not quite orthodox by those who count themselves the keepers of orthodoxy. Let us then begin with the converse statement that those who fail to keep the commandments are on the road to death. It was in April 12 years ago that the Titanic, that palace on the sea, went down among the icebergs of the Atlantic with 1,500 souls. The tragic loss of so many people, summoned from the enjoyment of grandeur and luxury to negotiate with Death, caused an outcry against the want of justice or of power upon the eternal throne. But what charge can lie against Him whose will is expressed in law when in defiance of the laws of navigation such a course was taken at such a pace? Or take the question of health in this Settlement of Shanghai, how many break down or pass out who should be in the prime of life. The slope that leads to death seems steeper here than in the West; yet the veterans out here all assure us that life can be maintained in strength, if only the simple laws of health are observed.

Tagore on England

And so it is with other types of life, to enter and enjoy it depends upon the keeping of the relevant laws. Take social life for instance, in its various secular forms. In some parts of the earth commercial life flourishes, in the south of Scotland but not the south of Ireland, in the north but not the south of Italy, in the east but not the west of Spain. Why this difference? In the former places the commandments that bear on business are observed—the laws of industry, thrift and honesty, but where these are neglected there are no signs of prosperous commercial life.

Or take human affairs at a higher pointd. There is a standard of public life which is reached and maintained only by a general observance of duty, loyalty and discipline. Dr. Rabindranath Tagore, who gives no blind devotion to Western ideals, has recently declared that he found in England something higher still—a chivalrous life, which is due to the influence of high example and literature, and depends on the fulfilment of laws that are written in the heart rather than the statute book, such as recognition of the day of rest, consideration for the poor, and the honour paid to liberty.

The Touchstone of Social Life

By such obediences a standard of social life is arrived at which provides an education for the growing generation, and it is not surprising that the Bible always lays stress on obedience as the touchstone of the divine society. In the critical years when the Kingdom of Israel was being formed the prophet Samuel uttered the memorable words "to obey is better than sacrifice," and he broke a dynasty because young Saul with all his good qualities failed to meet that searching test. It is one of the standing themes of the Old Testament that the secret of national security and prosperity was the observance of the national laws, and the reason for the disruption of the Kingdom was always traced to the failure to obey. Social life in any satisfying sense of the word can only be entered by keeping the commandments that belong to it.

(2) What is true of social life in general is equally true of Church life. It may exist on other terms as an institution, but so far as it is a life exercising its Christian functions, breathing the Spirit of God, digesting His word and doing His will by the co-operation of all its parts it enters upon it through obedience to those laws of Christ which belong to its constitution. "Bear ye one another's burdens and so fulfil the law of Jesus Christ." "Be renewed in the spirit of your mind." "Subject yourselves to one another in the fear of Christ." "Receive ye one another even as Christ also received you to the glory of God." "Freely ye have received, freely give."

It is when the members of a Church keep the commands of the Lord that His life in them and theirs in Him become real. It is not enough to repeat the ten commandments Sunday by Sunday, nor even to keep them, for after all they only provide for the minimum of social life. There is a new series of commandments in the New Testament, all of them requiring the power of divine love. By fulfilling these laws of its membership a Church shows the signs of its proper life in growth and fruit and fragrance. But if a Church ignores the laws of hospitality, insists on class-distinctions, raises money on un-Christian principles, deserts the opportunities for prayer, it has not life enough to lift a single soul. There is a very subtle study of the average man in Mr. Sinclair Lewis' "Babbitt," of whom he writes "The kernel of his religion was that it was respectable and beneficial to one's business to be seen going to service, that the Church kept the Worst Elements from being still worse." No man can enter into Church life on that level, because he doesn't even attempt the commandments of Christ, because he gives no obedience to the laws of love, forgiveness, humility and service, by which things Christians live.

Long-Winded Existence

(3) By these steps we come to consider a fourth type of life, besides that of the body, the society and the church, namely, Immortality or life in God. We are not to suppose that immortality means a long-winded existence, Methuselah without end. For it is not Death that is the enemy of Life but worldliness. Immortality then is that qualification of life that is given by the secret of Christ and the strength of the Spirit, that enables it to triumph over time and to abide in love. The Old Testment says little about the life beyond in comparison, let us say, with the sacred books of Egypt, but its few prophetic words always focus fellowship with God: "In my flesh I shall see God," "I shall be satisfied when I awake with Thy likeness," "Thou will show me the path of life." This is the climax of human opportunity, and how is it entered, this highest realm of life? Again, by keeping the commandments.

But something of the puzzlement of the young lawyer that questioned Christ settles on us, and we ask "Which commandment?" They seem innumerable, but we may remember that Jesus reduced them all to two in his teaching, and finally turned the two into one by his cross and resurrection. For there is a way to love both God and our fellows which are the highest commandments of all.

By One Man's Disobedience

Faith in Christ is to love both God and man in him. Our response to Christ works itself out first in love to God, who is thus seen with new eye.

"Truly," said John, "our fellowship is with the Father," and that as we have seen is immortality. But it is only complete when we have learned to love our brother also. One of the finest characters in Dostoyevsky's writings gave this answer to one who said he could not love his fellows, "Treat them," he said, "as if they were invalids, or even as if they were children." That is what faith in Christ enables us to do, and thus helps us to keep the commandments by which we enter that immortal life which is fellowship with God.

And if anyone is troubled by the thought that those who never heard of Christ or have never properly understood him are thereby shut out from immortality, is not this the answer? It is acceptable to God and leads to fellowship with Him if a man has tried to keep those two supreme commandments which Christ came to unify and help us to fulfil, for the name of Christ is no magic formula but the inspiration of our obedience to the law of perfect love.

Finally, let us return for a moment to the illustration with which we began. The story of the Titanic tells of the loss of many passengers through one man's disobedience to the laws of navigation, and it is typical of the fruits of a few ever since the transgression in Eden.

May we not conclude that the converse holds equally good, that any man's obedience heals and blesses many others, and shall we not believe that one man's perfect obedience can inspire and reinforce the obedience that we desire to render, and so enable us to enter into life?

HOW MANY KHALIFS?

FROM A CORRESPONDENT.

The Middle Ages of Islam have come again and there are rival Khalifs in the field. Abdul, the Ottoman Khalif, lately expelled from Constantinople by the westernizing Turks, has fled to Switzerland and from that pleasant, safe retreat announces that his sanctity as spiritual head of Islam remains unimpaired. He has lost his temporal power, he has been expelled from the seat of his authority, he has not even a lodgment among the faithful, but in his own opinion he is still the spiritual successor of the Prophet. He asks for an assembly of the Ulema, the divines and jurists of Islam, to confirm him in his office.

It is a forlorn hope. Hussein, King of the Hedjaz, is already proclaimed Khalif by the Moslems of Arabia. He is prince of Mecca and ruler of Medina. These are, above all others, the sacred cities of Islam. Mecca is the birthplace of Mohammed, Medina the city wherein he took refuge when driven from Mecca and whence he marched back to triumph in his native place. Hussein is a member, and chief of the tribe of the Koreysh, to which Mohammed belonged. He is father of Feisul, King of Iraq, and of the Emir Ali, chief of the Arab Kingdom of Transjordania. He too will summon a congress of Ulema, and the Ulema of Arabia will beyond all doubt declare him the true and only Khalif.

Yet a Third.

A third claimant is about to arise in Egypt. The great Moslem University of El Azhar in Cairo contains some of the most learned and subtle of Moslem divines. For many years they have been waiting for the fall of the Ottoman Khalifate. In the reign of the Sultan Abdul Hamid ("Abdul the Damned") it was believed that the jurists of Al Azhar only awaited the death of that Old Man of the Mountains to bring the Khalifate back to Egypt or Arabia. They too declare that they will have their congress, which means that it is their intention to declare King Fuad of Egypt to be the lawful Khalif.

There may be a fourth and even a fifth claimant There have, in times past, been princes in Morocco who declared themselves Khalifs of all the Moslems, and it is significant that the Paris newspapers declare that the proclamation of Hussein was a British trick designed to secure the election of a Khalif who would be under British influence. If the French think it worth while to have a pretender to the Khalifate under their own guidance and control, they can easily secure the proclamation of the Sultan of Morocco, though he would never be accepted outside the north-western part of Africa.

Afghanistan's Claims.

The Amir of Afghanistan is the fifth and last of the probable claimants to the title of the Khalif. If he comes forward, it will be at the instigation of his mother—a devout and fanatical Moslem who, just before the last Afghan attack on India, wrote a letter summoning the world of Islam to a united endeavour against the infidel. The Afghan Amir looks northward to the Moslem tribes of Central Asia and to the many millions of the faith in India. He is a powerful prince already, he stands much nearer to the imaginations of the tribesmen of the Indian and Afghan borderlands than the distant Hussein and the shadowy Fuad, and in his own mind and that of his advisers he may be a better Protector of the Faith, and therefore make a stronger appeal to the faithful than the Moslem Princes of the near and middle East who are always subject to European pressure. After all, in the Amir's view, Hussein, with his sons, is something of a puppet and Fuad of Egypt was but lately a slave and is not yet quite free, while he, the Amir, made war a few years back on England and by his own hand recovered his full independence. So he may reason and think himself better entitled than any man to succeed the Prophet.

Hussein the Favourite.

But there is little doubt that if there could be a genuine world-congress of the doctors and divines of Islam, the vote would go in favour of Hussein. Four hundred years ago the Turkish Sultan Selim overran Egypt and seized the Khalifate from the supine hands of the then holder at Cairo. For 300 years the Khalif had dwelt at Cairo and had been entirely powerless. The Mameluke princes ruled Egypt; the Khalifs were spiritual chiefs only, like Roman pontiffs shorn of the temporal power. Selim made a "deal" with the poor Khalif, who indeed was helpless in his hands, and took over form him not only the title but the "sacred relics" of Islam—the Prophet's mantle, some hairs from his beard and the sword of Omar, the great Khalif who was a close successor of Mohammed. Then Selim took to himself the titles of King of Kings and Lord of Lords, Monarch of the Two Seas, (the Mediterranean and the Red Sea), Protector of the Two Lands (the holy lands of Hedjaz and Syria), Successor of the Apostle of God, Prince of the Faithful and Emperor.

The Moslem jurists who declared that Selim was the true Khalif gave five reasons for their legal "opinion." They said that he had made good his power by the sword and none could take it from him; that he had been declared duly elected by a congress of Turkish and Egyptian Ulema; that the Khalif in Cairo had made over the title to him; that he was the guardian of the sacred cities of Islam; and that he held the relics.

A Great Prince.

If we apply these tests to the existing claimants to the Khalifate, whom do they favour? There is nothing to be said for the Afghan Amir, except that he is a great prince in his own territory. There is nothing to be said for the Turkish Abdul except that he was duly chosen Khalif in his time and that in the history of Islam there have been Khalifs without the power of Kings. There is nothing at all to be said for the Sultan of Morocco, who is not even an independent prince. Fuad of Egypt will be independent soon and Cairo is a great seat of Moslem learning and tradition. But none of these has a really strong claim compared with that of Prince Hussein of Mecca.

When the Ottoman jurists gave their voice in favour of Sultan Selim the Arabian Ulma rejected their five reasons. They insisted that the one indispensable qualification of a Khalif was that he should belong to the sacred tribe of the Prophet, the Koreysh. Hussein alone is thus qualified. He is also the ruler and guardian of Mecca and Medina. The Turkish Sultans always sent a subsidy to the Sheriff of Mecca in order to assert their position as the protector of himself and the sacred cities. Now there is no Turkish Sultan and Hussein alone enjoys the prestige of belonging to the Prophet's tribe and ruling in the Prophet's cities. He is an independent prince and he may yet extend his power in Arabia. None of the claimants possesses the sacred relics, for the Turks retain them in Constantinople, none has a nomination from an earlier Khalif, and none is ruler. But Hussein is unquestionably and alone equipped with the two qualifications which have always counted most in the eyes of all good Moslems.

The French say that the elevation of Hussein would be a British intrigue. They think of him as being under British protection and guidance.

For ourselves, our Government would probably have no objection to a strong Arabian Kingdom ruled by a Khalif at Mecca or at Bagdad, except that it would certainly not make easier the fulfilment of a Zionist Palestine.

HOLLYWOOD AND SHANGHAI

A Study in Respectabilities and Rosy Reputations

In the smaller towns of America, the residents speak in hushed tones of the wickedness of Hollywood, home of the motion picture people. But in the quiet, ultra-respectable homes of Hollywood you may hear of the surpassing wickedness of Shanghai, the port of missing men.

The searcher after wickedness probably will be disappointed as much in the one city as in the other. If such a thing is possible, Hollywood is even more respectable than Shanghai. After all, the night cafes of Shanghai do employ young women to dance with the male guests. In Hollywood, this custom would shock the motion picture people so greatly that they would not be able to "register" properly for weeks. And in Shanghai respectable young women walk along the street or ride in their ricshas or motor cars openly smoking cigarettes. But in Hollywood—dull bourgeois Hollywood—the respectable young women never smoke cigarettes except behind closed doors.

Sombre Society.

Hollywood is a city almost as cosmopolitan as Shanghai. Persons of every nationality foregather there to engage in the serious industry of manufacturing motion pictures. One might suppose that such people would lend an air of gaiety, of joie de vivre. But such is not the case. Hollywood is clothed in sombre soberness. The residents feel that life is real, life is earnest, that each of them has a mission to fulfill. Even the highest salaried picture stars—earning from $500 to $5,000 gold a week—are not tempted into the ways of licentiousness. They put their money into California real estate. Mary Pickford and Douglas Fairbanks own hundreds of acres and many office buildings and hotels. Dozens of actors and actresses build apartment houses to contain the thousands of middle-aged, respectable people who come from all parts of the United States and other countries of the world to live in peaceful Hollywood.

In their cozy homes, set far back in tropical gardens, the motion picture people live their simple life. They have private gymnasiums and swimming pools, which enable them to keep physically fit. Two or three nights a week they entertain a few friends at dinner. Occasionally they attend the theatre—usually a motion picture theatre. When important pictures are given, "world premiers," they turn out in large numbers. The respectable cabarets are all closed by midnight in Hollywood, according to the municipal law. Usually the patrons have gone home before the closing hour.

Not Even Hidden Vice.

Sometimes it is difficult for the newcomer in Hollywood to imagine that a place can be so respectable. He speaks knowingly of the "hidden vice." But after he has lived there a few months, he reluctantly admits that Hollywood has not even hidden vice. Of course there is an occasional lapse from virtue on the part of some resident, as in all other respectable communities. Then the newspapers all over the world trumpet Hollywood's shame. The residents in the little towns devour the scandalous details, turn to each other knowingly, and say, "Ah, what a wicked city is Hollywood." But most of the people in Hollywood do not even read the details of their own scandals. They feel that would not be quite respectable.

Sometimes the people in Hollywood feel that they would like to desert their sober surroundings for a time—and travel to a place which is really wicked—like Shanghai. But how disappointed they would be! They would find Shanghai for the most part quite as respectable as their native city.

SHANGHAI—THE WONDER CITY OF ALL ASIA

Random Jottings of a Wanderer Returned: Marked Changes—Our Sermons in Stones: The City's Cosmopolitanism—Its "Wickedness" and Large-Heartedness: Shanghai—the City of Anomalies

WRITTEN SPECIALLY FOR THE "NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS" BY "SCRUTATOR."

A man has to leave Shanghai and not come back for at least a couple of years before he can know definitely whether he loves or hates this great Wonder City of Asia. This applies equally to the old hand as to the "first agreement" man.

Most of us in China develop the critical faculty, and forget that it is easier to be critical than to be correct. The average Shanghailander is engrossed in his Shanghai—it is his one idea. While he has an undistinguishable desire to sing her praises (for to him to live within her boundaries is a consummation devoutly to be wished), he claims as inherent right to use and he does use a certain prerogative to "knock" Shanghai, entirely unaware that in so doing he is assisting to develop a civic subconsciousness of pessimism. "Yet he would fight to the death, perhaps, were he to meet around the world unkindly criticism of his favourite city by those in whom, by virtue of scant residence in the Muddy Flat, the aforesaid prerogative to criticize is not rightfully reside.

Well, I have been away for a very long time, measured more by the changes that have come upon the face of the dear old city than by actual time: in all it has been 27 months, but quite long enough to have forced upon me certain well-definied physical and physiological changes that have evolved since I sailed gratefully down the river for Home. I have lived in this country, too, for more years than I am going to tell you, and to Shanghai I have given the best of my working days. I am glad, therefore, to comply with the wishes of the Editor of the "North-China Daily News" to set down in these columns some random remarks on the more outstandingly important changes that strike me on my return—as he said, to set them down before Shanghai draws one unto herself again and one loses the power of perception. I claim the right of free speech, because most of me has gone into Shanghai and I am thus part of her. I claim, moreover, to know her fairly well, and as a devotee to the wanderlust whenever practical opportunity offers can compare her with many others of the great cities of the earth.

At once I proclaim her unique—Shanghai, by her essential nature truly cosmopolitan in thought and outlook, the most progressive and the most pro-foreign city of China before which have paled all the ancient glories of Soochow and Hangchow; Shanghai, the most criticized and most maligned, superbly indifferent, light-hearted and large-hearted, never doing things by halves, a city of numberless anomalies, dashingly alluring, sporty and full of "snap," with a record consistent for courage, toiling, enduring, believing and never turning back Shanghai-omnia-juncta in uno.

The Newcomer's Distorted Viewpoint.

It was in the smoke-room of the steamer which brought me to these parts a few days ago that I had confirmed in my mind the effect of the "knocking" to which Shanghai is subjected on the highways of the seas. There were six fellows talking about us—all of them out for the first time. I drifted into the room with a Tientsin man, who, overhearing the conversation, whispered "Here, Shanghai, now's your chance—educate them," But instead I listened.

And what a story.

Trade was bad, had been bad, must remain bad (which, alas, is true); the weather was atrocious (which is not true, when we compare Shanghai with many other places); food was no good and the water was foul; houses were draughty and leaky and deadly to live in; hotels were poor; there were thunderstorms, typhoons, sandstorms, heat waves—whew, hot under the collar, I had to butt in.

Now, the truth is that Shanghai is an extremely decent place, the envy of many other cities, with a very decent climate, relatively speaking. A kindly providence has here directed the steps of kindly souls from all nations of the earth to make up our glorious miscegenation, so that one of our chief attractions is the fact that in Shanghai's settlement you find fellow creatures from far across the seven seas. It is true that the dust of countless millions of China's departed sons and peculiar gardening methods of the native husbandmen have tended to make raw vegetables a somewhat precarious dietary—but we can sing the praises of that felicitous genius who first contrived to place human foods in a tin can. Our water supply is steady, far better than that of more than one city in India and incomparably better than much that is consumed in Southern European countries. Our weather—rarely above a hundred in August and never unbearably cold in January—is preeminently superior to that of New York or Bombay and several other great world cities . . . .And so on.

One could thus put up a very strong case for Shanghai, which, in its inherent make-up, is unquestionably a more attractive city to live in than many places of its size in allegedly more desirable locations on this planet. The difference is that we have not yet learned the art of "boosting." Shanghailanders are philosophers, however. What they lose on the swings, they recover on the roundabouts. The city, moreover, is growing so large and so rapidly that it is not necessary to be socially so landlocked as to fall into line with "olo custom" quite as much as was formerly; and, taken by and large, the drawbacks one feels here are merely incidental and entirely outweighed (in the opinion of the older hands, based on long experience) by many important advantages characteristic of life in Asia.

The Lovely Muddy Huangpu.

Immediately one rounded the bend at Woosung he saw unmistakeable tokens that the industrialization of China is at hand. On both banks of the muddy river were new buildings, wharves and godowns. The harbour seemed to have expanded and shipping seemed to have gone further and further down to points which a few years ago were reckoned quite outside the limits. Huge ocean liners—the President boats, the Canadian Pacific, the P. & O. and others—now all berth alongside, and one could see the flags of all the nations of the world that count today. Native craft seemed also to have multiplied in number as they feverishly made tedious haste with their burthen of merchandise from the factories of the greater peoples of the earth. And how they missed just by a shave as they dodged the nose of the vessel, the "old man" the while fuming with rage and blasting his whistle in wrath.

. . .But why describe? Shanghai readers know the river, more fascinating than all the rivers of the world, excepting possibly the Hoogli—if they do not they should. And overseas readers must really come, like I have, to see for themselves. The fascination is for him who has long not heard the chant of the Chinese river music. As I watched it all I was held spellbound and did more furious thinking upon the future of this vast people than I would do in 12 months of regular residence here. I realized in an instant that, despite internal unrest and political dissension—even perhaps because of it, one may argue, if one takes long views—the tremendous commercial possibilities inherent to Shanghai's geographical position are being realized day by day, and destine her for a higher position in history.

And then the Bund came into full view.

If you have not been down the river for two years or more, my lethargic reader, then go. I'll wager there are thousands of ratepayers who have not, and it is to these I am speaking, for I want you to get something of the thrill that I felt. Take a launch, a sampan, anything so that you will get a glimpse of the Bund from about the middle of the river, say, opposite the Old Dock. You will be proud of your city's growth: the scene is an inspiration and a panacea for anyone who has civic paralysis. First that dome. A passenger elbowed me just as I had my field glasses focussed on that dome.

"What's that round roof up there?"

"That, sir, is the Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation, a friendly factor in China—the pillar of finance and the bearer of many burdens."

"Then, what's that tall building slightly below—that new building?"

Truth to tell I didn't know, and the fellow walked away. Mentally I rapidly scanned the Bund as I knew it—the Club, the cable offices, past the Bank, the now departing Custom House, then Kiukiang Road, and then the old North China building, which had disappeared. In a flash—"Hi, you," I cried, "that's the new North China Daily News building." And I watched its great height, with the highest lift service on the Bund, its flat roof (of which I may later say more) almost on a level with the top of the Wayfoong's great round dome. Then as one's eye leisurely took in the Bund: the new Ewo building, opposite to which is the handsome Glen line structure, the new Yokohama Specie Bank, nearing completion and a great ornament, the new Chartered Bank and others—all old, and yet all new and young and full of vigour, standing for that indomitable British enterprise which, more than any other factor in this city, has made Shanghai what it is to-day.

Ashore, changes met one everywhere—the streets were still "up," but they were improved. Street traffic showed distinct improvement, and the new signalling arrangements are as good as I have seen anywhere in America even, which claims to be the master of the world's traffic. The hotels had changed, and changed for the better. The cafes and other places of amusement I have not yet been to, and you will know all about these yourselves, and will know that Shanghai is rich in this sort of thing. In this article I can merely speak of the things that I could not help missing, but later hope to get the atmosphere and write something that may make the average Shanghailander realize that he is a cosmic part of a city that is destined to lead the whole of Asia. Foreigners are living in a place here where their influence is wider in their own circle than it could possibly be anywhere in the world. Successful men here would be successful anywhere, they would be "big" men anywhere. But Shanghai, as the chief entrepot of China, dictating to-day what China does to-morrow, offers to the constructionist a remarkable field for correct endeavour. All men who think what life means, that life is meant for achievement, not only for taking in from others but also for giving out—no matter in what walk of life one may be—have a sphere in which they may turn on the fire of their imagination and accomplish something for themselves and for the world in a manner that would possibly be difficult to them in their "own home town." This is written for the benefit of the six griffins who were discussing Shanghai in the smoke-room, as detailed above.

So is the following paragraph, for the edification also of those who have either forgotten it or never knew it.

A Short Historical Note.

Shanghai as it is known to-day as China's premier treaty port was only opened in 1842. When one is in California, the natives there will tell you, and with rightful pride, that all the prosperity that you see dates from the famous year 1849. And over there they have worked wonders. Well, what Shanghai has done, taking all the many and continuous adverse circumstances into consideration, has been equally remarkable, and the influence of Shanghai upon the lives of hundreds of millions is greater than San Francisco's (I speak of San Francisco as the greatest city on the other side of the Pacific) on the lives of scores of millions. And there is no comparison as to the future. Shanghai was occupied by the British forces on their way to Nanking in 1842, and foreign commerce actually began at the end of the following year. The first area to be occupied for foreign residence was selected by the British authorities, and was bounded on the south by that dirty ditch the Yangkingpang (now the Avenue Edward VII; on the north by the Soochow Creek, which we still have with us, congested to the N-th degree; and on the west by Defence Creek, dug at a mile from the Huangpu, which formed the eastern limit, and foreshore, of the Settlement. In 1849 the French delimited their area and had it extended in 1853, and again a few years ago, so that it now forms a long narrow strip, with little river frontage but ample land space off river between the International Settlement and the Chinese city. (The newcomer should know that this narrow strip of land has increased many times over in monetary value, as it is the playground of the real estate man. But he'll get to know that later on.)

American interests at that time gradually occupied a district north of the Soochow Creek, and this came to be called (without any foundation in legality) the "American Settlement," and was incorporated with the original settlement in 1863. By subsequent extensions the International Settlement has reached its present area and has always had the persistent habit of overflowing its set limits.

But the real Shanghai to-day consists of four areas (a) the Foreign Settlement, (b) the French Concession, (c) the Chinese city, and (d) Pootung. If the Editor's patience survives I hope to give my impressions of this place in subsequent articles, and if you have not learned anything from this one my excuse must be that the fault lies with my friends—when one comes back home they will not let one placidly settle down.

But one word more. Shanghai is not only commercial—she has a soul. At dust on the first evening I landed I walked up the Bund on the way to the Club, and bowed my head in reverence below the War Memorial to those who nobly taught us that.

THE BUND SNAKES IDENTIFIED

Mr. Sowerby Declares They Were Eels: Explanation Found in Old Custom

BY ARTHUR DE C. SOWERBY.

In the "North-China Daily News" of May 12 appears an account of the remarkable appearance of large numbers of snakes and tortoises in the Huangpu along The Bund. Accounts in other papers add frogs to the list of struggling reptiles that the Chinese river-men were catching in dip-nets or "batting" over the head. The author of the note suggests that I should explain whether it is customary for snakes and tortoises to appear in rivers on occasions such as the sailing of popular jockeys for Home. While fully alive to the fact that climatic and other conditions in Shanghai and the Far East generally tend towards the setting up of hallucinations in the minds of people who do not take considerable care of themselves, or who fail to temper their need for constant liquid replenishment and stimulation with a love of aqua pura, one is inclined to agree with the above-mentioned note that the Shanghai Bund, notwithstanding its proximity to clubs, hotels and bars, is not always peopled by "Snarks," "Jubjub Birds," "Bandersnatches," "Slithy Toves," "Jabberwocks" and other fearsome creatures of an over-heated imagination.

Eels, not Snakes

The salamanders that came up the drains were a fact, as also was the alligator on Bubbling Well Road. In the present case, the only mistake made by the observers of the strange phenomenon is that they have mistaken eels for snakes, in which, considering the particular kind of eel involved, they are not greatly to be blamed. The eels were there, as also were the turtles (not tortoises) and the frogs.

When I first heard of the phenomenon; and saw what was going on, I jumped to the conclusion that it was a migration of eels from the sea to their homes in ponds and creeks in the interior, such as happens annually in Europe, when the young eels, or elvers (the latter name being derived from two words, "eel" and "fair," and referring to the enormous swarms of young eels that appear on such occasions) having been carried back to the shore from their birthplace in the depths of the ocean, swarm up the estuaries of rivers for days, often in solid masses, wriggling along in the water close to the banks. The frogs, I thought, might have been there to eat the eels, and the same with the turtles, or terrapins. The only weak spot in the conclusion was that it was the wrong kind of eel that was migrating (?). This led to further inquiries, and the explanation obtained is quite simple so simple that one feels a bit of a duffer for not having thought of it before.

Quaint Chinese Custom

The explanation of the phenomenon is to be found in the Chinese calendar. Last Sunday was the 8th day of the 4th moon, and on that particular day, all over China, the wealthy and those who wish to acquire merit buy large numbers of fish, or other living creatures, which they liberate! And it so happens that the cheapest and most abundant of fish, the most lively and hardest to kill, and therefore the greatest favourite, is the peculiar finless eel known to science as Monopterus javanensis, and it was this eel that was seen in such numbers along the waterfront on Sunday and Monday and mistaken for a snake. Frogs and terrapins also are greatly favoured by the Chinese for thus acquiring merit, because they, too, are cheap, and are not particularly useful as food.

Two years ago I saw this same thing happening at Ku Shan Monastery, near Foochow, on the occasion of the "burning of the heads" of the novitiates. Large crowds of people gathered for this ceremony, and they brought with them buckets full of these eels and frogs, and turned them loose in the great pond of the Monastery.

I am still awaiting the occurrence of a migration of common eels, which must take place here as in Europe, but which it has never been my good fortune to witness.

Later.

When is a Snake not a Snake?

The remarkable phenomenon of snakes, turtles, frogs—and eels—seems to be more interesting than at first suspected. Apparently there were snakes there as well as eels. Far be it from me to deny the "North-China Daily News" representative the right to see snakes when and where and in any quantities he likes. That is his privilege as a resident of long standing in the Far East. But in that case I might suggest that the departure of a well known sportsman did have something to do with the phenomenon.

Joking aside, there is no reason why there should not have been snakes in the Huangpu at that particular hour and place. Probably there were, as the Chinese also liberate snakes in order to acquire merit, though it is hardly a meritorious act, judged by Western ideas. The "North-China Daily News" representative probably saw both eels and snakes, and, clearly recognizing the latter, came to the conclusion that all the wriggling, twisting, squirming creatures were the same. No snake swims with an undulating motion, but with a side to side wriggling, exactly like that of an eel swimming. The only difference is that a snake usually keeps his head slightly above water. When he goes under the water his motions are those of an eel, only more exaggerated and laboured and less rapid.

The particular eel in question is extraordinarily snake-like, and they also reach a large size, though hardly six feet in length. They are of a rich yellow-brown, orange-brown, or olivebrown colour, and are usually covered with vermiculated black markings which enhance their snake-like appearance. They have no fins, the body being cylindrical, and only the tail slightly compressed laterally. Even to their heads do they resemble snakes, and their gill-slights are so well hidden as to be difficult to find. But they have not got forked tongues, and in this I must give place to the "North-China Daily News" representative. If he really saw forked tongues flickering in and out of the mouths of the creatures he saw, the latter must have been snakes. Personally I missed them, only seeing eels: but taking into consideration all the factors of the case, I am inclined to the opinion that some at least of the snakes were of a somewhat spirituous nature!

THE MEETING OF BRITISH AND SOVIET DELEGATES IN LONDON

Mr. MacDonald's Emphasis on Need of Absolute Frankness, Mutual Confidence and Abstention from Propaganda if Conference Is to Serve any Useful End

The following is practically in full the text of the speeches delivered by the Prime Minister and the Russian leader Rakovsky at the opening meeting of the Anglo-Soviet Conference on April 14:—

Mr. Ramsay MacDonald said:—

My first duty is to express to you the satisfaction with which his Majesty's Government welcome your arrival in London for the purpose of cooperating with us in the attempt to place the relations of Russia and Great Britain upon a footing of permanence and stability. I have, as you know, advocated the recognition of your Government during the past few years, and it is therefore a source of personal gratification to me to receive you here to-day. His Majesty's Government have no intention of interfering with your internal affairs, but when a country enters into international relations, and more particularly when these relations involve the mutual confidences which trade demands and upon which it depends, there must be accommodation, and both parties must strive to make it.

This Conference is complementary to the formal act of de jure recognition recorded in Mr. Hodgson's Note of February 2. Our recognition was an unqualified recognition. We have no wish to recede from that position or to avoid any of its consequences. What we said we meant whole-heartedly, and we shall stand by our words. Indeed, the observations contained in the latter part of the Note of February 2, so far from qualifying the effect of the statement by which they are prefaced, were intended to show that we should not be content with a mere paper recognition, but that we wished to make it a real and practical thing, influencing for good the relations of the two communities which we in this room represent.

If de jure recognition is to mean anything at all beyond my seeing M. Rakovsky here informal conference. it must be followed by efforts on both sides to deal in a practical manner with the actual facts of the situation, facts which could not be altered by a stroke of the pen, nor by despatches thrown at each other in hostile tones at a long range, facts which require careful study, a dispassionate exchange of views, reasonable proposals to be reasonably considered and settled by both parties. It is for this settlement that we are assembled, and I venture to suggest straight away the lines upon which, in my view, we can most profitably proceed.

Our first duty will be the liquidation of the past; our second to reach agreement after giving and receiving clear statements upon what, in our several views, are the rights and obligations actually existing as between the two countries; or third to provide, as far as possible, for peaceful and profitable relations in the future. Under the first head the British Delegation will wish, as you have already been informed, to include consideration of inter-Governmental obligations, the claims of British holders of Russian bonds and of British subjects who have had their properties taken away from them or who have otherwise suffered losses owing to events and policy in Russia; the claims of British subjects who have suffered personal injury in Russia, and so on. Detailed proposals in regard to these will be placed before you presently.

Mutual Claims.

I do not wish to anticipate those statements. My present purpose is merely to describe certain classes of subjects in general terms. On your side you have, I understand, a variety of claims of a somewhat similar kind to put forward, and we shall, of course, reciprocate the attention which our own requests will receive at your hands.

Under the second head I class a discussion of the treaties concluded by your predecessors with his Majesty's Government. Since no steps have been taken on either side to determine those, they must be considered as being still binding, or less, parties in view of international law. Some, on examination, will probably be found to be inapplicable to present circumstances; others may be spent; others may conflict in the letter or the spirit with obligations assumed towards other Powers by either party since 1917. Again, I do not wish to anticipate the detailed examination of these matters, but merely to indicate that there are a number of points on which it is very desirable that each party should understand clearly what view of the existing facts the other party holds. We are here to put this mass of living and of dead treaties into orderly shape, to prune out what needs pruning, and put in the way of enforcement those that we agree to keep in existence. This order must be restored by the orderly method of discussion and agreement.

Under the third head comes the substitution of a commercial treaty for the trade agreement and the discussion of articles additional to the usual articles of a commercial treaty, and designed to remove the hindrances which the differences between the constitution and the administration of the Soviet Union and our own Government might otherwise present to the development of economic relations. Here I had better say at the very outset, because if there be any hesitation on this point our negotiations will be in vain, a feeling of mutual security is essential. I am sure there will be no doubt upon this in the minds of either party to this Conference. Unless people know that contractual agreements will be honoured to the last letter they will risk nothing. Upon that all credit, however it is given and whoever gives it, must depend.

Propaganda.

Finally, we shall desire to have a very frank discussion on what has been alluded to in previous correspondence between the two Governments as "propaganda," or "hostile activities," not in order to enter afresh upon incidents which have been the subject of past representations—activities which may well be excused when Governments are in a state of declared or latent hostility—so much as to see whether difficulties of this kind cannot be effectively prevented from recurring under our new relations. We do not question the right of the Union to set up any form of internal government which may seem good to it; but we do maintain that the first essential to friendly and profitable relations between the Union and ourselves is that the Union should reciprocate our attitude in this matter and should desist from countenancing, directly or indirectly, anything that smacks of an attempt to carry on among the people of this country, either at home or abroad, a propaganda which, when internally inspired, may be legitimate, but when controlled, and even financed, from abroad is not legitimate.

It is my duty to make it plain that the people of this country will require more on this head than formal undertakings, and, as you know, I myself have too intimate a knowledge of international movements to be deceived by false distinctions. This will have to be discussed firmly, but I hope in the most amicable spirit, and I also hope settled in the same spirit.

I know the difficulties that lie ahead of us, and I venture to utter a few concluding sentences regarding these difficulties with complete but always friendly frankness, and I hope the Russian delegation will feel entitled and willing to express any observations they may make with equal freedom. That is the only way of understanding each other. It is the way I shall invariably adopt in all my international dealings. No reasonable man can ever be offened at it, and every wise one will see in it a far more friendly approach than in the suave but insincere attitudes of the alternative method.

The ends we profess to serve cannot be attained unless we can get thoroughly to understand each other, and unless we can carry with us the bulk of the responsible opinion—by which I mean the opinion which is able to make its views felt in the two countries represented by each of us. We shall not acquire this understanding, and we shall neither deserve nor receive this measure of support, if we refuse squarely to face our difficulties. If we begin by trying to deceive each other, we shall go on to deceive the peoples we represent and end by deceiving ourselves. In this event we should leave the relations between the two Governments worse than we found them, and our failure will be a warning to other countries, which, though they are not represented here, will subject our proceedings to a very close scrutiny.

Consequence of Failure.

If I state emphatically that this Conference requires the best that we can bring to it, it is because I speak not only as the head of the party in this country which has shown itself most consistently and most whole-heartedly in favour of de jure recognition, but as the head of a Government which is genuinely prepared to show to Russia all the consideration which it properly can, and as the representative of the country which, given the restoration of confidence in Russia's future, is specially able to assist in her economic reconstruction so far as she desires. Our interests are mutual, but if we cannot reach an understanding here and now, frankly, I do not think you will be able to repeat the attempt with this or any other British Government, and I do not see where else you can turn with better prospects.

The past relations between Britain and Russia were not always happy ones. A faraway memony of that is still in the minds of many of our people. I do not wish to revive it. In the course of your revolution you resorted to methods which roused the utmost fears and resentment elsewhere. You thought that these methods were necessary for your main purpose, but, as objectively minded men, you know that you have now to begin to build up again, and that a renewed contact with the outside world—outside, not only as regards national frontiers, but as regards ideas—is necessary. I beg of you, therefore, during the discussions that are before us, to keep one or two things firmly fixed in your minds, and I assure you that, whilst recounting them, I am keenly aware of the corresponding obligations they put upon us.

Different Methods.

Your method of government is not the same as ours. The fundamental points of distinction have been well brought out since you left Moscow, I believe, in a diatribe directed against myself by Zinovieff. I welcome in its proper place the emphasizing of that distinction, because it is true, and because it is of great assistance to me and the Government. But you and I are here on a definite business mission, and we shall be doing a bad day's work if those in Russia who blackguard me, or those in England who do the same to you, influence either of us so that we lose sight of the great opportunities which this Conference gives to enable both our countries to enter into peaceful and helpful political and economic arrangements without interfering with each other's internal affairs.

That is the first thing we both should remember. The second is this. We must base our agreements on something more than smart business bargains. We must have the will to agree. Where injury has been done, we must go to the utmost possible to redress it, so that we can begin with a clean slate. Credit here is not in the banks of Governments, but in the deposits of private indivíduals, and unless we satisfy the mass of our people that we are fair and honest, no agreements can be honoured, and we cannot help each other.

Fulfilment of Promises.

I state emphatically that what contracts we make we shall carry out; what promises we see fit to make we shall keep. But our people and interests must be justly dealt with. Ours is really not a hard people. They are most accommodating when they find a sincere desire on the part of others to be accommodating, and I can promise you that in that spirit our deliberations, will be watched and their results scrutinized.

I trust that you share my optimism regarding the results of our deliberations, for though I see the risks of failure, the consequences of a breakdown are too serious for either of us to be indifferent to them. The world watches our proceedings, and in accordance with our success will it decide not only what its relations to Russia are to be, but also how it is to regard negotiations like these as a means of removing such difficulties and disagreements as now divide us.

You will not expect me to give way upon anything which would be regarded by my countrymen as the paying of an improper price for agreement, and I shall not do it; nor do I expect that of you. But within these limits I am sure we can come to terms. I regard it as an obligation upon his Majesty's Government to leave no expedient untried in their efforts to establish peace upon a basis of justice, security, and confidence, not only where it is easy, but where it is difficult; not only if the attempt can safely and conveniently be made, but even if it involves us in risk and exposes us to criticism. That is why the Government granted you de jure recognition, and why I now have proposed this Conference.

You want political countenance and financial assistance from us I understand. We want neighbourliness and recognition of international obligations. We have taken the first step—and it was a pretty big one. Let us together take the second step and justify the hopes of the many millions who look upon this meeting with so much expectation.

M. RAKOVSKY'S REPLY

The following is a translation of the essential parts of M. Rakovsky's speech in reply to the Prime Minister:—

Allow me to express, in the name of the Delegation of the Soviet Union, the sincere gratitude which we feel for the words of welcome, which you, Mr. Prime Minister, have just addressed to our Delegation on the occasion of the opening of this Conference. At the same time I desire to express our gratitude for the friendly welcome which has been extended to us from the moment of our arrival on British territory I take advantage of this opportunity to reiterate the expressions of solidarity which have been made by the Congress of the Soviets of the Union to the British people in answer to the act of recognition of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics by the British Government.

I am aware of the considerable share which you personally, Mr. Prime Minister, as well as the party which you represent, have taken in this important step in the relations between the two countries, and you will permit me on behalf of the whole Delegation to express our sincere thanks.

The highest governing body of the nations constituting our Union has emphatically declared in its resolution that close co-operation with Great Britain is one of the foremost aims of the Soviet Government

We join whole-heartedly in the hopes expressed by the Prime Minister on this opening of the proceedings of the present Anglo-Soviet Conference.

Taking into consideration the enormous political importance of the present conversations and the great interest with which they are followed by the working masses of the Union, our Government have sent to London a Delegation, which is not only furnished with very wide powers, but has also the full political authority to take on the spot all necessary decisions. The Delegation includes members of the Central Executive Committee and members of its Presidium, representatives of the chief Commissariats, the head of the State Bank, representatives of the various Republics, as well as representatives of all the most important branches of industry and the trade unions, in the person of the President of the All-Russian Central Council of Trade Unions, and the presidents or members of the various central committees of the trade unions.

On behalf of the whole Delegation, which follows in this the instructions of its Government, I declare that we are imbued with the most sincere desire to use all efforts in order to bring this Conference to a successful conclusion.

Russian Readiness.

In the Note which, as representative of the Soviet Union, I had the honour to present to the British Government in reply to their Note on de jure recognition, my Government expressed its readiness to solve amicably all questions of an economic and political nature outstanding between the two countries and to re-examine all treaties which have been concluded in the past between Russia and Great Britain and which have not lost their force.

The object of the Conference will be to find ways and means to solve these questions. To-day, at the opening of the Conference, I consider it my duty to indicate to you the general principles by which the Soviet Delegation will be guided in dealing with the problems before us. In spite of the complexity of these intricate problems, we consider that no insurmountable obstacle is standing in the way of a complete understanding between Great Britain and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

Proceeding to the economic part of our programme, we consider the most important problem and the one to which all the other economic problems should be subordinated to be that of a close collaboration between our two countries in the field of commerce, industry, and finance. The fundamental conditions for this collaboration are in existence: the economic structure of Great Britain and that of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics are mutually complementary. On the one hand, a country possessing the most important industry, finance, and shipping in the world; on the other, a State with a population of 130 millions in possession of enormous potential riches, which requires for its development large quantities of industrial products and credits.

The war, with all its consequences, has made all the more imperative the economic co-operation of the two countries. It has diminished British trade and produced enormous and chronic unemployment involving for the State annually tremendous expenditure of money. We for our part have been ruined by the war to a still greater extent. It is only a minute portion of our territory which has not been the theatre of war or civil war. The remainder of the enormous territory of our Union has been crossed by armies several times and in every direction.

By our common efforts we shall be able, fostering trade relations between our countries and reducing unemployment in England, to find ways which will make it possible for us to restore the more quickly our ruined agriculture and industry.

Debts and Claims.

On our side we are ready to do all we can in order to adjust the economic differences which up to the present have been considered an obstacle to economic and financial co-operation between Great Britain and the Soviet Union. This range of questions includes the question of pre-war debts and private claims. Although with the continuous development of commercial relations between the two countries this question has lost the exceptional importance which was attached to it at Genoa, and at The Hague, we are ready to submit it to detailed discussion, for we believe that if account is taken of the mutual interests of the two countries there is nothing that stands in the way of its solution.

The British Government may also count on our full and sincere good will as regards the political questions which face us. In our opinion, the difficulties which stand in our path can be removed by our common efforts. We have renounced the policy of conquest of the former Tsarist Government; we have annulled the old Tsarist provisions for the partition of Oriental States into spheres of influence. The Soviet Government has no intention of reverting to that policy. It is absolutely excluded by the Socialist constitution of our State, which is based on the absolute equality of nations and the recognition of their right of self-determination.

Other reasons, too, make the return to the old policy an impossibility.

The war has awakened national consciousness in the peoples of the East, and any attempt on our part to obstruct that legitimate consciousness would be not only a crime against our own interests, but also a piece of folly, seeing that in the long run such a policy must inevitably fail. In consequence, in so far as the British and Soviet Governments adopt as a starting point the priciple of respecting the independence and sovereignty of the Oriental States, we shall be free from difficulty in settling all the questions pertaining to the interests of Great Britain and the Soviet Union in the East.

Scope of Conference.

Although the present conversations have for their object questions between Great Britain and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, we believe that the scope of this Conference reaches far beyond the limits of our two countries. The programme sketched out in the Notes of the two Governments, which embraces the question of the revision of treaties signed by Great Britain and the former Government of Russia, thereby covers the fundamental problems of the political life of the whole world.

The working masses of the Union have acclaimed the act of recognition of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics by the British Government, above all, because they saw in it not merely a diplomatic formality, but the expression of the desire of the British nation to work in common with us for the consolidation of universal peace. In this, in our view, consists the enormous historic import of the conversations which are now commencing. Every country, as you have observed yourself, Mr. Prime Minister, is interested in the success of these conversations. The endeavours of the two greatest States in the world to find not only a way to the solution of the questions outstanding and the differences existing between them, but also the means of solving the problems affecting the strengthening of the peace of the world, may become the starting point for a radical change in international relations.

The urgency of the problem of establishing a durable peace is becoming more and more obvious to all nations. Nevertheless, the Government of the Union observes with profound regret that, in spite of the numerous peace treaties signed after the world war, social and national conflicts have never appeared in so acute a form as at the present time. The means employed by Governments to extricate themselves from a situation which is intolerable for the masses of the people in fact result in an aggravation of the antagonisms in question. The assurances commonly given during and after the world war, that it was the last war and that a limit would be set to the development of militarism, have proved illusory. Military estimates continue to swallow the major portion of national revenues; the attention of all Governments continues to be concentrated above all on preparations for war. Never was the human mind so intent on the search for new means of destruction. All experts agree that, in consequence of the present development of military chemistry, military aviation, and naval construction, and the perfecting of artillery, a war, if it should arise, would be more destructive than any recorded in history.

Disarmament.

We consider, therefore, that the question of disarmament should present itself to Governments with perfect clearness and in an absolutely imperative manner. Disarmament must be carried to the furthest possible limits. Although during the last three years our Army has been reduced 12 times, and from 6,000,000, the strength at the beginning of 1921, we have reduced it to 500,000, spread over the immense territory of 20,000,000 square kilometres. The Government of the Soviet Union declares its readiness, provided the other States consent to do likewise, to make further decisive steps towards disarmament. Our Government is ready also to contribute in every way to the universal decrease of naval armaments, subject, however, to certain political guarantees which have already been formulated by our representative at the recent Conference at Rome. At the present moment I confine myself to a statement of the general views of our Government on this question.

We are aware of the great interest shown by the British Government and public opinion in this country in the League of Nations. The Soviet Government do not feel in the same way as is done in England towards the League of Nations as it now exists, but they would be prepared to associate themselves with a plan of international organization which should exclude measures of coercion and reprisal. These can only result in serving the selfish interests of certain of the more powerful States. At the present time the only international organization possible, in our view, would be that into which all the Governments would enter of their own free will and on a footing of perfect equality. We find that, in observing these conditions, the principle of international co-operation should not only not be suppressed, but, on the contrary, that it should be extended. It should, in particular, be extended to Labour legislation.

We consider that the Governments which desire to create the conditions of a stable peace should by common effort eliminate the causes which lead to conflicts among nations.

Treaty of Versailles.

The Soviet Government has repeatedly declared that, according to its profound conviction, the first condition of a stable peace is the revision of the Treaty of Versailles and the other treaties connected with it. These treaties are not only opposed to the elementary interests of all nations, but their application in practice has only led to an accentuation of the struggle among all the nations, and to the ruin of the economic life of the world. Having diminished commerce and destroyed the bases of credit and exchange, they have only served to bring forth economic disorganization and unemployment.

A reorganization of Europe can only be stable if it is based on the will of peoples, and if it takes into account their aspirations for national independence. The Soviet Government, therefore, is prepared to support by common effort and to pursue—perhaps not at one stroke, but by continued diplomatic effort—the policy of revising frontiers on ethnographic principles, applying a plebiscite in all cases in which it should be necessary, as, for example, we suggested at the Vienna Conference in the case of Bessarabia.

It is obvious that we do not believe that the complete abolition of wars is possible unless the social causes which engender them are first abolished. The Soviet Government, guided by the Communist Party, considers that the elimination of war is only possible on condition of a Socialist organization of economic life. We are, however, ready to collaborate in any serious attempt by any Government to diminish the danger of war.

We consider that the difference between the social structures of our two countries need not be an obstacle to their political and economic collaboration. The contrary view, which finds an echo in a certain portion of public opinion in England, is absolutely refuted by the progressive deveopment of Anglo-Soviet commercial relations.

Propaganda.

I consider it my duty, and, above all, after your speech, Mr. Prime Minister, to confirm to-day in my speech that the Soviet Government fully shares the view of the British Government that mutual non-intervention in internal affairs is one of the indispensable conditions for the creation of confidence between the two States. The principle of non-intervention is for us a guarantee against attempts which might be made in another form to make us give up the basis of our Socialist organization—the nationalization of land, the nationalization of large-scale industry, the monopoly of foreign trade—and also to make us renounce our Socialist legislation.

The peoples constituting the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics are determined to hold fast to the conquests of the Revolution—conquests which constitute the raison d'etre of the existence of the Soviet Government, and for which the toiling masses of the entire Union have fought against the coalition between the internal enemy and foreign Governments. With that frankness which must characterize our relations, I must remind you, Mr. Prime Minister, that former British Governments also took part in that foreign intervention in Russia. You yourself and your party, Mr. Prime Minister, stuggled against that intervention, and it need not occasion surprise that the sentiments provoked amongst our working people by that intervention still subsist to a certain degree But we have met here for the purpose of dissipating these sentiments, of creating new relations of confidence, and, by liquidating the past, to banish this residue of distrust, replacing it by the most friendly relations.

Before entering on the labours of our Conference, the Soviet Delegation has thought it desirable to raise in the first instance, with a view to their immediate solution, all political and economic questions which present an equal interest for both countries, and which, by their very nature, need no preliminary detailed investigation. In this way our Conference might in the shortest time yield results which, by strengthening mutual confidence, would facilitate the solution of the more difficult problems.

We are profoundly convinced that the Government of the British people, which has created by unremitting toil the greatest industry in the world, will discover the way to a raprochement, to cooperation, and to a stable peace with the toiling masses of the Union, who, liberated by the Revolution from the yoke of the old régime, are showing an ardent desire for economic progress and cultural development.

Publication of the Macmillan edition of Henry James's novels and stories, in 35 monthly volumes has just been completed, and it is in every way the most perfect edition of Henry James that has been done. Its text is based on what is known as the "New York" edition, and the critical prefaces which were written by James for that edition are retained. However, he omitted from that edition many stories, either because they did not satisfy his later taste, or because he could not find room for them. But in this new English edition every bit of fiction that he ever published in book form is given.

For the first time since the war, the Authors' Club recently held, at the Hotel Cecil, a ladies' dinner. The report of the proceedings moves one to hope that this will henceforward be an annual event. It was a night of brilliant speaking on two of the most fascinating of literary topics: the cultural influences interchanged between this country and France, and the achievement of women in literature. The former topic was introduced by the presence at the banquet of the French Ambassador, the Comte de Saint-Aulaire, who, speaking modestly as "one who regards the temple from without," treated the company to a witty, cultured, and keenly critical discourse on the nature of French intellect and temperament as demonstrated in French literature. It was an extremely subtle piece of literary criticism.

It was Miss Sheila Kaye-Smith who, at the same banquet, spoke most delightfully of the achievement of women in literature. Miss Kaye-Smith is not a warlike feminist; she holds the balance of justice between the sexes very nicely. But she insisted that the women writers of to-day are making as good a show as the men. Her case was that the legend about women writing only from the heart is unjust to the sex, and though she did not mention names, she was certainly entitled to claim that as many women as men write from the head, and that as many men as women write from the heart. If names can be mentioned here, those of May Sinclair, Rose Macaulay, Sheila Kaye-Smith, Edith Wharton, and Dorothy Richardson certainly do not suggest that women are afraid to use brains of a very superior order.

THE NEW BOOK OF BUILDING

By John Henry Lofting, F.R.I.

"The China Architects' & Builders' Compendium." By Messrs. J. T. W. Brooke, A.R.I.B.A., and R. W. Davis. Cloth, fully large quarto. North China Daily News & Herald Ld., Shanghai. Mex. $10.

The need of a comprehensive book of reference for building purposes has long been felt in China, and all architects and surveyors, civil engineers and builders are under a debt of gratitude to Messrs. J. T. W. Brooke, A.R.I.B.A., and R. W. Davis, the editors of "The China Architects and Builders Compendium," the first issue of which is just published by the "North-China Daily News." For they have here provided such a book, which for completeness of information and clarity of setting out and indexing will bear comparison with the best publications of a similar purpose either in England or in the United States of America.

The book is beautifully printed on excellent paper and bound in dark green cloth with the title in gilt gothic letters and (it is gratifying to note) none of the disfiguring advertisements which so often spoil the appearance of such books.

The compilation of this first issue of the Compendium must have entailed a vast amount of patient research, apart from the labour of setting out the information obtained in the connected and comprehensive manner which is the first thing that strikes the reader. The work is divided into four parts, Part I being General Information as to Land, Property and Building; Part II Technical Information and Memoranda for Architects and Engineers; Part III Directory of Architects, Builders and Contractors and Part VI Catalogue of Building Materials, etc. The first part is subdivided into sections giving complete information as to land values and registration, rates, taxes and fees, water, electricity and gas supplies, telephone service, building rules, professional charges and fire insurance. And this not only for Shanghai but also for Hankow, given separately. All the rules and regulations, charges, etc., under these heads, which we have hitherto had to seek at their separate sources, are here collected and set forth in a form excellently adapted to quick and easy reference.

A special feature of this Compendium is that it is designed to be of service and not only to architects, engineers and builders, but to all of the general public who have any concern in property or building. And in this connexion it may be advanced that the title, which is copied from that of the similar British publication, is not quite the happiest possible, in that it gives no indication of the usefulness of the book outside the offices of professional and business men of building avocations. A title which does not suggest so restricted a service would seem to be called for, such as "The China Book of Land and Building," or some such. The matter is probably of no great importance, however. Titles rarely are. And the work will, no doubt, become so well known as to be as ubiquitous as the Hong List. For there is information in it which no firm or individual who has ever had any connexion with land or building should be without, and much of it cannot be obtained from any other source. For instance, the ignorance of the general public of professional charges and practice is often the cause of embarrassment between [illegible] of fees he will charge should [illegible] project be abandoned at specific [illegible] of the architects' work, services which are not covered by the [illegible] etc. The Conditions of Engagement and Scale of Charges issued down by the Royal Institute of British Architects and generally followed by architects practising in China are set forth in this Compendium in detail. A perusal of these will remove much of the misunderstanding prevalent in the lay mind as to the services a building client is entitled to receive from his architect. The conditions with regard to supervision are perhaps as generally misunderstood as any, and it may be well to quote them here:—

(a) That the general supervision which the architect will give to the work is such periodical inspection by him or his deputy as may be necessary to ensure that the work is being carried out in accordance with his design, but constant superintendence of the works does not form part of the duties undertaken by him and is not included for in the Scale of Charges.

(b) That in all cases in which constant superintendence is required a Clerk of Works shall be employed for this purpose. He shall be under the architects' direction and control, but the architect shall not be held responsible for any fraud or negligence on the part of the Clerk of Works.

From (a) it will be seen that the almost daily visits to their works, which most of the foreign architects practising in China are in the habit of making, are in excess of the duties they have undertaken and for which they are being paid. And with regard to condition (b) the special advisability for important works in China of the employment of a Clerk of Works surely does not need to be stressed.

Further, under this heading is given detailed information of Structural Engineers' practice and status and of Building Contracts and Guarantee, and Quantity Surveying, new to China but so necessary to the best interests of building owners, is touched upon.

Part II of the Compendium is subdivided into heads giving information as to local weights and measures, prices of materials, labour, etc., data for estimating costs of building, sewerage of Shanghai, ancient lights, liability for damage to adjoining properties, artesian wells, etc. It is technical information of value to the architect, engineer and builder.

Part III is the list of architects and builders and contractors in Shanghai and Hankow.

Part IV is an exhaustive catalogue of building materials and equipments subdivided into 15 sections and indexed in a manner which makes the looking up of any matter required a simple and quick process.

The Compendium will be issued annually and all the information kept up to date and revised to meet changing conditions, The first issue is such an achievement that we must register the hope that Mr. Brooke and Mr. Davis will long continue to edit it, and that when the time comes for them to give it up their successors may worthily continue the work they have so finely initiated.

CHINESE WHITEWASH

"Village and Town Life in China." By Y. K. Leong and L. K. Tao. (George Allen & Unwin.) 6s.

It is disappointing to find that a book of this kind, which is to be regarded, one gathers from Professor Hobhouse's preface, as an interpretation of China to Europe, concentrates so closely on description of social institutions.

The preponderant importance of the family in the Chinese scheme of things, the intricacies of ancestor worship, the machinery of local government, and so forth, are quite interesting, but they have been thoroughly reported in previous writings. A report is not an interpretation, and one expects something better when two gifted young Chinese, who have taken B.Sc. degrees in Britain, sit down to explain their fellow-countrymen to us. Indeed, the reader who has wandered about in China speedily finds his interest concentrating on the psychology of the authors. Occasionally the Asiatic is frank to a fellow—but never to a European. Always he dissimulates.

Nobody, one hazards, asked Mr. Tao, in his brief chapter on Town Life, to take on such irrelevant issues as concubinage, infanticide and wife-beating. But why, having raked them in, bring and hang and draw, only to admit grudgingly that they do exist (though in the latter case, probably less commonly than in Britain)? Why say that "it may be true of the poorer classes that the girl is never educated" when you know perfectly well that it is true? Why make so misleading a statement as: "The ordinary child lives from his infancy in the atmosphere of education itself?" Why tell British readers that "most complicated is the culinary art in China," when it is simplicity itself by comparison with the cookery of any country in Europe? So automatically does the Asiatic "whitewash" his fellow-country people that it seems hopeless to expect a frank cards-on-the-table sort of book from an indigenous social interpreter east of Roumania.

Hardly anything is told us in this book of the reactions of village or town Chinese to the world at large. How eagerly we should welcome another book in which the authors would report, with conscientious accuracy, a large number of conversations with, and among, Chinese of all social grades on the subject of the white man and his scheme of things. Incidentally it might well be a "world best seller."—"Saturday Westminster."

ENGLISH HISTORY THROUGH GERMAN EYES

"England." By Wilhelm Dibelius. (Stuttgart: Deutsche Verlags-Anstalt.

"England von 1815 bis 1920." By J. Benvenisti. Munich: Wieland-Verlag.)

"England. Nach dem Kriege." By Werner Picht. (Munich: Kösel und Rustet.

It is a far cry from these five volumes to the cruditics of German war-time books about this country. Allowance must be made, of course—on all sides—for propagandist motives and patriotic indignation, but the fact remains that there were then few German writers who were able to express anything like the truth about the English character, or even interpret the facts of English history with a detached mind.

Professor Dibelius himself, in the first of the books named above, acknowledges it, and the chief motive of his book is to remove some of that ignorance which, he asserts, helped Germany to lose the war, or at least helped her to bring it about. For were not Germany's destinies in 1914 presided over by a statesman who never realized, until too late, that England would side with France, and did not German officers refuse to admit possibility of English conscription, until it stared them in the face? And so, in two large volumes, painstaking and admirably documented, he sets out to show his countrymen the true picture of England's modern political development the English party-system, Press, Church, economic life, social classes. A veritable encyclopædia of the subject, leading to the conclusion that the English will-to-supremacy is an age-long instinct and must be reckoned with, even in relation to England's future relations with Germany.

"English policy will work to create a Germany which is capable of life, but which is economically dependent on England, which politically will always remain a true vassal of England and, if necessary, can be used as a passive subject of compensation for English diplomacy."

This is not much better than the glib generalizations about "encirclement" we used to hear from German publicists, but at least the facts that precede it are carefully sifted and fairly presented.

As a piece of historical literature Herr Guttmann's book is much to be preferred to that of Professor Diberlius. The writer was London correspondent of the "Frankfurter Zeitung" before the war, and during his residence here evidently studied our modern history in the original sources with considerable care and understanding. The result is a history, scholarly, yet written with never-flagging vividness, of English domestic politics from the close of the Napoleonic Wars to 1880.

It is [illegible] of Herr Guttmann's [illegible] that no political development [illegible] be discussed, no Ministry's achievements summed-up without [illegible] reader see the most [illegible] connected with it. And [illegible] gives us excellent portraits of Wellington, of George IV., of Peel, of Lord Liverpool, of Cobbett, Daniel O'Connell, above all, of Canning. As text to his book he might have set the sentence of his preface:—

"There must be special powers in the English national character for it to be able to maintain its equilibrium amid the most violent convulsions, and so preserve the existence of the State. For experience shows that every constitution which cannot change itself voluntarily and with energy—lacking the capacity for reform—is destined sooner or later to come to a violent end."

It is in this sense that Herr Guttmann has interpreted this country's history in the era of political reform, and Englishmen may well be grateful to him for his work, not only in enlightening Germany regarding an epoch of English history too much neglected by German historians, but even in contributing to their own knowledge. An English translation of this work would fill a gap in our historical literature, hitherto lacking in a one-volume account of the period of equal conciseness, soundness of knowledge and easiness of style.

Take out the purely social [illegible] ters of Herr Guttmann's work, [illegible] pand them and bring the story down to the present day, and you have Herr Benvenisti's volume. It is a careful, well-arranged [illegible] of English social and industrial development from 1815 onwards, devoting particular attention to the period from 1906 to 1914. The chapters on Ireland are not impartial, but the account of the [illegible] of the Trade Unions, the Co-operative Movement, Chartism, Mr. Lloyd George's social legislation, and the Land Reform agitation are excellent.

Alfred Kerr is really a dramatic critic, and his impressions of New York and London are—well, dramatic impressions. After an enjoyable stay in America, whom he defends hotly against those who say she has no culture, he comes to this country and praises us with as much sincerity if less fervour. For the most part he is superficial in his observatons, but his [illegible] about the decline of port-drinking, the increased vogue of savouries after dinner, the beauties of the Mile End Road, and similar topics, is certainly soothing.

Dr. Picht is a prominent worker in the Settlement movement, and came to this country last year in order to attend a Settlement conference. His book, with its friendly tone, but depressing conclusions regarding the decay of English religion, is an interesting example of the reaction of a well-informed German Anglophil to our post-war society.

LONDON'S DARKEST HOUR

The most remarkable part of Commander Rawlinson's book, "The Defence of London 1915-1918" (Melrose, 7s. 6d.), is the account of the last Zeppelin raid on London on the night of October 19, 1917, when the metropolis was completely at the mercy of seven or nine airships, and so narrowly escaped a very great disaster. Those in charge of the defence of the city that night were aware that this fleet had been built to fly at altitudes which could not be reached by aeroplanes, and that the undersides of the airships had been coated with a certain black paint which rendered them invisible from the glare of a searchlight, even when full in its beam. It was obviously the intention of the enemy to assemble at Watford and to float down wind over London at a high altitude with engines stopped.

The entire Zeppelin fleet, unknowingly, was over the heart of London. The single bomb dropped in Picadilly Circus, which damaged the premises of Messrs. Swan and Edgar, was discharged with the object of inducing the searchlights to uncover, but an order had been issued that they should remain masked and this undoubtedly saved London —

> . . . mercifully the darkness and silence below still remained impenetrable and unbroken. The succeeding minutes were charged with such an anguish of anxiety, and the horror of the awful tragedy which appeared likely to be enacted at any moment was so great, as to cause me an absolute spasm of nervous agony.

A north-easterly wind increasing to a gale sent the fleet away to its doom. With regard to the future defence of our cities against air attack the author says that efficiency can only be attained by unity of control.

SHANGHAI'S "LITTLE THEATRE"

Amateur Chinese Actors in Exotic Drama

BY ELIZABETH PEPYS.

"Lady Windermere's Fan"—written by Oscar Wilde, translated by an enthusiastic young Western-trained student, Mr. Huang, into Chinese, with adaptations such as setting the play in Shanghai, played in Mandarin by Chinese actors, dressed in Chinese costumes, except for the two "returned students" surprisingly introduced into the drama, produced by Mr. Hoh in the large hall of the Vocational Hall of the Kiangsu Educational Association at West Gate last Saturday! Are we dreaming or drunk?

No, ambitious young Chinese students, men and girls, those who have been trained abroad or who are familiar with Western customs, have formed themseves into a dramatic association on the lines of the Little Theatre Movement the world over. Oscar Wilde's play is no more startling than any other transplanted play of Western society life would be. Indeed, the mechanism of Wilde's drama, already belonging to a past period of occidental stagecraft, with its long monologues and familiar complications of plot, is better fitted to this purpose than the modern eliptical play would be. Indeed, we suspected, though our ignorance of Chinese lays us open to contradiction, that the monologues were extended rather than clipped in the Oriental version.

Western Manners and Eastern Clothes

To see Lord and Lady Windermere in ceremonial Chinese costumes in a typical Chinese home, drinking tea in a truly Chinese way is something of a shock. Later in the play to see the Chinese mother instructing her daughter how to discourage the attentions of impecunious, although fascinating, suitors is another strain on credulity. One is consumed with tremendous curiosity to know just how much the play has been modified. The foreigner has the uncanny sensation of seeing the conflict between Eastern and Western civilizations working itself out on the stage. It is also somewhat disquieting to see the Chinese conception of Western culture.

Aside from psychological considerations, however, the play was capitally performed, and the actors seem to be possessed of enthusiasm and intelligence which should carry them far. The movement is another indication of the alert interest shown by talented young Chinese in every form of Western art, another manifestation being the paintings in western style on view to-day in the art exhibition of the China Society of Science and Arts.

THE CUSTOMS-CLOCK

Appalling Waste of Energy

Considerable power is going to waste in Shanghai these days all due to the Customs Clock, and as this clock is not, it is another case of the intangible force called brain producing horse power, B.t.u. or what not. People who for years have looked to the Customs Clock as a special dispensation by which they could set their watches, cannot get used to its absence and scarcely a pedestrian, ricsha rider or tram patron passes without a sidelong glance at the spot where Shanghai's "Big Ben" used to clang out the hours to say nothing of the quarters. The brokers would have preferred eights or twelfths, but clocks are not built like brokers.

But how much power is lost and what could we do with it?

Mathematically Speaking.

Take the head as being 1/16 of the weight of the body and for convenience the body weight at 160 ("Wish it were," says my averdupoisie friend:). The weight moved is 10 lbs, and the distance may be taken as 2 inches upward and 3 inches to the side. The resultant of these two distances is the square root of 13 or 3.606 inches equal to three-tenths of a foot 3.005 ft. lbs. per person.

Now 60,000 people more or less pass the clock tower by the Bund, and Szechuen Road, daily counting four passings per day for the 15,000 odd (some of them extra odd) people who pass that absent clock on their way to and from work. This gives 180,400 footpounds as the daily waste of energy on the part of the passer-by or counting 33,000 ft. lbs. as equal to a horsepower, some 5.6 h.p. is represented. It has been calculated that the rapid worker uses 3,904 ft. lbs. each minute so that this energy represents the work of one man for 46.18 minutes and as it takes about 20 minutes to go by sampan to Pootung, this energy means 2.3 trips across the Huangpu. It would be tough to draw the three-tenths of a trip and get stuck near the naval buoy, but then who wants to go to Pootung anyway?—P. B.

THE AGE OF LUXURY

In Furnishing

"Our tastes in furniture are growing more and more luxurious," said a woman the other day after making a tour of the shops in order to select furniture for the home of a newly married daughter. The gorgeous displays which are the triumph of the window-dresser's art to-day set many of us thinking the same thing.

The sumptuously appointed apartments which are laid out in the windows of the biggest stores show to what lengths of comfort and extravagance we have attained. Possessed of the necessary capital, there is no limit to what we may purchase, and even if we do not own the ready money with which to gratify our desires, at least a new standard of ease is created.

A Backward Glance

Comfort has become a necessity. The desire for it grows with each succeeding generation. A backward glance is sufficient to prove this. The really easy chair, with its excellent springs and endless padding, into which we sink with relief after the fatigue of the day, is the product of our own luxury-loving age. It has only comparatively recently ousted the straight-backed horsehair variety which, in turn, replaced a still less comfortable type. Scarcely 400 years ago our ancestors sat down to dinner on benches and stools, while a chair with wooden seat and arms was the nearest approach to an easy chair. The sofa was the invention of a later age. Compare this with the standard of comfort to-day, and it is then possible to realize in some measure the advance which has been made. The divan smothered with soft cushions, the well-upholstered arm-chairs, floor cushions, and footstools. . . . What would our ancestors have thought of these?

Our Easy Chair

The easy chair has become the most important item of furniture in the home of to-day, and, even in the drawing-room, has superseded the once all-important occasional chair. Nor is it reserved merely for those times when we may legitimately claim a well-earned rest. Modern etiquette does not require us to relinquish the arm-chair except to take our meals. Here we may read, write, or sew in ease. The reading lamp lightens the darkness of the fireside, and now we may take our afternoon tea in the depths of an easy chair without danger of overbalancing cup and saucer, for modern ingenuity has contrived a neat little stand to relieve us of all anxiety. The smoker need no longer even stretch forth his hand to search for an elusive ash-tray, for a special little contrivance may now be fixed to his chair to accommodate the offending ash. These details show the trend of modern furnishing. Greater attention is being paid to creature comforts. What does it mean? Is it the outcome of the more strenuous life we lead in this age of hurry and bustle, or is it, as the pessimists would have us believe, a sign of decadence in a great race which is giving itself up to luxury and ease?

ON MANGOES

"Life and its best fruit."

BY ELIZABETH PEPYS.

This story of the Garden of Eden would be more convincing to many of us had that wariest of Serpents offered Mother Eve a mango. What woman or man either, could be expected to withstand its subtle charm?

Not that we all fell for the mango immediately. It was not a case of gastronomic love at first taste. That strangely alluring flavour; at first repellant at last victorious! We blush to remember that in our crass unappreciative days we dubbed it turpentine-ish.

The joys of the mango are enhanced by the difficulties one has to undergo to secure this incomparable fruit. True, it may rest before you, on your very plate; but O the slips twixt plate and lips. Should any dinner party have progressed but quietly it is certainly to burst into vehemence with the advent of the fruit, which includes mangoes enough to go round the table.

Nine Best Ways to Eat a Mango

To make the denouement perfect there should be at least one guest who has not before eaten a mango. What torrents of advice descend upon his head! His companions almost fight over him in their anxiety that he shall eat it in the proper style. It is impossible for him to evade the trial by saying that he has a congenital antipathy for mangoes or that he promised his mother on her dying bed that he would never touch the fatal fruit. It is forced upon him, along with as many different different recipes for getting the greatest possible amount of mango with the least possible amount of mess. It is conceded that the problem is difficult.

My favoured technique includes a bathing suit and a sizable lake, but as these are seldom available at dinner parties I take my stand with those who peel, or more truly, skin, the mango and then proceed as close to the pit as manners permit. The agonies endured by not being able in good society to fling oneself bodily upon the mango, tooth and claw, as it were, so to speak are excruciating. If all diners suffer in like manner, it should be easy to organize a "Back to Nature" club, with a mango rampant for its insignia.

Fair, Fleeting Vision.

Just as one thinks one has the steadiest of holds upon this elusive fruit it skids from one's plate, sliding across the hostess' beautiful damask tablecloth and into the leading lady's lap! What a moment! These are the incidents which test the soul. Or again, how many forcible expletives have been smothered as a man sees his cherished prize slither from his plate along his trousers, and thence to the floor. There are never any more to console him after such a mishap, either.

I daresay the hostess says "I'll have mangoes of course, and people are so foolish over them that I'll have to have enough to go round, but I hope there'll be enough left for tiffin to-morrow—and anyway I shall save mine for breakfast to-morrow morning, when I can eat it as I please." But naturally everybody takes one, including the hostess herself. All one's resolutions to be cautious, to be firm, to shun the dangerous though luscious morsel and content oneself with the innocuous banana, the safe and sane pomelo are quite forgotten when the irresistable mango comes our way. With all its messiness we love it best.

HOME HUMOURS

As Good as New

Brown: "What did poor old Charlie leave his son?"

Black: "Oh, he left him the capacity for hard work which he himself had inherited from his father. It was quite as good as new. Charlie himself had never used it."

Living on Air

Hobbs: "He makes £2,000 a year as an aviator."

Dobbs: "Fancy. And yet people say you can't live on air."

Stinging

A novelist was arguing with a military man.

"I believe, sir," said the soldier, "in fighting an enemy with his own weapons. That's my opinion, sir."

"Then, tell me," said the novelist, "how long does it take you to sting a wasp?"

Economy

He had bored the fair young thing to tears.

"It costs a great deal more than one would think to become a broadminded, intelligent man of the world," he remarked.

The young thing saw her opportunity, and took it.

"I know it does," she said, "and I don't blame you for saving your money."

Ungallant

Bassett: "Have you ever noticed how ungallant time is?"

Tassett: "No. Why?"

Bassett: "It always tells on a woman."

Chipped

Dick: "Did Steve break his engagement, then?"

Tom: "No, old man, the engagement broke him."

Practice Makes Perfect

Nina: "Elsie says she would rather be dark than fair."

Mina: "Well, she ought to know; she's tried both."

Why?

Bertie: "I didn't get to bed till four o'clock."

Archie: "What for?"

Bertie: "Four a.m., you idiot!"

Coming To

A preacher, wishing to show to his congregation into what depth a prodigal son can sink, gave the following illustration:—

"A lad left home with good intentions, but evidently got into bad company. He eventually had to pawn his overcoat in order to raise money to keep himself. Presently his coat and waistcoat had to go too the same way. Again he needed money, and he was forced to pawn his trousers, and likewise his shirt and vest. Then he came to himself."

His Contribution.

"That cut was caused by her ring," your worship. She struck me in the face with her clenched fist," complained the young husband.

"Where did she get the ring?" questioned the magistrate.

"I gave it to her. It was our engagement ring."

"The prisoner is discharged. That is clearly a case of contributory negligence," returned the magistrate.

Truly Genteel!

"Why, Jane, this is the fourth time I've had to tell you about the finger-bowls. Didn't the last lady you worked for have them on the table?"

"No, madam; her friends always washed their hands before they came."

Taken for Granted.

Algernon: "Last night I dreamt I was married to the most beautiful girl in the world."

Ermyntrude: "Oh, Algie! Were we happy?"

Freezing!

"Yes," said the loquacious young man in the train, "I travel in underwear."

"Dear, dear," said the old gentleman opposite drily, "how very cold that must be in winter!"

Quite Right!

Teacher: "Jimmy, can you tell me what animal attaches itself most to man?"

Jimmy: "The bulldog!"

The Mere Male.

Master: "Jane, you really must get rid of the cobwebs when you're cleaning. I've just taken a huge one off our bedpost, and put it in the fire."

Jane: "Oh, sir, that was madam's new dance frock!"

Apt.

Teacher: "Who can give me a definition of the word appetite?"

Tommy: "When you're eating you're 'appy, and when you've finished you're tight."

FOR YOUTHFUL DANCE FROCKS THE BOUFFANT IS FAVOURED.

THE GARDENER

The gardener does not love to talk,
He makes and keeps the gravel walk,
And when he puts his tools away,
He locks the door and takes the key.
Away behind the currant row
Where no one else but cook may go,
Far in the plots, I see him dig,
Old and serious, brown and big.
He digs the flowers, green, red, and blue,
Nor wishes to be spoken to.
He digs the flowers and cuts the hay,
And never seems to want to play.
Silly gardener! summer goes,
And winter comes with pinching toes,
When in the garden bare and brown
You must lay your barrow down.
Well now, and while the summer stays,
To profit by these garden days
O how much wiser you would be
To play at Indian wars with me!

R. L. Stevenson.

THE MOCKING BIRD

Hear! hear! hear!
Listen! the word
Of the mocking-bird!
Hear! hear! hear!
I will make all clear;
I will let you know
Where the footfalls go
That through the thicket and over
Allure, allure.
How the bird-voice cleaves
Through the weft of leaves
With a leap and a thrill
Like the flash of a weaver's shuttle, swift and sudden and sure!

And lo, he is gone—even while I turn
The wisdom of his runes to learn.
He knows the mystery of the wood,
The secret of the solitude;
But he will not tell, he will not tell,
For all he promises so well.

DAWN AND THE EMPIRE CALLS

WU PEI-FU'S MOVE ON KUOMINGTANG

Preparations for New Campaign this Summer Starting from Fukien

FROM RODNEY GILBERT.

Peking, May 16.

It is an open secret here that a new campaign against the Kuomintang in Kuangtung, under Wu Pei-fu's auspices, will be in full swing before summer. The appointment of General Chou Yin-jen to the Tuchunship of Fukien is a step in preparation. This releases Sun Ch'uan-fang, now commander in chief on the Fukien-Kuangtung border, from his administrative post and puts him in line for the post of Inspector-General of the Liang-kuang—after he has driven out the various Kuomintang armies and their mercenary allies. There have been numerous wild stories in circulation here about the successes of the Anfu General, Chang Chih-pin, in Fukien, but these are discounted here by the Chihli folk and inquirers are assured that Sun Ch'uan-fang will shortly be co-operating with Chen Chiung-ming's forces in Eastern Kuangtung, while Shen Hung-yin will again be moved into the province from the West.

The Doubt about Dr. Sun's Death.

Such prognostications are being made with fresh assurance since the report of Dr. Sun Yat-sen's death has reached here. The Government will probably bestow posthumous honours upon the great revolutionary, if he is really dead, but in the meanwhile no attempt is being made in any circle here to pretend that definite assurances of Dr. Sun's demise will not be the signal for much rejoicing among the militarists and politicians. It is taken for granted that no surviving leader in the Kuomintang could possibly hold Dr. Sun's heterogeneous political following together and that no military man will now be able to assert real authority over the mercenaries of the Yunnanese, Hunanese and other armies. There are many more advocates of Wu Pei-fu's scheme of reunification by force here to-day than there were a week ago.

PEKING DAY BY DAY

Peking, May 13.

Unofficially it is reported that the Cabinet meeting decided to accept Marshal Wu Pei-fu's recommendation for the appointment of Gen. Sun Chuan-fang as Defence Commissioner for the Kuangtung-Fukien border and Gen. Chow Yin-jen as Tuli of Fukien.

The meeting of the Cabinet this morning resolved to accept the resignation of Mr. Chiang Tien-to, Vice-President of the National Conservancy Bureau and Vice-Chairman of the Yangtze Commission. It was decided that Mr. Chang Yao-kuei should succeed Mr. Chiang. The Cabinet meeting also decided to appoint Messrs. Chen En-ho and Chu He-hsiang Counsellors of the Foreign Office, and Mr. Wang Ting-chang Chief of a department of the Waichiaopu.

It was reported by the Vice-Minister of Finance that a petition had been received from the Peking Chinese Chamber of Commerce requesting that the order of the Octroi department regarding non-acceptance of circulating notes should not be enforced. After some discussion on this subject the Cabinet resolved that in future the notes in question should be accepted for payment of ten per cent. of Octroi payments, instead of 20 per cent.

Sino-Japanese Rlwy. Conference.

Peking, May 16.

The Ministry of Communications has appointed Mr. Hy. Hu, the Through Traffic Director, and M. J. Lockart, the Manager of the Railway Clearing House, to represent the Chinese Railways at the Sino-Japanese Railway Conference which will open at Seoul on June 2.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

THE SUPREME COURT OF CHINA

Meeting of the Senate to be Held to Appoint Chief Justice

Peking, May 16.

According to parliamentary circles, Mr. Sun Pao-chi will attend the meeting of the Senate on the 21st instant in connexion with submission to Parliament of the "nomination" of the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court. It appears that the Constitution provides for the submission to Parliament of appointments of Chief Justices as well as Premiers. The present Chief Justice was appointed prior to promulgation of the Constitution, however, and the Senate will be asked to give a ruling on this case.

Although this is not only a comparatively unimportant question, but one that cannot arise again while the present constitution lasts, Parliament is taking it seriously, and seems disposed to make it a test of the Government's readiness to yield on a constitutional issue.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

THE CUSTOMS TARIFF

Peking, May 21.

A meeting of the Diplomatic Body was held to-day at the Dutch Legation, at which, in the first place, views were exchanged regarding the Customs tariff question, but owing to differences of opinion, the Doyen of the Diplomatic Body suggested that the debate on this question be postponed. With regard to China's proposal for the formation of a joint commission, it was agreed that a Note be addressed to the Chinese Government, rejecting the proposal in question on the ground that, inasmuch as the amount of the indemnity in connexion with the Lincheng outrage had been fixed on the basis of the actual state of affairs, it was unnecessary to make any further investigations into the matter.—Eastern News Agency.

ATTEMPT ON DR. KOO'S LIFE

Bomb in Box Left at Minister's House: Servants Injured

LARGE REWARD OFFERED FOR CULPRIT'S ARREST

Peking, May 16.

A dastardly attempt to assassinate Dr. Wellington Koo, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, has occurred.

A messenger left a box at Dr. Koo's residence yesterday evening, refusing to disclose the sender's name, but stating that the box contained articles for Dr. Koo's personal use. The messenger's demeanour aroused no suspicion, but merely curiosity. On receiving a receipt the messenger hastily decamped. The box was not opened until three this afternoon. While it was being opened a bomb exploded inside dangerously injuring three servants. On giving instructions to open the box Dr. Wellington Koo remained in another room, no one entertaining the slightest suspicion of danger. No clue has yet been discovered.—Reuter's Pacific Service

Peking, May 17.

Dr. Wellington Koo's servants are progressing more favourably than was expected. One servant has had both hands amputated, another is semi-conscious and is suffering from severe shock while the third servant has nearly recovered.

The box containing the bomb bore badly written characters, obviously disguised, indicating that it was sent by the Geological Survey Department of the Ministry of Agriculture and that it came originally from Chengchow, Honan, where recently curios were discovered.

Wild speculation is giving rise to sensational rumours in connexion with the outrage for which there appears to be no foundation. The outstanding feature of the incident seems to be absence of motive. Opinion generally inclines to the belief that it was the work of a crank carried away by the recent political propaganda against Dr. Koo. The detectives are confident of arresting the messengers whose name is now known.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Peking, May 17.

The culprit, who has connexion with the bomb outrage at the residence of Dr. Wellington Koo, is still at large. A reward of $23,000 is offered.

Peking, May 18.

President Tsao sent a special messenger yesterday to express sympathy with Dr. Koo over the bomb outrage, and the heads of all the Foreign Legations in Peking either sent letters of sympathy or paid calls on the Minister of Foreign Affairs.

The Chiefs of the Metropolitan Police and Peking Gendarmerie attended the meeting of the Cabinet yesterday to express their views regarding detection of those responsible for the attempt on Dr. Koo's life. It was subsequently announced that the Government would give a reward of $20,000, and the Police and Gendarmerie authorities a further $3,000. for information leading to the arrest and conviction of the principal person connected with the affair.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

LINCHENG CLAIMS

Peking, May 22.

At a meeting of the Diplomatic Corps, yesterday, it was resolved to send to the Chinese Government all available details with regard to personal claims in connexion with the Lincheng outrage.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

U. S. BOXER INDEMNITY

Chinese Senate Not Giving Thanks

[illegible] Peking Correspondent [illegible] Gazette.

Peking, May 15.

The question of sending a telegram to the House of Representatives in Washington expressing thanks for the action of that House regarding remission of the American portion of the Boxer [illegible] pointed out that such action would be premature. He contended that the Chinese Parliament would not be justified in sending such a message until it had received official information from the [illegible] Congress, and that the words [illegible] and the amount [illegible] passed by the American Senate, [illegible] probably [illegible] had been approved by the President.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

BRITAIN AND BOXER INDEMNITY

Bill to be Introduced for Remission of Further Payments

London, May 16.

In the House of Commons to-day Dr. W. A. Chapple, Liberal Member for Dumfries, called attention to the fact that the United States Senate had passed a bill relieving China of further payment of the Boxer Indemnity and donating the proceeds for purposes of education in China. Dr. Chapple asked whether the Premier would now proceed with a similar bill which [illegible] had already [illegible] to introduce.

The Prime Minister, Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, regretted that, in view of exceptional pressure of business, it was at present impossible to fix a definite date for the introduction of the bill, but the Government were anxious to arrange its passage at the earliest possible opportunity. —Reuter.

HOUSE TAX IN PEKING

May 14.

Eighty per cent. of a month's salary has been paid to the Metropolitan Police and the Peking Gendarmerie.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Peking, May 18.

Following the decision reached by the Cabinet recently, Mr. Cheng Keh, Minister of the Interior, sent a petition to the President asking permission for the Ministry to institute the proposed House Tax. Mr. Cheng pointed out that lately there has been no regular fund to draw upon for payment of the Peking Police and Gendarmerie, and that failure to pay the salaries of the men of these two forces has led to serious discontent in their ranks. As these forces are responsible for maintaining peace and order in Peking, the question is one that merits serious attention. A portion of the tax in question would be devoted to paying the police and gendarmerie.

A Chihling mandate gazetted today authorizes the institution of this tax tentatively. It refers to it as a Police Tax, instead of a House Tax as it was first called. It is reported that the Peking Gendarmerie has applied to the Government for permission to institute a shop tax in the four principal suburbs of Peking, the proceeds of the tax to be applied in payment of the salaries of the gendarmerie. This proposal is not connected with the city Police Tax, mentioned above.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

In connexion with the Police tax, a meeting of residents of Peking was held yesterday at the Hsuan Hotel at which Mr. Wan Chun, Member of the House of Representatives, presided. Many influential citizens were present, [illegible] it was resolved [illegible] to know [illegible] the [illegible] of the [illegible] and [illegible] the matter [illegible] should be made a [illegible] Government to pass a [illegible] resolution to the effect that the tax is an unnecessary burden upon the people. Mr. Wan promised to do his best in this respect and expressed the view that the matter should be submitted to Parliament before it is passed.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

CHANG HSUN'S MONARCHY MOVE

[illegible] Who Promised Support Where [illegible]

A Curious Scandal

From Rodney Gilbert.

Peking, May 16.

[illegible] been persistently circulated here for some days about the disposition of the archives of Chang Hsun's monarchy movement, which if unfounded calls for a strong repudiation.

It will be remembered that when Chang Hsun saw that the failure of his restoration movement was certain, he threatened to give out for publication the letters and telegrams of all those who had encouraged him in his movement and had promised him help. The writer remembers seeing this bale of documents the day before Chang was driven into the Legation Quarter by the forces under Tuan Chi-jui, on which occasion Chang Hsun asserted that they contained promises of support from every official and soldier of influence in this country except Tuan Chi-jui and Liang Chi-chao, who had both frankly refused to join him.

The letters were not given to the press at the time but were kept by a Mr. Wan Sheng-shih, chief adviser and secretary to Chang Hsun, who took them with him when he escorted Mrs. Chang and the children into the Quarter during the fighting. Mr. Wan stayed for a short time in the French Hospital where he retained possession of all the documents. He was then moved to the French Legation where the papers were lost. The Chinese have always asserted that the whole set of papers have been in the French Legation files ever since and that copies and translations were long since sent to Paris. The story that is now going the rounds is that the originals were recently sent to Paris. They are said to contain evidence of complicity in the Chang Hsun movement against many prominent Chinese and also a number of letters from prominent Japanese of the same character. General Tanaka is mentioned as one.

The Chinese assume that the evidence contained in these papers is to be held over the heads of both Chinese and Japanese officials in impending negotiations, and are duly indignant about it.

That Wen Sheng-shih lost his papers in the French Legation in 1917 appears to be fact; the rest of the story seems preposterous and the writer is only recounting it because the sole means of checking up on such yarns and of correcting them is through publication.

CHINESE GOVERNMENT AND GERMAN BONDS

Peking, May 13.

It is reported that a slight alteration of the proposed Sino-German agreement is suggested whereby the Germans would present the drawn bonds and coupons for payment and turn over the proceeds to the Chinese instead of the latter receiving the reserve fund direct, as the former plan might lead to some opposition on the part of other bondholders. The liabilities on the German bonds are said to be about $9,000,000. Arrangements would be made regarding the balance of some $6,000,000.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Peking, May 17.

A movement is on foot to bring about a union between the supporters in Parliament of Mr. Sun Hung-yi and the 42nd Club, whose main plank is said to be opposition to the Minister of Finance.

The resolution passed by the House of Representatives regarding German bonds has been forwarded to the Government with the request that the House be kept informed regarding the negotiations.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

PEKING'S GREAT UNPAID

Peking, May 15.

The Cabinet meeting this morning was attended by all the Ministers with the exception of Mr. Wang Ko-ming, the Ministry of Finance being represented by Mr. Su Hsi-ti, Vice-Minister. Mr. Su made a report regarding the recent payment of a portion of the official salaries due.

It is announced in the official report of the meeting that the Ministry of Justice suggested that a second civil department should be added to the Supreme Court, the expenses of which would be attached to those of the Supreme Court for budget purposes. This proposal was approved by the Cabinet.

SOVIET AND C.-E. RAILWAY

Moscow, May 18.

Writing in the "Isvestia," M. Vilianski says that the Manchurian knot can only be cut by China rejecting the last American Note and immediately regulating the question of the Chinese Eastern Railway with the Soviet.—Reuter.

Note.—The American Note in question was presented to the Waichiaopu on May 3. It drew the attention of the Chinese Government to Article 13 of the Washington Treaty, in which the Powers reserve the right to insist on China's responsibility for the performance or non-performance of her obligations towards the foreign stockholders, bondholders and creditors of the Chinese Eastern Railway. The note warns China against entering into any unilateral agreement which would invalidate foreign interests.—Reuter.

RENDITION OF THE MIXED COURT

2½ Per Cent. Panacea for "Non-Administration of Chinese Law" and Other Evils

An interview with the former Minister of Justice, Mr. Tung Kang, on the subject of the Mixed Court's reversion to Chinese control, appeared on Mondy in the "Sinwanpao."

Mr. Tung Kang is reported to have said that the Court must be returned to China in accordance with the decision of the Washington Conference. Further, that in view of the strength of popular opinion, no Government dare offer an extension of the International Settlement in exchange for the Mixed Court. As to the latter, Mr. Kang is said to have suggested that the following "inconveniences" would be remedied by a change of control:—

(1)—In other countries defendants are allowed to speak for themselves or by their legal representatives, but in the Mixed Court only hired lawyers are allowed to argue. Further, charges for legal assistance are so high that poor persons never can afford to employ a lawyer.

(2)—New laws should be promulgated by means of lectures so that the common people can be informed. At present the Mixed Court gives decisions based on the laws of foreign countries as well as Chinese law, and decisions are therefore difficult for the Chinese to understand.

Mr. Ting Kang is said to have revived a proposal which he first made when Minister of Justice, viz., that six Supreme Courts be established. At Shanghai, Tientsin, Canton, and three other places, their cost to be defrayed by the additional 2½ per cent. Customs duty, 5 per cent. of which would amount to $3,000,000. This proposal was passed at a Cabinet meeting, and the Washington Conference was notified, but nothing has yet been done.

Peking, May 21.

With regard to the question of the rendition of the Mixed Court in Shanghai in exchange for the extension of the Settlement, General Ho Feng-lin, Defence Commissioner of Shanghai and Sungkiang, has suggested to the Waichiaopu that the Chinese Government has no need to comply with the Diplomatic Body's demand for the extension of the Settlement, for the rendition of the Mixed Court in Shanghai is in accordance with the Washington Treaty. The Waichiaopu has replied to General Ho Feng-lin, approving the latter's opinion and adding the explanation [illegible] have been made to the Diplomatic Body to the effect that the rendition of the Mixed Court has nothing to do with the question of extending the Settlement [illegible] Shanghai.—Eastern News Agency

THE BEGINNINGS OF A MIXED COURT

Seventeenth Century Englishman's Treatise in Its Bearing on Shanghai To-day

From Rodney Gil[illegible]

Peking, [illegible]

In the year 1688 John [illegible] Esq., collected the ma[illegible] notes of Nathaniel Baco[illegible] and made them into a bool[illegible] with the following title: An Historical and Political Discourse [illegible] the Laws and Government of England. The First Part, is from the first times to the reign of Edward III. The original edition is not available, but in 1739 the [illegible] tion of this scholarly work [illegible] reprinted "for Daniel Browne, at the Black Swan without Temple Bar; and Andrew Miller, at Buckland's head, over-against St. Clement's-Church in the Strand."

The bulk of this book would interest very few people in China in this day and age, but there is one brief chapter in it which is worth reprinting at this particular juncture when the Chinese are having so much to say about the mixed court. In his discussion of franchises recognized by the Saxons, Nathaniel Bacon quotes what is undoubtedly the most ancient precedent for such an institution as the Mixed Court. Chapter 28 of his huge work is as follows:

"Of the second Franchise, called the Marches. Franchises of the place, were such as were limited within precincts of place, and annexed thereto; and of this sort first were those of the borders, of which those are the most ancient which bordered the Britons, now called the Marches of Wales, in which was a peculiar Government, so far as concerned administration of justice; for otherwise the subjects each of them submitted themselves to the service of their own prince. This was therefore, a third, different and mixt Government, agreed upon jointly between the Britons and the Saxons", who after a long and burdensome war (wherein both peoples were well wearied) by degrees became friends, entered Traffick, and into the straitest societies by Marriage. Thus finding the sweetness of peace, they provide against future occasions of strife that might arise in commerce by the justling of two Laws together: and agree in one law, and upon a certain number of Judges elected by common consent, who were to see to the execution of these laws as joint Assessors. From these, as I conceive, arose those which are now called Lord Marchers, and were at the first 12 in number, viz. six Saxons and six Britons. It seemeth this form of Government was first instituted by Etheldred, and by way of prescription or custom, continueth till this day: and as it was the birth of truce, so for the future became both Mother and Nurse of peace between those two peoples, like the twilight between the day and night, until both were brought under one head and by divine providence settled in a lasting way."

* "This agreement between the Britons and Saxons was very much promoted by King Ina."

Those Shanghailanders who fail to see anything interesting in Nathaniel Bacon's involved account of the beginnings of a Mixed Court should at least be amused to note that this musty old barrister of Gray's Inn deliberately capitalizes everything having to do with the Law, Government, Franchises and the like, and puts "divine providence" in lower case.

THE BREAKING POINT

May 19.

A play with the title "See the Conquering Hero Comes" is now running in one of the London theatres and is attracting much attention on account of the unconventional way in which the subject is treated. The "hero" is a normal British youth, healthy, care-free and possessed of quite the average amount of courage and bonhomie. He is sent to the war and becomes a typical soldier. Brave to the point of rashness but cool and clear-headed, he is a credit to his regiment. But the war breaks him and the last scene shows him captured by the Germans and crawling before his captors begging abjectly for his life. This scene has aroused severe criticism. "It is not possible," say the objectors, "that a man of this calibre could descend to such a depth of humiliation." Manhood seems to be degraded in this presentation of its weakness and puisillaninity. Spectators differ according to their idiosyncrasies in appraising the value of the play and the credibility of the hero's collapse and several correspondents have endeavoured to throw light on the problem by recounting experiences of their own. One writer tells how, as a young officer, he was sent to France and, at a base hospital, on the way up to the line, was introduced to a certain major who had performed prodigies of valour before he was incapacitated by a severe wound. Lying on his back the veteran looked thoughtfully at the eager young men who crowded round his cot to hear the advice that his experience might suggest. "Take care of yourselves, boys," he said. "Remember that every man has his breaking-point." They were drafted into the Ypres salient of evil memory and were told of a certain non-commissioned officer who had had to take command in a desperate skirmish a few days previously when all the officers were placed hors de combat. This man had behaved with a Berserker disregard of his life that won for him the astonished admiration of his comrades. The usual morning strafe was proceeding, as they filed into the trenches, and the new recruits, in their ignorance, regarded it as a joke. What was their surprise to see the hero of yesterday sitting on the fire-step with his head in his hands and the tears running down his face. When the officer on duty passed down the trench the broken man said to him, sobbing, "They've got my number, sir; I'm all in": he had reached the breaking-point. He was sent to the rear and, as the narrator was aware, never fought in the front line again.

It is not only in war that there is a breaking-point. The family physician in China could parallel the tale of the broken soldier with many an incident drawn from his own experience. The harassed housewife, under the weather, and plagued by the perversity of incompetent servants is often nearer her breaking-point than her friends suspect. The business man with the care of a large concern resting on his shoulders, carrying responsibility for the capital entrusted to him; perplexed by the uncertainties of exchange and haunted by rumours of a falling market and absconding Chinese buyers is also many times driven near to the perilous edge beyond which lies the breaking-point. These things account for many a breakdown of health and for not a few of the moral lapses that now and then thrust themselves on public attention. It is to be noted that in all these cases it is not so much the intensity of the strain as its persistence that saps the moral fibre. If the tooth would cease aching, if the ship would stop rolling, if the wicked would cease from troubling and let the weary be at rest, the collapse would be avoided; but there is no respite. "To-morrow and to-morrow creeps in this petty pace from day to day" till endurance gives place to despair and the end comes.

In seeking a cure for this weariness the first requisite is to realize that the real trouble is the smallest part of our affliction. It is the foreboding of what may happen that hangs like a black cloud over the mental horizon. The soldier, already referred to, faced real danger with heroic courage, but broke down in the comparative safety of the trenches. He was overcome with apprehension, not by terror. Had he been able to get away from his trouble, for however brief a period, he would have seen it in its real perspective. The cure for pessimism is recreation—the re-creation of mental balance. There was true philosophy in the story of the melancholy king who was told to sleep for one night in the shirt of a happy man and, perhaps, even truer philosophy in the sequel that the happy man when found had no shirt to lend to his majesty. Carlyle said, "No man who has ever wholly laughed can be altogether, irreclaimably, bad." Laugh and grow fat! but how shall we laugh while the clouds hang over us? Well, it is better to be on the turf than under it. Let us get out into God's fresh air. Away to the fields and the flowers, the hills and the sea and we shall see that nature laughs at our puny troubles. If we can once laugh with her, we have escaped the breaking-point.

STORM-CLOUDS IN THE NORTH

May 20,

FROM a Northern source which appears likely to be well informed comes the news to-day that President Tsao Kun, in order to offset divisions in the Chihli party, has offered terms of peace to Marshal Chang Tso-lin. What the divisions may be will be dealt with presently. They are certainly of a serious kind if we may judge by the extremely flattering proposals made to Marshal Chang. They involve, it is true, some nominal admission of the superiority of Peking as the seat of government. But the power which Fengtien has asserted for itself, that it fully retains. The Chinese Eastern Railway is "to return to normal conditions," but all appointments along it are to be made from Mukden. Official posts in the Three Provinces are to be filled by Peking, but only with men recommended by Marshal Chang. The salt revenues are to be paid to the Salt Commissioners, but may be retained by Fengtien if urgently needed. In respect of military districts there is a clear definition of spheres of influence between the Chihli and Fengtien troops under which the latter certainly lose nothing.

Now to return to the divisions in the Chihli party. The outstanding feature to-day in northern indeed in all China, is the swelling political stature of Marshal Wu Pei-fu. In Szechuan, with the overthrow and temporary disappearance of Hsiong Keh-wu and his troops, Marshal Wu's ascendancy appears complete. Eastwards his influence extends through Shantung to support itself on the navy at Tsingtao. To the south, his own man Hsiao Yao-nan is Tuchun of Hupeh while another adherent Chao Heng-ti, who successfully withstood Tan Yen-kai's invasion from Canton last summer, appears to hold Hunan firmly. Six weeks ago we were told from Peking that Marshal Wu was massing troops on the Shensi border, in order to overawe the Tuchun of that province in case he objected to being replaced by one favourable to the Marshal. More recently we have been told by our Sining correspondent that Marshal Wu's influence is also making itself felt in the matter of appointments in Kansu. Of these last two reports we have as yet heard no more, but there does not appear any improbability in them. To-day a message from Mr. Rodney Gilbert says that arrangements are being made for a further attack on the Kuomintang of Kuangtung from Fukien. In Kuangsi General Lu Yung-ting, who is gradually extending his power in the province, is also a friend of Marshal Wu's. Not since the days of President Yuan Shih-kai has there been any system of alliances and spheres of influence so extensive as that which Marshal Wu has gradually contrived. It looks unwieldy. But from a military point of view, all that is necessary to Marshal Wu is that the districts east and south, west and northwest should be kept quiet. He himself is the spearpoint of any operations, holding the great advantage over his foes that he leads his own troops in person.

On March 11 last Mr. Rodney Gilbert wrote from Peking of the growing hostility towards Marshal Wu visible in the Chihli party, "particularly among the palace directorate which is being discomfited by Loyang's inroads upon Shantung"; and he continued:—

> Their most effective but most desperate policy now would be to make peace with Chang Tso-lin and bring him into the fold as an ally against Marshal Wu, and this many Chinese think they will do.
> A Japanese news agency to-day reports that the Fengtien attitude has changed radically and that Chang Tso-lin is now more than ready for an understanding.
> Private reports from Mukden, coming through both foreigners and Chinese, indicate that Chang's detestation of Wu Pei-fu only ripens with age and that he cannot possibly consider an alliance of any sort with the man who made his magnificence ridiculous in Peking.
> The common assumption, therefore, is that, seeing Loyang coming into the ascendancy in so many quarters, he is ready to accept as his allies against Loyang those elements in the Peking Government and in the Chihli party at large which are hostile to Wu, believing that to split the Chihli party effectually and make half of it his ally would do more to secure his position than to enter into a binding agreement with any of the party's enemies.
> . . . It is fairly safe to assume that an important understanding is imminent. It will be an understanding between Chang Tso-lin and the Tientsin and Paoting cliques to control Tsao Kun and to interrupt Wu Pei-fu's triumphal processions into the east, west and south.

The interest of this prognostication in view of the report we publish to-day cannot be exaggerated. Two other items of great interest may be recalled in this connexion. At the end of March our Tsangchow (Chihli) correspondent, whose letters are particularly worth following, described how the annual flood of Shantung coolies, returning from the New Year holiday in their respective homes to their work in Manchuria, had been stopped at the border and given the alternative of returning to their villages or enlisting in Wu Pei-fu's army. And about the same time, Marshal Chang Tso-lin's secretary, writing to the "North-China Daily News" to contradict a report that he was meditating a monarchical restoration, after protesting that Chang Tso-lin desired nothing more than to stop at home and mind his own business, added that > If as a last resort we are compelled to pass to the south of Shanhaikuan to kick out an illegal government, we will do so.

It is of importance to note in the quotation from Mr. Rodney Gilbert's letter that President Tsao Kun is also to be controlled together with Wu Pei-fu. But there is nothing inconsistent in this with to-day's report of the overtures to Marshal Chang, in which the President's name could easily be used as a blind. Are we on the way towards another coup d'état, with yet another Government in Peking claiming to be the only true, original and legal?

THE CRUISE OF THE HWAH JAH

May 21.

WE publish to-day an unsigned, undated communication purporting to come from the cadets of the str. Hwah Jah, taking strong exception to the article which appeared in our issue of the 8th instant. Apart from the opening paragraph, in which it is stated that the letter which formed the basis of our article is a "tissue of falsehoods" and that our comments thereon are misleading, the communication is neither general nor specific in its scope, but rather a collection of vague irrelevancies having little or no direct connexion with the statements we published, and omitting altogether any reference to some of their own shortcomings on which we laid stress.

With due respect to the cadets, and with an unqualified appreciation of the fact that there is a real desire among some Chinese that the cadets shall form a valuable nucleus of a rehabilitated Chinese Mercantile Marine, we find it a little difficult to take the cadets seriously, or to treat their attacks on the conduct, honesty and efficiency of the foreign officers with a gravity they undoubtedly would deserve if they came from those with authority, knowledge and experience. What we published was confirmed by three of the four foreign officers of the ship (the fourth was not in Shanghai at the time).

The cadets, in their communication, say: "To get us to execute any work of the crew in which the officers themselves do not feel inclined to participate, or to take an interest in the training of ourselves for its performances, is an infernal mistake." Exactly! The mistake, if mistake there be, is on the part of the cadets in, by their own admission, declining to do work similar to that done by the members of the crew. It is an axiom as old as ships that the best way to learn any task at sea is to do it. All of the officers had done it in their apprenticeship period, one of them at least in the old sailing ship days, "when sailors were sailors and men were men." Another priceless tag is: "We have been treated as 'chattles.'" The feeling that he was being treated as a chattel must have been held, at some time or other, by every cadet or apprentice that ever sailed the seas or aspired to be a commander.

There is a statement which, if it came from well-informed quarters, would be considered as grave, placing the responsibility for the apparent unseaworthy condition of the vessel, after she left Shanghai, on the officers. From our knowledge of the facts of the case, the statement is absurd. There also are statements on subjects which no cadet with four months' sea experience could possibly consider himself qualified to write on with authority—the loss of an anchor, and the surveying of damaged cargo. The cadets' charges on these points are so absurd as to be unworthy of comment. Another charge is to the effect that the officers converted ship's "scraps" to their own benefit. We have gone into this matter somewhat fully, and find that the "scraps" referred to were some old firebars which were sold at Karatsu by the second engineer. It is an accepted custom in many shipping companies that the disposal of old firebars is a perquisite of the second engineer. The second engineer received $16 for the firebars; the cadets witnessed the transaction and waxed exceeding worth; they even went to far as to communicate with Shanghai by cable. When a representative of the Far Eastern Shipping Syndicate went on board the ship at Tsingtao the second engineer handed over the money to him, and it was returned. A further serious charge is that the officers earned unwarranted money by overloading the ship. We have the word of the master that on no occasion was the vessel even down to her marks, so that charge can be dismissed as pure spite.

Altogether, the cadets, if the letter really came from them, appear to have made their case worse instead of better. They have made a tacit admission that they were not, and presumably are not, amenable to discipline and are disinclined to do manual labour, on the grounds that the officers did not do it. Such logic is unanswerable.

It would be interesting to see the Hwah Jah cadets transferred, en masse, to a training vessel in the British or American Mercantile Marine. Subsequent events would prove both startling and enlightening, especially for the cadets.

THE CONQUEST OF THE AIR

May 21.

IN the name of all the foreign, but especially the British community we offer the heartiest welcome and most sincere congratulations to Captain d'Oisy and Sergeant Vesin on their arrival in Shanghai, and would add our earnest hopes that the unhappy accident which occurred on their landing may not unduly delay them. Though he is not the first to have flown hither from Europe, that honour belonging to an Italian, Lieut. Ferrarin, Captain d'Oisy's time record far surpasses anything yet achieved. That he has been blessed with good luck he himself would be the first to admit. But to say that is in no way to detract from the merit of his performance. For the strain of so long a flight and the utter uncertainty as to conditions ahead must have taxed the aviator's endurance to the utmost. It is a very wonderful performance and France may well be proud of Captain d'Oisy.

It is a commonplace to say that future generations will look back on the machines in which our airmen go aloft to-day with the same wonder as we look back on the barque in which Columbus set out for Eldorado or even on the Nemesis of ninety years ago, the first paddle steamer that [illegible]. And for this reason the greater must be our admiration for the brave men who are flying to-day under every conceivable condition in order to perfect the world's knowledge of aircraft. Think, for a moment, of walking through a snowstorm, in some temperate clime, where neither is the cold very intense nor the wind excessive: and then try to imagine what must have been the experience of the American aviators battling across the Arctic circle for 936 hours, from the American to the Asiatic side of the Pacific, forced down, as we read, by strong winds and heavy snow and arriving in a wild gale of snow and rain, their faces lacerated by the weather. Or think of Maclaren, driving through a sandstorm from Agra to Calcutta, his engine choked and in ceaseless peril. Yet if such feats of courage and endurance were not performed, the passengers who now so unconcernedly fly from one country to another "on their lawful occasions" would never have known what it was to rise above the ground.

Apart from the normal conditions of experiment and contention with Nature which is the inevitable preliminary to the mastering of every new science, the abnormal conditions of war taught the world more about aviation than any other experience could have done. It was but two or three years before the war that Bleriot performed his epoch-making flight across the English Channel and now there are those who believe that neither the Channel nor any other width of sea nor the ships that sail upon it will henceforward be any defence against invasion and that wars of the future will wholly be fought out in the air. Whence arises the vital question, may it not be that war, in revealing the possibilities of aerial navigation, will have made itself impossible? In the late war, for the first time, the world learnt what was meant by throwing the whole nation into the battle-line, and the horrors of destruction of those days were as nothing compared with what they may be imagined to be when the struggle is fought out with aeroplanes and airships. H. G. Wells has shown us in "The War in the Air" how there can be no finality to such a combat; and although it is a truism that the invention of every fresh engine of destruction is immediately followed by the discovery of its antidote, the openness of all coasts and hinterlands to a surprise attack by the air suggests that the only effective defence against annihilation will be a true League of Nations, a Hague Convention that men obey because they dare not disobey.

LOOKING BACKWARDS

Apropos of "Scrutator's" articles that have been appearing in this paper on "Shanghai—the Wonder City of Asia," we fancy that Britons may have been impressed with the writer's reference to Captain Balfour's probable frame of mind were he able to look upon Shanghai to-day. In those days, back in 1848, he and other British officials with him probably did not dream that Shanghai would ever develop into the huge city that it is to-day. They had little evidence around them of what was even likely. The site of Shanghai was a morass. It was, indeed, the Muddy Flat. Mails arrived at that time in opium clippers and probably other sailing vessels; residents congratulated themselves if they received replies to despatches from Hongkong in the unusually short time of six weeks. For several years after that time, until the Elgin treaty allowed steamers with opium on board to bring it into port, the mails for mercantile firms were taken charge of by the captains of the receiving-ships at Woosung, to whom they were addressed, and who sent them by pony express to Shanghai. Mails and minor riots were the excitements of the port. We read that perhaps 20 ponies were sent off with letter bags for the firms in Shanghai, who employed their captains to receive their mails. The boys who rode them, true to tradition, dilly-dallied magnificently for the delectation of the natives until they neared the rickety bridge at Soochow Creek, but immediately they got across it they came tearing along at headlong speed, yelling and shouting along the Bund, and throwing off their mail bags in great style at the doors of the houses to which they were addressed.

Times have changed, have they not? Knowing conditions as they were then, present residents in Shanghai should perhaps be a little more lenient in their condemnation of the Chinese Post Office of the present day. Competition in those far-away days ran high, we notice. The news that the flags were up on the receiving ships at Woosung furnished the strongest excitement in the ordinary life of the first sixteen or seventeen years of foreign residence in Shanghai. An interesting sidelight on this competition is provided in the fact that at that time, and almost until the introduction of telegraphs, most of the bigger firms sent away their own steamers from Hongkong which anticipated the arrival of the mail in Shanghai. These steamers anchored in Yangtze Bay, and a messenger with the owner's mail and Hongkong letters was despatched overland, the firm thus having from one to two days in which to operate before the community received its despatches by the regular P. & O. steamers. Those days, however, were the days of true romance in trade. Residents certainly had little else to think about, and riding did not come into general routine for some years afterwards. Then there were no cafés, no hotels, and each man had to be a good fellow to get along in the Settlement. Few white women had come out. As late as 1852 few of the merchants were married, several firms officially discouraging marriage for their assistants while in China. The chronicler of that day tells us, however, and tells us quite enthusiastically, about the first ball that was held, at which thirty gentlemen and nine ladies were present, open rebellion being obviated by the men agreeing to take a half or even a third of a waltz with the fair partners. As one wonders what Captain Balfour would think of the present Settlement as a whole, one dares not contemplate the feelings of the ordinary members of the community of those days, could they behold the glories of a St. Andrew's ball or any one of the several brilliant functions for which Shanghai is now famous, not to mention the café and hotel life of the place.

In reading its history, therefore, one should be more content with his lot in the modern scheme of things in Shanghai to-day. The pioneers of what our correspondent has styled the "Wonder City of Asia"—and a title not inapt—were brave and men of backbone. They showed us the unmistakeable truth that the imagination rules the world. They had the imagination to settle Shanghai for the world, their reason confirmed their imagination, and in their actions they thus conferred benefits upon every nation of the western world equally, as upon the Chinese themselves. Shanghai is the commercial pivot of this country, and must develop into the greatest city in Asia. Upon their devotion to an ideal those early settlers builded well, and each successive generation must assuredly be impressed by the work done. Long since they have "gone west," but their work lives after them. Similarly, the imagination of the present generation should be quickened as they contemplate the possibilities of this port for which we claim the title of Model Settlement. One of our possibilities is the proposed Shanghai exhibition, to discuss which a meeting of business men is to take place on the 29th instant. Such a conception has the germ of an extremely successful enterprise calculated not only to augment economic factors here but to put before the world at large an intelligible understanding of China's potentialities in world economics. Were the early pioneers with us, we suspect they would throw their weight behind the undertaking.

THE HEALTH OF SHANGHAI

May 23.

While it may not be quite accurate to say that Shanghai is a rejuvenating health resort all the year round, it may be freely admitted that on the whole its foreign residents enjoy very good health. Travellers from other parts of the world, especially those coming straight from India, often comment on the robustness of our men, the lithesome grace of the women, and the bonniness of the children. This is the more remarkable when all the circumstances are considered. For the number of foreigners is relatively small, about twenty-seven thousand including Japanese, and they are surrounded and mingle with a dense Chinese population of over 800,000 (not counting those in the native city), who know very little of the laws of public sanitation and personal hygiene and care less. Credit for the low death-rate among the British and Americans, and for the steadily falling death-rate among the whole population, must be given to our highly efficient Municipal Health Department, which so successfully overcomes many and very great difficulties of public sanitation arising from Chinese manners and customs and their peculiar notions concerning the causation of disease.

Among the resident foreign community, diseases of the chest such as pulmonary tuberculosis, pneumonia and bronchitis are the cause of more deaths (62.7 per cent.) than diseases of the alimentary tract (37.3 per cent.). Compared with non-Chinese nationalities the mortality among the Japanese is the heaviest. Of the 360 resident foreigners who died during the year, 191 were Japanese, the most fatal diseases among them being pulmonary tuberculosis, pneumonia, beri-beri (a disease caused by deficient diet) and typhoid fever. Altogether there were twenty foreigners who died from typhoid fever, and eighteen of them were Japanese. This is strange for so progressive a people. Among the British (including British Indians) there were eighty-eight deaths, thirty were due to tuberculosis, pneumonia, influenza and bronchitis. Cancer caused thirteen deaths; four of the patients were British, three were Japanese and four were Russians. Nine foreigners died of smallpox, which is lamentable, as proper vaccination prevents it. Eight deaths were from alcoholism, which is also very deplorable. Turning to the Chinese the death-rate is said to be 10.3 per thousand. As explained in the report this is incorrect as many of the Chinese when mortally ill return to their ancestral homes to die, and so the deaths are not registered in Shanghai. Altogether the deaths of Chinese number 8,436. The principal diseases with number of deaths were tuberculosis, 822; typhoid fever, 264; cholera, 91; scarlet fever, 71; dysentery, 69; measles, 56; smallpox 51; diphtheria, 29; beriberi, 14. How many Chinese suffered from these diseases during the year but recovered is not known. At the present time notification is voluntary. The Commissioner of Public Health states that the need is becoming more and more urgent for comprehensive legislation dealing with public health, and this will include the prevention of overcrowding; the compulsory registration of medical practitioners; the compulsory notification of communicable diseases, and registration of deaths; and the compulsory isolation of cases of communicable disease where means of isolation in the home are inadequate, or when such isolation is undesirable. Against smallpox very good work is being done. The total number of vaccinations performed during the past three years is over 121,000. This is sufficient to show the value of preventive medicine. Our knowledge of the causes of diseases and the means of preventing them is now so far advanced that if everyone would intelligently co-operate, it has been said that within fifty years all infectious diseases would be abolished.

In closing we quote a few words from the Commissioner's preface to the Health Report for 1923, just issued:—

"The achievements of preventive medicine in overcoming disease, raising the standard of public health and saving human life steadily increased year by year. . . The aim and end of a Public Health Department are the fostering and maintenance of health and the prevention of disease, especially communicable disease. Its authority, scope and influence have enlarged greatly within recent years. So dominant is the idea of public health in the mind of the public to-day that the welfare of the people, from the cradle, and even before the cradle, to the grave, has become one of the chief concerns of the State. There are few cities in the world so peculiarly situated as Shanghai, or so perilously exposed to visitations of epidemic diseases, such as smallpox, cholera, typhus and plague. . . By favour of fortune, and by ceaseless vigilance, these diseases have never become epidemic in the International Settlement and the standard of the public health remains high. The past year was unusually healthy."

With the education of the Chinese in matters of public health, and loyal co-operation on the part of all residents with the Public Health Department, we can be confident that Shanghai will continue to be, as it always has been, a Model Settlement.

EMPIRE DAY

May 24.

It is a traditional complaint against Englishmen that they do not read history. Whether this is equally true of Scots, Irish and Welsh, we do not know. By what one can gather they are at least well stored in respect of local history. But we doubt very much whether they are much better informed than the Englishman about the story of the Empire which they equally helped him to found. How many people could give an approximately accurate account of the steps by which Canada, India, South Africa, Australia, not to mention the almost countless Crown colonies and dependencies, came within the imperial circle of nations that pay allegiance to King George? It is this deficiency which the celebration of Empire Day was founded just twenty years ago to remedy. It is out of reason to expect the ordinary man to read history with the avidity of college professors, among whom, also, one seems to remember that there is an eternal controversy as to what history really means and how it ought to be studied. But at least he may be encouraged to pause for one day in the year to remember that he is a "citizen of no mean city" and to think for a while on what the Empire stands for, the privileges that are his as a member of it and the responsibilities

An attempt was made a few years ago to substitute "British Commonwealth" for "British Empire." One still comes across the phrase here and there; but it has failed to "catch on," and one may be glad of the fact. Rightly used and understood, the words "empire" and "kingdom" have a force of appeal to the imagination which commonwealth can never command. Why the latter word was ever suggested one does not know, except, perhaps, to satisfy the scruples of those curiously constituted people who see in every patriotic emotion an obscure cause of offence to some other nation and, in particular, objected to Empire Day as tending to inculcate noxious ideas of jingoism and the militariist spirit in the young. Whatever else the British Empire stands for, it is not chauvinist. It threw itself into the war against a Prussian tyranny, just as a century ago it fought against the Napoleonic, with all the energy and determination of which it was capable: but once war was over, it began to break up ships and disband armies as fast as it could. In fact, when we try to analyse what the Empire exactly means to each and all of us, it is very difficult to find a satisfactory answer. It is certainly no source of wealth to the people of Great Britain, except to individuals as in the ordinary way of business: on the contrary, it obliges them to spend more upon military and naval defence than they otherwise would. Nor do they make use of it to get the supplies of life more cheaply: twice has a general election been fought on the question of imperial protection and both times has it been rejected. That it is a source of strength to all of us was proved by the Great War; and yet so little had we realized the possibilities of empire, that it was undoubtedly quite a surprise to the stay-at-home Briton to see how his fellows from all parts of the world came pouring across the seas at the call of the common peril. And this great inrush of fighting men was the best answer that could be desired for the Little Englander and any who from abroad might look with suspicious eyes on the British Empire's expansion. For it is perfectly certain that these men would not have left their homes and families in the Dominions and colonies, had they not felt that the Empire stood for a system of government and for ethical ideas that were worth defending even to the death. Nor was this conviction restricted to white men. Of all the wretched mistakes that in recent years have been made in India, none was more deluded than the belief, on the outbreak of war, that she must be bribed into good behaviour by concessions to the nationalist minority or she would mutiny. So far as the vast mass of Indians understood the issues in the war, they understood that their welfare was bound up in the victory of Britain, of the principles for which she fought and to the benefit of which their own daily surroundings bore so much eloquent witness.

And yet as we look back on the development of the Empire, the strangest thing of all is to see how comparatively recent has been the growth of these very principles, which now are the commonplace of all thought. Not only in science and industry but in social ideas, the advancement recorded during the nineteenth century is greater than that of all the previous years of the Christian era. The first shock of Labour's demands is already subsiding: we feel that it is not unreasonable that the men who work with their hands should ask for their share in the joys and decencies of life, for some security of employment, for something better in old age than the workhouse. Yet less than a hundred years ago children of four and five years old worked for eighteen hours out of the twenty-four in factories and coalmines and their fathers and mothers were veritable serfs of the employers who, when reform was urged, protested that the country would be ruined by any other system. We know what the British bluejacket is to-day—a highly skilled mechanician who, in the main, so long as he can "painting the town red," much prefers to spend his periods of shore leave with his wife and family like any other respected citizen. But in Nelson's day, the ships were manned with the scourings of gaols and slums and for several years after Victoria had come to the throne wholesale floggings in the Navy were an every-day affair. And less than eighty years ago men were hanged for stealing a few silver spoons. We have learned that none of these barbarities is necessary, as they were once thought to be, for the safeguarding of industry, of discipline or of law, and it is surely a faint heart that can be dismayed by the prospect of further discoveries in the realm of humanity and justice. To the superficial view, the future is always dark, the golden age for ever that which is past, England eternally going to the dogs. But the facts of history most eloquently and vehemently contradict us. We are impatient and despondent at the apparent slowness of things to right themselves after the war: but it was fifteen full years after Waterloo before normality was recovered. The British Empire was founded on the indomitable optimism of its pioneers, and as we look back upon its growth, there is no feeling more appropriate to Empire Day than that of sure and splendid hopefulness.

GEN. Chang Tsai-yang, Civil Governor of Chekiang, has telegraphed to Peking reporting that as numerous robbers are operating in the eastern section of Chekiang and interfering with the traffic, no permits should be issued to foreigners who desire to visit Yuyao, Ziangshan, and Fenghua. Gen. Chang states that he thinks it will take his men at least half a year to suppress the brigands. A recent letter from a traveller in this part of Chekiang fully confirms the last statement. Officials, we understand, have been plainly told by consular officers that it is their duty to furnish escorts for foreigners.

ONE reason why Hongkong appears to have been so sure of Dr. Sun Yat-sen's demise was due to the fact that on the 14th all British men-o'-war in port were flying the Ensign at half mast, out of respect for a bluejacket who had died in H. M. S. Carlisle. The deceased, Able Seaman Webster, fell overboard from the armed launch Wing Lee (says the "Hongkong Daily Press") whilst that vessel was on patrol duty near Samshui. Webster was one of a party of eight men, forming the gun crew of the launch. One night two weeks ago he was on duty between 8 p.m. and 11.30 p.m. when he suddenly disappeared over the side. P.O. Miller, hearing the cry of distress, bravely dived into the water and swam towards the spot where Webster had fallen. Another British seaman and a Chinese pilot got out a skiff and followed. When Miller was about five [illegible] disappear. Later the body was picked up by [illegible] and brought back to Hongkong.

NOTES AND COMMENTS

Sleeping Partners

It is interesting to read in the London "Daily Express" that ten countries who are members of the League of Nations have contributed no money towards its support, and so far have been "sleeping partners" who cannot be awakened to their duties by frequent appeals. This paper's Geneva correspondent says:—

> China has not paid any dues for two years. Argentine and Peru for three years, Liberia for one year, and among other defaulters are Honduras, Paraguay, Salvador, Nicaragua, Guatemala, and Costa Rica. Several of these South American States have not paid a penny since the foundation of the League although they send delegates to the annual assemblies each year.
> Critics of the League want it to start a debt collecting crusade, in order that all members should pay their proportionate share of expenses and not depend upon the British to pay the Pon's share.

Nobody will be very much surprised that poor old China has not paid up. Any money she may have to spare for foreign service ought really to go to her famished diplomatic corps. The defaulting of South American states, some of which at least have plenty of money, is more interesting. According to Whitaker's Almanac for 1924, there were in May, 1923, 52 members of the League and the expenditure for the year 1922 was estimated at £822,730. The original estimate for annual expenditure was, we think, a round million sterling. What all this enormous outlay goes on, it would be very interesting to know—still more so, what it achieves. Evidently there are States which think it achieves very little, not enough, at any rate, to be worth paying for. They are possibly not the only ones to hold this dreadful heresy.

China's Girl Athletes

The development of China may be very slow—so slow, indeed, that many of us find a difficulty in noting any real progress—but at least there are present all the elements of modern progress. Not the least striking thing in the past few years has been the rise of woman to something very near to an equality with man in every walk of life, and maybe in some ways she has risen even superior to him. As recognition of this fact, when a barrister in the British Court recently suggested that a man might be able to prove that he had some claim to property held independently by his wife, the Judge replied, "I very much doubt whether in these days of female emancipation that would hold good in Great Britain and probably still less in America." Not content with taking their places side by side with men in business, politics, the law, medicine and other spheres, the women of the West now are indulging in athletics as whole-heartedly as ever men did and in any illustrated paper one finds pictures of them engaging in all sports, even cross-country running, garbed in the orthodox male costume. In China as yet we have not seen so much of the rise of woman, but the emancipation is taking place and at least we know that the modern Chinese young woman is copying everything that is done by the women of the West, even though we do not hear so much of her doings. The officials of the China National Championships have recognized this fact; they have made no special arrangements for women's competitions, but they have announced their readiness to do so provided sufficient entries are received. Europeans and Americans have passed beyond the stage when, referring to something or other done by modern women, they would ask, "What would our grandmothers have said?"" In China, however, we could still get some amusement if we could see a dowager of to-day watching her grand-daughter competing in athletic exercises with men. Yet athletics are only a small part of the movement: they amount only to an assurance that the young woman engaging in them is advanced enough probably to do more good work for her country than ever her grandmother did.

Two Views of Barbarism

There is much in Mr. P. C. Ho's letter on the Lincheng affair and kindred topics which arouses sympathy and much in which we do not think that he holds a right view, even allowing for the natural bias of Chinese nationality. As regards the murder of Chinese in Japan (who were mistaken for Koreans), it was most difficult after the earthquake to obtain accurate news of what had happened—in contrast with the Lincheng affair, of which the news was instant and clear-cut. When the facts were obtained, we think, Mr. Ho cannot have read all we have published from Tokio, or he would hardly complain of lack of indignation. Here again, however, certain distinctions should be drawn. The farcical sentences passed on the Japanese vigilantes were inexcusable and the whole attitude of the Japanese authorities in respect of these murders appears to have been indifferent and blameworthy. On the other hand, the general scare raised against the Koreans belonged to an utterly abnormal state of feeling, due to the appalling catastrophe which had just occurred, and those who shared in it generally must accordingly be treated with some lenience. The circumstances surrounding Lincheng were entirely different. Brigandage had been steadily on the increase for many months; in the previous summer several foreigners in Honan and Anhui had been victimized by it; and its prevalence was worst in districts nominally covered by some of the best troops in China. We agree that "no country in the world can afford subjects of other nationalities from the molestation of its outlaws"—if by "afford" Mr. Ho means "guarantee." But any civilized state can and does punish the outlaws afterwards and make reparation to the injured. China has done neither. As regards the warlords being responsible and not the unofficial masses of China, if Mr. Ho will do us the honour of looking back on our files of a year ago, he will find that this view was repeatedly urged by us, and the strongest emphasis laid on the necessity of making the officials pay and not the innocent people of the country.

Anti-British Agitators

There appears to be a noisy party of anti-British agitators at work in Shanghai just now. The other day the Chinese papers printed a story that the British Minister in Peking had threatened the Waichiaopu that he would shut up the Legation and withdraw recognition if satisfaction in respect of the outrage on Mr. Bessel were not forthcoming. The truth of the report is most doubtful, the purpose of printing it not at all. On Saturday the "Sinwanpao" published the following:—

> The Citizens' Association for the discussion of Sino-British affairs has decided to send another telegram to the British Government demanding the recall of H. M. Minister, Sir Ronald Macleay, and to request the Ministry of Foreign Affairs to demand the cancellation of all treaties unfair to China and the withdrawal of the British troops in Tibet.

There are no British troops of any kind in Tibet, as the "Sinwanpao" probably knows and could certainly have ascertained quite easily. As for the "Citizens' Association" etc, we make bold to say that it is precisely the same sort of thing as hundreds of other so-called organizations that we have heard of—no organization at all really, but a handful of well meaning but misguided youths, under a high-flown name, the dupes of a few professional agitators of the class of those who tried to black-mail the owners of the Yih Lo Lee property in North Szechuen Road Extension of Tls. 50,000. Of course publicity is the very thing that trouble-makers of this kind are most anxious to get and it is to be regretted that a respectable paper like the "Sinwanpao," which knows more about them than any foreigner does, should give it them.

Chinese Hebrews

The "Jewish World" of April 3 contains a remarkably interesting note on a collection of more than 20,000 rare Hebrew books and MSS., which Professor Adolph S. Oko, librarian of the Hebrew Union College of Cincinnati, is taking across the Atlantic, as the result of five years' research in Europe.

> Among the treasures (we read) are some Jewish Chinese manuscripts which are of the greatest possible interest. Dr. Oko obtained them through Messrs. Maggs Bros., of Conduit Street, from the London Society for Promoting Christianity among the Jews. It appears that some 25 years ago the Society sent a mission into China for the purpose of converting a body of Jews whose forefathers had settled there as early as between the years of 205 B.C.E. and 220 C.E. The missionaries were not successful in obtaining any converts, but they brought back some sixty Hebrew manuscripts. Some of them open like a book, others unfold like a scroll, others move along a string like cards of a card index, and others, again, close up like an accordion or fan. They form almost an unique collection, and the Hebrew Union College is to be congratulated on obtaining them.

It would be interesting to know where this ancient Jewish colony is situated. If we remember rightly we have heard of it in Honan; but we should be glad if some reader could give fuller information.

"Yellow Jaundice."

This note is not a medical treatise; it has nothing to do with jaundice (so well-known among country folk at Home as "yellow" jaundice) and the title might, with equal appropriateness, have been (crimson red," or "rich brokey," or any other term in which the adjective is obviously superfluous and unnecessary. The special example which we have in mind is "Avenue Road," the name of one of the principal thoroughfares of Shanghai's International Settlement. Why "Avenue" Road? According to our own conception, backed by an extraordinary, an avenue is a "wide straight roadway or street," while a road is defined as "an open way or public passage." The name is an absurdity, abounding in [illegible]ancy and tautology and totally devoid of sense or real meaning. The reason for the name, if just reason there ever was, is no doubt veiled by the obscurity of many years and forgotten records. Admitting [illegible] road in question has [illegible] "Avenue Road" [illegible] decades (and probably longer as such by many), is that any reason why some name embodying just a little sense and meaning should not be applied to it instead? There is no lack of prominent citizens of Shanghai, past and present, to whom or whose memory a graceful and deserved tribute might be paid by the naming of a thoroughfare. The list of possibilities is a long one and any other name chosen would be better than the present ridiculous title which, although it may have its counterpart in one or two small, sleepy towns at Home, is unworthy of an enlightened city, with enlightened inhabitants.

The Shanghai Exhibition

Probably most of the people in such an essentially mercantile community as that of Shanghai already have come to the conclusion that the suggested World Exhibition in or near the Settlement is much more than a dream and that the various articles recently appearing in the "North-China Daily News" are but the initial steps towards the consummation of more or less definite plans. Hongkong at least believes this and is somewhat frightened that Shanghai is going to step in and take away some of the laurels the southern Colony has been expecting to gain, for Hongkong had fully made up its mind to have an Exhibition. Mr. Bena is very determined that our Exhibition shall become a fact and more than one Exhibition has been built up by the energy of one man, though in this case there are several people whose determination is no less than that of Mr. Bena. There are two points upon which some emphasis should be laid. Something in the way of figures had to be given in order to have a basis upon which to work, but Mr. Bena only gave comparative figures as shown by the balance sheets of other Exhibitions and it should not be thought that any one of these sums necessarily can be regarded as the cost of a Shanghai Exhibition. It might be more or less, and obviously no estimate, however rough, can be given until more definite plans are made. There would, for instance, be wide differences in the cost of land at Woosung, Pootung, Kiangwan and Hungjao and also in the making of suitable approaches thereto. Then there can be no talk of believing in or hoping for the consent and co-operation of the Chinese. It must be their Exhibition even more than the foreigner's and their consent and co-operation are essential, for without them there cannot be an Exhibition. If Mr. Bena had not grounds for hoping for such co-operation, he would not have put his plan forward: it remains to secure a guarantee to that effect and this must be the first step. The meeting at the Shanghai General Chamber of Commerce on May 29 should settle this point.

Mokanshan

The Shanghai-Hangchow-Ningpo Railway kindly send us a new booklet they have produced this year on Mokanshan: how to get, there, where to stay and how much is to be paid for it all. As regards the latter one notes sorrowfully that even in Mokanshan rates of living have risen beyond what they were in the good old days. But it is still infinitely cheaper than other summer resorts and of its charms there can be no doubt. A good many improvements have been introduced this year. Return tickets, for instance, which used to be dated for a particular day, are [illegible] to be "available until the end of the season," which really extends right up to October. Sedan chair tickets are made available for two days and there is a swimming bath at the hotel, free for all guests. The best innovation, however, is the sleeping cars to be put on every Friday night train. One will leave Jessfield (say) at 7.30 p.m., the sleeping car will be shifted from Kenshangmên to Konzenchiao and one may sleep till the launch starts at 6.30 a.m. The only improvement we would urge in this excellent plan is that the launch might start at 5 a.m. Then one would get over the creek journey, which is always the hottest part, before the sun was really high. Also one would be up the mountain before noon instead of 1 p.m. We hope the railway will make this small alteration to perfect a very welcome innovation.

Alive but Invisible

Though the essential details of the interview between Reuter's special correspondent in Canton and Mr. Eugene Chen had already been telegraphed, the whole story as now received by mail is far too entertaining not to give in full. One knows not which the more to admire, the indefatigable pertinacity of the pressman or the secretary's supple evasions. We do not quite see why everybody connected with Dr. Sun's headquarters should have got so terribly on the high horse and they have certainly done themselves no good thereby. Less than the usual courtesy, for which Chinese are justly famous, was shown to Mr. McDonald, whose mission to Canton was not only quite natural but might well have been received as an act of consideration. Popular report is seldom reliable; least of all in China in political affairs; the report of Dr. Sun's demise was of interest to the whole world; and as one party was strenuously denying his death another was with equal force maintaining it; Reuter's therefore, sent a representative to Canton in order that the word of a great and unimpeachable news agency might settle the matter. If the financial effects of the rumour are as serious as Mr. Chen says, there was the greater reason why Dr. Sun should allow himself to be seen and we cannot conceive what offence to his dignity could have been caused. There is, as Reuter's correspondent pointed out, no parallel with what King George would have done in similar circumstances, because they could never arise. But assuming that they could, we are perfectly sure that his Majesty would have allowed himself to be seen by say, a representative of Havas, Stefani or the Associated Press. Let us say plainly that we do not for a moment doubt Mr. Engene Chen's assurance that Dr. Sun is alive and kicking (as the vulgar tongue hath it). But we cannot help thinking that to a great many minds Mr. Chen's vigorous reluctance to allow Dr. Sun to be seen means only that there is no Dr. Sun to see.

[illegible] "Sinwanpao" that the Ministry of Foreign Affairs is about to give permission for the re-establishment of Austrian Consulates in China. It is noted that for legal and official purposes, Austrians will be regarded as subj[illegible] treaty country. An [illegible] has of course been [illegible] Austrian interests here for [illegible] past.

NEWS FROM THE OUTPORTS

REUTER CORRESPONDENT ARRESTED IN CANTON

Audacious Chinese Journalist Who Dares to Endeavour to Get an Interview with Dr. Sun: The Militarists' Special Detestation

Hongkong, May 16.

A Reuter special correspondent was despatched to Canton last night with instructions to interview Dr. Sun Yat-sen, if he were still alive. He cables this morning that he visited the Headquarters and saw Mr. Eugene Chen, who made a statement that Dr. Sun Yat-sen did not feel called upon to prove to anybody that he was not dead in view of the categorical statements to the contrary issued by Mr. Chen. The latter was emphatic in his declaration that Dr. Sun was perfectly well after "an indisposition, not an illness." Reuter's correspondent was therefore refused the opportunity to see Dr. Sun.

The opinion in Hongkong is still that Dr. Sun is dead or that he has suffered a very severe nervous breakdown, which prohibits him from seeing anybody except immediate relations.

Mr. Eugene Chen sent a telegram to Reuter last night from Canton stating:—

"The report of the death of Dr. Sun Yat-sen is entirely unfounded. He was indisposed a fortnight ago owing to the strenuous Labour Day on May 1, when he addressed several meetings. He is now completely recovered. His medical adviser, Dr. Rummel, having ceased attendance over a week ago—Eugene Chen."—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Shameen, May 16.

Reuter's Chinese correspondent at Canton has been arrested.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Note.—The arrest follows the unsuccessful efforts of Reuter's Hongkong correspondent to secure a view of Sun Tan-sen, which, it is significant to note, was refused him. —Reuter.

Mr. Hin Wong (Wong Hin-chew) is Reuter's correspondent in Canton as well as correspondent to the "China Weekly Review" and a number of other journals in Canton and elsewhere. He was formerly a contributor for some time to the "North-China Daily News" on affairs in Canton.

About 35 years of age, Mr. Wong is married and has three or four children. After receiving his preliminary education in Honolulu (some are under the impression that Mr. Wong was born there and that he is an American citizen, but this we are unable to confirm), he went to America and studied arts and journalism in the University of Missouri, under Dean Walter Williams. One of his class-mates for about four years was Mr. J. B. Powell, editor of the "China Weekly Review."

Upon returning to China, seven years ago he made Canton his headquarters and, while acting as correspondent for "Millard's Review" (now the "China Weekly Review") and the Associated Press of America, started the "Canton Times." About two years ago, he became Reuter's correspondent. In 1921, he attended the Press Conference of the World (held under the auspices of the Pan-Pacific Union) in Honolulu, Hawaii, and delivered several able addresses, later being elected to several of the subcommittees. Immediately after the Press Conference, Mr. Wong was asked by the South China Press Association to act as their representative and correspondent at the Washington Disarmament Conference, the work of which he very creditably and ably handled.

As editor of the "Canton Times," Mr. Wong was fearless and very frank. He was friendly in his criticism, but, as a result of his duties, he aroused the animosity of the militia, who ordered the suppression of his paper.

About 18 months ago, Mr. Wong was imprisoned by Dr. Sun Yat-sen's clique because he sided with the merchants and wrote several articles protesting very strongly against the illegal taxation, which were considered by the militarists to be detrimental to their interest, but, as a result of numerous protests which came in from every side, the Canton authorities were compelled reluctantly to release him. His home and his office were ransacked at the time for any evidence which might have been used against him. After his release, Mr. Wong immediately set to work to establish another daily newspaper (in English) in Canton and we believe that he had just succeeded in his efforts at the time of his second arrest.

Boy Scout Commissioner

Apart from his journalistic work, Mr. Hin Wong was Commissioner of Boy Scouts in Canton, he being the first to organize a troop in the "City of Rams." He was also greatly interested in educational work, was a member of the Canton Municipality (of which Dr. Sun Yat-sen's son, Mr. Sun Fo, is Mayor), and a hard worker of the committee of the Canton Returned Students' Association.

Mr. J. B. Powell received a telegram on Saturday morning announcing the arrest of Mr. Wong and asking that efforts should be made to bring about his release. This message evidently came from one of his friends, and Mr. Powell at once telegraphed to the American Consul-General in Canton urging him to assist in securing Mr. Wong's release on the ground that Mr. Wong is an employee of an American corporation. Mr. Powell believes that, even if no pressure can be brought to bear by the Consul-General, a protest will at least be lodged with the authorities, and that, while the authorities will not dare to injure Mr. Wong, they may hold him in prison. The outcome of the case will therefore will be watched with interest.

Canton, May 17.

Dr. Sun Yat-sen, who is declining visits from outsiders, to-day granted an interview to a representative of the Eastern News Agency, through the good offices of Mr. Cheng Hung-nien.

While Dr. Sun seems to be somewhat tired, he is in excellent spirits as usual, and the manner in which he expressed his views concerning the political situation suggested that he was the very reverse of ill.

The various rumours of Dr. Sun's death made the populace for a time very uneasy; but as it is clear that the rumours were absolutely groundless, the people of Canton felt easy again.—Eastern News Agency.

Hongkong, May 19.

Mr. Hin Wong, Reuter's correspondent at Canton and Editor of the Canton "Evening Star," who was arrested on May 16, is charged with alleged spreading of false rumours with regard to the death of Dr. Sun Yat-sen. It is reported that he has been banished from Kuangtung for 10 years.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Note.—The report of the death of Dr. Sun Yat-sen, received by Reuter in Shanghai, did not come Mr. Hin Wong but from Reuter's correspondent in Hongkong.—Reuter.

According to trustworthy author- Mr. Hin Wong, Reuter's and the "Weekly Review" correspondent in Canton, has in addition to being banished from Kuangtung for 10 years, been sentenced to a term of imprisonment.

Another report states that Mr. Wong was released, but soon afterwards returned to Shakee, a district in Canton, was arrested, and sentenced to 10 years imprisonment.

According to trustworthy authority, last night Mr. Hin is in serious danger of his life. The American Consul-General is interceding for him, as he is understood to have been born in Honolulu.

Shanghai, May 21.

Reuter's Agency has received a telegram from Mr. Eugene Chen, stating that he has communicated to the Chief of Police Reuter's denial that Mr. Hin Wong was responsible for the report of Dr. Sun Yat-sen's death. He says that Mr. Hin Wong is in no personal danger.

Reuter's correspondent at Hongkong is informed by the American Consul that his colleague at Canton is using his good offices on behalf of Mr. Hin Wong, who may be banished or imprisoned.—Reuter.

Peking's Precautionary Measures

Peking, May 19.

A mandate, issued last night, appoints General Lan Hu Tuh of Military Rehabilitation Affairs in Kuangtung, Gen. Teh Chu Civil Governor of Kuangtung, General Shen Hung-ying Tupan of the Kuangtung-Kuangsi Border, and Gov. Hung Chow-lin Military Commissioner for Chaochow and Meikiang.

It is explained semi-officially that, while the Government have received denials of the reports of the death of Dr. Sun Yat-sen, they have also received information casting doubt upon the denials made by Canton, together with hints that the Canton leaders intended to appoint Gen. Li Lieh-chun Commander-in-Chief of the Yunnan-Kuangtung forces at Canton and Gen. Hu Han-ming, Civil Governor of Kuangtung.

The mandated appointments are, therefore, looked upon as a precautionary measure on the part of Peking.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

KOWLOON'S RECORD FINE

American Engineer Fined $210,000 for Trafficking in Opium

A record fine was inflicted by the Kowloon Magistracy last week, Harold Anderson (55), an American engineer of the str. Las Vegas, being fined $210,000 by Mr. E. W. Hamilton.

Defendant pleaded guilty to the charge of having 1,750 taels of non-Government prepared opium in his possession on board the vessel which was lying alongside No. 1 wharf of the Kowloon Godown Co. The opium was worth no less than $21,000 (one-tenth the fine).

It was alleged that an Indian watchman saw two Chinese drawing up something from over the side of the ship by means of ropes. A European was watching the proceedings close by. Two boxes were brought up. The watchman then went over to the Chinese and asked who owned the boxes. The European (defendant) said "B'long my." The Indian told him that the boxes had to be searched. Defendant then replied "You no see b'long whiskery," and refused to let him search. The watchmen said that he would get a Chinese Sergeant, to which defendant replied that if he did not get a Police Sergeant he would give him some money. The Indian told defendant that he did not want any money, but only wanted to search the boxes. During the conversation the two Chinese went away. Defendant then produced two keys, and one of the boxes was opened. The Chief Officer was called and the boxes were taken to the Water Police Station and when opened the opium was found contained in 350 five-tael tins. A European detective went back to the ship with the watchman, who pointed out defendant, the latter then being arrested.

Asked if he had anything to say defendant stated that he was "hard up" and had a family to keep. He did not buy the opium but was carrying it on a commission of $3,000.

The fine of $210,000 or one year's hard labour was imposed.

EXTENSION OF KIUKIANG AS AN OPEN PORT

Peking, May 20.

A Chihling Mandate announces the opening of Kiukiang as a commercial port. The mandate explains that this action was taken at the suggestion of the Ministries of Foreign Affairs, the Interior, Finance, Justice, Commerce and Communications and the Shuiwuchu.

In reply to inquiries, official circles explain that hitherto certain parts of Kiukiang were not included in the open port and the mandate merely represents extension of the port.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

CANTON'S COMEDY OF ERRORS

Rumour of Dr. Sun's Decease And How Two Hongkong Papers Furiously Rage Together

From Our Own Correspondent.

Hongkong, May 17.

Is Dr. Sun dead or alive? One time President of China, Father of the Republic as he has been so called he is once more in the limelight. Dr. Sun's name, his reported demise and the inevitable denials have been the subject of front page news in big black headlines, in both the English and vernacular organs during the past week. Dr. Sun's state of health is shrouded in mystery. The Canton President's supporters declare the reports false and a piece of political flapdoodle. On the other hand anti-Sun adherents are equally vehement in the assurances that Sun is no more. And out of it all has arisen a ludicrous journalistic situation.

The two English evening papers here are at loggerheads over Sun Yat-sen. The "Hongkong Telegraph" started the ball rolling on Tuesday with a report that Dr. Sun was ill, giving vague rumours of his death from cerebro-spinal fever, carefully stating that the announcements in the vernacular paper, from which they had evidently taken their story, were very conflicting. Following this, the opposition paper, the "China Mail," on Wednesday came out with the startling headline "Sun Yat-sen Dead" declaring without qualification that "possibly China's most prominent man" passed away at Canton that morning at 4.30 o'clock.

The next evening, the "Telegraph" in equally big bold type made a feature of the story under the headline "Dr. Sun Not Dead." They proceed then to reproduce a cable from their special correspondent which states in effect that Dr. Sun had recovered from his indisposition and had been attending to his official duties for the past two days, adding that this was the emphatic assurance given to the correspondent by Dr. Hans Rummel, the German physician who had been attending personally on Dr. Sun. The correspondent goes on to say that Canton Government officials strongly ridiculed the various rumours regarding Dr. Sun's death, attributing them to "enemy sources." Supporting this statement in the same issue, is a telegram from Mr. Eugene Chen, denying the death of his chief.

Rival Headliners

Here is where the humour of the situation starts. One English paper states the Canton leader is dead and forthwith gives half a page of his virtues, his life and "romantic career" and the other diametrically opposes and declares Dr. Sun lives. But the comedy of errors does not end.

The public had two papers that same evening to digest; two stories to criticize and believe or disbelieve. The one stating in forcible and unmistakable terms that Dr. Sun was not dead: the other supporting its previous day's announcement by explaining that despite conflicting stories, it sees no reason to alter its opinion that the much-discussed doctor is dead.

On Friday (yesterday), the "China Mail" begin to weaken a little and ask the question "Is Sun Yat-sen Dead?" but retaining their big headlines and publishing the result of their "special representative's" investigations. The representative wires that he has been told by Mr. Eugene Chen that Dr. Sun is perfectly well after his "indisposition, which was not an illness." Further, the newspaper man is told by Mr. Chen that Dr. Sun does not feel called upon to prove to anybody that he is not dead. The corpse of Dr. Sun, neither the living person is seen by the representative of the Hongkong paper.

The rival organ publishes at the same time an extract from the Canton "Evening Star" a new publication which states, "Dr. Sun Yat-sen, indisposed for a time last week, is now able to receive a few friends on business" and relegates this to the size of an ordinary news paragraph.

Mr. Eugene Chen's Indignation

To-day, the "China Mail" representative's full story of his visit to Canton is given under even more sensational headlines than before. Two pressmen representing what is termed "a famous new agency" state that they were refused an interview with Dr. Sun and that their attempt was described by Mr. Eugene Chen as an "impertinence" that Dr. Sun should be asked to display himself to prove that he was alive, simply because he [illegible] had maliciously circulated reports that he was dead." Mr. Chen continue the representatives, upbraided the Hongkong papers, English and vernacular for publishing false reports based upon a single report in a Chen Chiung-ming paper. When the newspaper men insisted that Dr. Sun should be interviewed, Mr. Chen is reported as replying that when Tsao Kun was reported dead some time ago the communique issued by the Peking Ministry of Foreign Affairs was accepted without question and nobody came along with demands to interview Tsao Kun to prove that he was alive. Mr. Chen asked if a similar demand would have been made if the same position had arisen regarding King George. Was Dr. Sun to grant interviews to every Tom, Dick and Harry who came to Canton? Concluding the interview, Mr. Chen said Dr. Sun had never been ill, nor had he been confined to bed and at the most had only been indisposed, a word which he used advisedly.

And here, for the present, the matter rests. Though I see no reason to doubt the emphatic assurance of Mr. Eugene Chen, there is a little mystery concerning Dr. Sun's obscurity be he alive or dead. It has produced a comedy of errors and a diversion which with its peculiar circumstance had eclipsed all news in Hongkong for a week.

PRIEST WHO INFORMED ON AN OFFICIAL

Both Fined for Assisting Bandits: Money Used for City Improvements

From Our Own Correspondent.

Suchien, N. Ku., May 15.

In my last letter I spoke of the "rain processions" which went on for nearly two weeks, both in town and country. There never have been such processions here. Some 50,000 took part; many of the people were burning incense as they went. For about 20 days no meat was bought on the street, and for one day not even vegetables were allowed to be sold. Incense was on hand at every shop in the big street. Children, too, had their little processions: when their prayers did not have the desired effect, the people began to get rowdy, and the Magistrate had to stop these processions. Rain then came! So everybody is busy, the maize and beans have been put in, and in many places the wheat looks more promising, though on some high ground it is feared there will be no wheat harvest. In spite of this rain, grain and grass for burning have all gone up in price.

Some time ago I wrote of a priest accused of assisting bandits who was sent to Nanking and who subsequently in Nanking accused his accuser, an official high in office. Both have been tried and heavily fined! However, the camp official and magistrate are using their fines for the town's benefit. We have Chinese here opening eight artesian wells. They propose to instal four in the city and four outside. They say the first is to cost $8,000, and the others $200 each. For the first they have already drilled down 200 ft., but as yet have not got to water.

This open winter, with little frost, has caused a great deal of sickness. Scarlet fever, relapsing, smallpox and chicken pox, are all amongst us, as well as influenza. The first thoroughly foreign house, built by a Chinese, is nearly finished in our big street. It is four storeys high, and built entirely by native workmen.

DR. SUN ALIVE BUT INVISIBLE

[illegible]'s Fruitless Attempt to Gain an Interview and Disprove his Reasons. Once and for All: Persisten Pressman and Adroit Secretary

The following is a full account of an interview between Mr. A. M. McDonald, Reuter's special correspondent, sent to Canton to learn the truth about Dr. Sun Yat-sen, and Mr. Eugene Chen, the Sun Yat-sen's secretary. Mr. McDonald was accompanied by a well-known Chinese journalist, Mr. Wu Tse-kwang.

Canton, May 16.

Our interviews were first sought with the Mayor of Canton (Mr. Sun Fo) and the Police Commissioner (Mr. Wu Tsai-cheng). But as we were unable to pay our respects to either, it was soon found out, we then called upon Mr. Eugene Chen, private secretary to Dr. Sun Yat-sen, whom we found in his office at the Aeronautical Board.

Mr. Eugene Chen began by upbraiding the Hongkong papers, English and vernacular, for publishing false reports, based upon a single report in a Chen Chiung-ming paper. We pointed out clearly that we wished him to understand we were there not as from any Hongkong papers specially, but as special representatives from Reuter's Agency under personal instructions from Mr. Cox, the Hongkong representative. We continued that opinion in Hongkong, despite Mr. Cox's message to the "Hongkong Telegraph," held very strongly that Dr. Sun was dead. Responsible people took the same view and, faced with this attitude, Mr. Cox, who had been inundated with inquiries from abroad, felt that he had to obtain the most definite information possible. Obviously, we said, the simplest and most effective way to answer that attitude was for Dr. Sun Yat-sen himself to grant an interview, however brief, to the accredited representatives of a well-known news agency like Reuter's.

Mr. Eugene Chen insisted that the idea that Dr. Sun was dead could not be held in very responsible circles. To this we replied that Mr. Cox appeared to underestimate the strength of feeling in Hongkong and so late as seven o'clock last night Mr. Cox himself was still anxious about the actual facts, hence our wish for an interview with Dr. Sun. Mr. Chen then said that he had also sent, at about four o'clock yesterday afternoon, a cable to Mr. Cox officially denying that Dr. Sun was dead. This cable he had asked Mr. Cox to circulate locally and abroad. We replied that as Mr. Cox had not mentioned any cable to us before we left, we had no option but to follow out his last instructions. Mr. Chen agreed that even though this cable had been sent as a Government message it might have been delayed as the cable service was still erratic.

Why No Interview?

Assured that Dr. Sun was back at his post in normal health, we said the man in the street would fail to understand why an interview could not be granted, especially as Dr. Sun Yat-sen had allowed himself to be interviewed by pressmen in times of crisis before. Mr. Chen replied that he thought it an impertinence that Dr. Sun Yat-sen should be asked to display himself to show that he was alive, simply because the cannibals had maliciously circulated reports that he was dead. In reply we pointed out many things which the ordinary individual would consider human in Dr. Sun Yat-sen's previous broadcasting utterances, and Mr. Chen himself insisted that the reports would cause serious harm. Mr. Chen said that he would resent it very strongly were he in Dr. Sun's position. Mr. Chen asked if a similar demand would have been made if the same position had arisen regarding King George. Was Dr. Sun Yat-sen to grant interviews to Cherry Tom, Dick and Harry who came to Canton? Our answer was that the parallel was not sound because King George's death would not have the same political and financial consequences that Dr. Sun Yat-sen's death would in view of the peculiar circumstances prevailing in Canton to-day.

But after all, we reminded Mr. Chen, these were only incidentals. They did not alter the fact that we had been instructed by Mr. Cox to secure an interview with Dr. Sun if possible so as to put the question beyond all doubt. Mr. Chen replied that the damage had been done anyway and he certainly thought that Dr. Sun would not grant the interview. The decision, added Mr. Chen, did not rest with himself. He had to consult others but he would strongly advise Dr. Sun not to see anybody. He hoped that no further denial was necessary. Had he not, as a responsible official of the government, already stated that the reports were untrue, and was it likely that he would issue, under his own name, any statement that must later be proved untrue? After all they were not children nor were they madmen. Were Dr. Sun Yat-sen really dead, the fact was bound to become known sooner or later since they could not hide it for ever.

The So-called Denial.

We pointed out that the official denial consisted of a single personal statement from Mr. Chen to the "Hongkong Telegraph" whereas in the past it had been the custom for official communiqués to be issued in the name of the Generalissimo's office as in the case of the attack on Waichow last year when the statements were sent to all the papers. Although the question of Dr. Sun's supposed death had been raised publicly as long ago as last Tuesday Mr. Chen had not issued until Thursday afternoon, the usual official statement for all the papers as in the past. Indeed a rigid censorship appeared to have been imposed in Canton. Mr. Chen said that Mr. Cox was a personal friend of his and that he would write to him. Mr. Chen added that he had met the editors of all the Hongkong papers and they knew that they had only to ask him and he would give them any information they wanted. However, if an official communiqué was all that was required one could be issued by the Minister of Foreign Affairs and sent to all papers.

We replied that while we would be only too glad to give the fullest publicity to any such statement the question would remain why Dr. Sun could not grant the interview.

Libel Actions Threatened.

Mr. Chen repeated that the damage had already been done and the only action they proposed to take now was to start libel proceedings against some papers, both English and Chinese and to prosecute the Hongkong Chinese paper which had distributed free circulars announcing Dr. Sun's death. After remarking that these were slow and unwieldy processes, we observed that it would be difficult to reconcile this inevitable delay with Mr. Chen's anxiety to have the reports corrected when the interview we desired offered such a quick and effective alternative. Mr. Chen then queried whether we knew Dr. Sun personally and one of us replied that he would know Dr. Sun Yat-sen at once.

After reflecting for a moment Mr. Chen reiterated that he very much resented the suppression of an interview and would strongly advise Dr. Sun not to grant it. During [illegible] we pointed out that many things [illegible] individual would consider human in Dr. Sun Yat-sen's previous broadcasts

OFFICIAL FIGHTING IN KUANGTUNG TEMPORARILY HELD UP

Meanwhile Citizens Volunteer Corps in Action to Stop Unauthorized Taxation: Canton Merchants Threat to Shameen

From Our Own Correspondent.

Canton, May 13.

During the last few weeks there has been but little progress made in the East River campaign, owing to the disinclination of the troops to fight without pay. Waichow is still in the hands of Chen Chiung-ming's supporters, and in spite of continuous reports that it is about to be attacked, nothing has been done so far. It is thought that the attack may be diverted to Hoifung and Lukfung, the district in which is the home of Chen. Gen. Yang Hsi-min, the Yunnanese C.-in-C., has been to Canton recently for conferences, but nothing definite would appear to have been decided.

On the West and North Rivers all would appear to be quiet for the time being, although there is a certain amount of activity going on in Wuchow. Gen. Hsu Tsung-chih, who is to take command of all the Cantonese forces in the West, has not yet left Canton to take up his post but is being urged to do so, and it is expected that he will go to Kongmoon in the course of the next few days.

Volunteers in Action

There are still a large number of troops in the City of Canton itself in spite of the strict orders to move which have been issued, although a certain number have moved out. There was a small incident near the Provincial Assembly Building the other day when the Kuangtung Provincial Guards, who are under the command of Gen. Wu Te-ching, the Police Commissioner, in the vicinity were attacked and disarmed by the Merchants' Volunteers for starting an unauthorized protection tax-collecting station. The commander of the guards concerned was immediately dismissed from his post by the authorities as soon as they heard of the matter, as the station had been organized without permission, and is also against the policy of the Government.

The strike of the junk merchants which started a few days ago, as a result of the Government's announcement that they intended to levy a 20 per cent. tax on all junk traffic for protection from pirates, has not yet been entirely settled. As the result of the merchants' protests the Government cancelled the tax but the merchants require guarantees that no such tax will be imposed in future, before resuming business. This has not yet been given and although the merchants were invited to a conference by the Kuangtung Rehabilitation Bureau, they refused to go saying they were making arrangements for their own protection and did not require Government protection. The result of the strike is that the traffic to the interior is interefered with.

Shameen No Thoroughfare

The Chinese Chamber of Commerce have protested to the Shameen Municipal Council against the Council's action in stopping Chinese using Shameen as a thoroughfare, and they have threatened that a boycott of foreign firms will be declared unless there is something done to reverse the decision.

There are now three schools on strike in Canton, owing to the students demands for the removal of certain of their teachers not being complied with, the Kung Yee Medical School, Holy Trinity School, (a British concern) and The Sacred Heart College (a French concern). In the case of Holy Trinity, the trouble arose through the school authorities refusing to allow the use of the school premises by the students for political purposes. It should be mentioned that only a portion of the students are striking, the remainder attending classes as usual.

Dr. Sun's Health

Dr. Sun Yat-sen has been suffering from overwork and was ill for some days, but he is now reported to be quite recovered and working again.

The Canton-Kowloon Railway is not yet through to Hongkong yet, owing to a temporary difficulty. Last week an attack was made and Shen Chun recaptured by the troops of Chen Chiung-ming, but they were soon driven off again, and this has delayed the re-opening of the Railway for a short time.

A NATIONAL UNIVERSITY FOR KUANGTUNG

Plea to Foreign Powers from Educational Bodies for Grant of Boxer Indemnity Money and Customs Surplus

We have received the following copy of a letter which the Provincial Educational Association of Kuangtung have recently sent to the ambassadors, ministers, consuls and foreign ministers of the different Powers accredited to prominent men and publicists abroad.

We feel sure, the writer says, that we can depend upon you for your support in our endeavour to establish a seat for higher learning and culture, and we shall be most obliged if you will, through your valuable paper, give this letter due publicity so as to create an atmosphere favourable to its reception in Europe and America.

Canton, May 5, 1924.

Sir,—We, people in the South, have long felt the need of a university for those who wish to go for higher learning and culture. Our cherished hope seems now fulfilled by the appearance of the National Kuangtung University. This new institution, which is only three months old, is founded through the amalgamation of three old colleges in Canton—the Higher Normal College, the Law College, and the Agriculture College. These Colleges have, during the last two decades, been the seats of higher and professional education for young men and women of Kuangtung and, indeed, of all South-western provinces of China and have produced many prominent men in Letters, Law, Science and Education. The new University, in addition to the old departments of study—the Departments of Law, Economics, Political Science, Literature, Philosophy and Agriculture—is creating new Departments of Engineering, Pure Science, etc. It has an aggregate number of over 2,000 students and over 500 teachers.

A Large Part to Play

But, in order to make the new University a success, there should be no half way and dilly-shod measures. The University has a large place in the South and has a noble part to play in the development of the country. In commerce, industry and politics, the South has figured large in the history of China. It is of vital importance that there should be a proper and eminent centre of learning and culture in order to meet the demands of the time. For this purpose, an adequate provision of funds is necessary. It is, therefore, proposed, that a portion of the Boxer Indemnity Funds and the Surplus Customs Revenues which are part of the contribution of the South should be appropriated for the expenditure of this new University.

The foreign Powers concerned have constantly declared that the Boxer Indemnity Funds should be spent for the advancement of education in China. Indeed, tentative arrangements have been made by one Power at least to allocate the funds to various universities in China while several other powers have generally expressed their intention to devote the money for higher education of China. The National Kuangtung University is entitled to claim for a share of such funds. The Province of Kuangtung, moreover, merits a special consideration from the foreign nations when it is remembered that it is the first province of China to open its ports for international trade and intercourse. Almost a century has elapsed since the western nations came to reside and trade in Canton. Subsequent years have served to develop and extend the international relationship and the future bids fair for a closer co-operation and deeper mutual understanding, for which the newly founded University will undoubtedly be a great contributing factor.

The Customs Revenue

With regard to the surplus Customs Revenue, it may be at once declared that we have no desire to enter into the controversial part of the question. Taking the sentiment of all concerned, it is safe to assume that no serious objections need be expected from any quarter to the appropriation of the surplus funds in question for the use of this University. The only point that arises in this connexion is probably the lurking fear that the money once obtained may be deviated for other purposes. But there need be no cause for such an apprehension as adequate guarantees and effective safeguards can be easily arranged to the satisfaction of all parties concerned. The employment of these funds for the cause of higher education will, in any case, go far to lessen the horrors of war and hasten the dawn of peace and unity in China and restore the normal course of trade and communication between this and other countries.

It is hardly necessary to add that the public bodies and organizations in the South are heartily in favour of the application of these funds mentioned to the maintenance of the University whose usefulness will not only be confined to the South but will be extended to all parts of China as well as to foreign lands.

With these considerations it is earnestly hoped that the foreign Powers will give a favourable consideration to the claims of the Kuangtung University and render necessary assistance and facility at the earliest possible date.

We have the honour to be, Sir,
Your obedient servants,

BOLSHEVIKS IN NORTH CHINA

Propaganda in Inner Mongolia: Nationalization of Women

Apparently the Bolsheviks in north China are carrying on their activities very vigorously and, as usual, stick at nothing to attain their ends, for Marshal Wang Huai-ching, High Military Inspecting Commissioner of the Three Special Areas (Jehol, Charhar and Suiyuan), has sent a strong telegram to President Tsao Kun, asking for permission to use every possible means in his power to cope with what he describes as a "most dangerous menace."

Marshal Wang, in his telegram, says that "the hearts of the people are growing worse every day, because the people are very ignorant and allow themselves to be cheated by Bolshevik propaganda agents. This is not at all surprising because what the Bolsheviks promise is beyond all description."

The Bolsheviks, says Marshal Wang, are again advocating their old programme (though they strongly deny it) for the nationalization of women. The people, he says, accept this idea, fully believing that by carrying it out they are acting with the rest of the world toward progress, humanity and peace. The Bolsheviks aim at causing labour troubles and strikes, he says, and if they succeed, there will surely be disaster in the country.

"The Bolshevist aim," states Marshal Wang, "is to enslave all those who are patriots and cause destruction to those who accept the old idea, famous amongst the civilized Chinese, of filial piety. They want to place the son on equal rank with the father and the women on equal standing with the men, as well as to have co-education in the schools. Their activity is getting worse and worse and is extremely hard to cope with, hence I ask that you will give me full powers to suppress the menace and to use every possible means to stop the spread of Bolshevism."

GOVERNMENT BANK IN TSINGTAO

Tsingtao, May 14.

The Tsingtao City Bank, official depository of the Kiaochou Territorial Administration, was opened on Monday. Several scores of guests gathered in the three-storey building on Paoting Road for the opening ceremony, the principal feature of which was a speech by the Governor, Mr. Kao-En-hung, who is also President of the Bank.

The bank has a capital of $3,000,000, half of which had been subscribed by the general public. It plans to issue its own notes and copper currency, but these are not ready yet. It is expected that the notes will be printed in Peking, while the coppers are minted here.

Other speakers were Mr. Horionuchi, the Japanese Consul-General; Mr. Walter A. Adams, the American Consul; and Dr. Sun, the principal of the Tsingtao Academy. All united in expressing their best wishes for the success of the bank. Following the opening ceremony, Governor Kao gave a tiffin, the guests including Consular officials, the staff of the Administration and leading businessmen.

In his speech, the Governor said that a medium, such as the bank provided, was of paramount importance and that its function of negotiating and arranging all financial matters on behalf of the authorities concerned was one of the desirability of which there could be no question. An official bank lent encouragement to trade development and, being run on purely national lines, was not so much for the purpose of localized profit, but for the purpose of developing the resources of the district.

City Well Policed.

The city of late has taken on the appearance of an armed camp with the 2,500 or more police officers, augmented by Admiral Wen Shu-teh's regiment of marines and several military detachments, which are encamped in the outskirts. There can be no question, however, that the city is better patrolled than ever before, although less display of military force would find favour with the majority.

The marines parade daily with rifles and bayonets fixed and march along the Bund and other thoroughfares along the waterfront. There can be no doubt that this manœuvre is not without reason, the general opinion being that the purpose is to overawe any former bandit elements, who may be lurking in the city. Several ex-brigands have been apprehended and banished and the police are on the look-out for others.

The presence of the ex-bandits, who, incidentally, have been causing no trouble worth mentioning, is accounted for by the discharge from the army of the Fangtse soldiery. These soldiers are the same bandits who swarmed into the city simultaneously with the return of the Kiaochou Territory to Chinese rule in December, 1922. At that time further trouble was avoided by taking them into the army, the bandits being assigned for duty at Fangtse. Recently they were told to parade and were disarmed and paid off. They were ordered to return to their homes with all possible speed. Naturally, many of them lived in the neighbourhood of Tsingtao and so came in this direction. As a consequence extra precautions have been taken by the police, and the naval and military authorities. Hitherto beyond a few cases of petty thievery there has been no incident of an untoward nature.

The murder of Mr. Kawakami, the cashier of the Japanese Middle School, and the robbery of $4,200 in cash from his person, is attributed to Japanese desperadoes. The police and the Japanese Consular authorities are still looking for the murderer. The murder took place in broad daylight and in sight of at least two persons. These have been unable to give a good description of the assailants.

The American Asiatic Squadron is expected to arrive here on May 28 and will remain in Kiaochou Bay for ten days, going from here direct to Chefoo, which is its summer headquarters. The American Colony is planning entertainments in honour of the officers and men.

The Kiao-Tsi Railway.

Mr. T. L. Ku, former chief accountant of the Kiaochou-Tsinan Railway, who was removed from office last week on charges of alleged incompetence arising from the credit extended to a Sino-Japanese concern, whose outstanding balance had grown to large proportions, has left for Shanghai, the police surveillance over him having been terminated. Mr. Ku had gained considerable popularity here for the firm stand he took when certain militarist elements were making demands for money on the Kiao-Tsi line. He successfully blocked these attempts to drain the treasury.

The Managing Director of the Railway, Mr. Shao Hung-chun, found that Mr. Ku had permitted the debit balance against the firm in question to reach the amount of $330,000 and there were rumours that he had accepted a bribe to induce him not to press them for payment. He was suspended and placed under virtual arrest, being detained under guard in his own house.

Subsequently he was exonerated, but Mr. Shao removed him from his post and appointed a successor. Mr. Ku was held culpable in not reporting the matter to the Managing Director. He declared that he had taken it upon himself to make collection.

The refusal of the company to pay the bill hinges on the question of a rebate. The firm insists upon this reduction, which it was granted during Japanese control of the railway.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

GROWTH OF LOTTERIES IN KIANGSU

Provincial Assembly Members Calling for Strict Repression

Several members of the Provincial Assembly of Kiangsu have called upon the Civil Governor, Han Kuo-chun, for information regarding the issue and sale of lottery tickets. They say that, in spite of an order for their suppression, the number of tickets has increased daily, and that practically all the advertising space in the Chinese press is taken up by lotteries, which are being carried on under new names. Kiangsu, they say, is the base of all the operations of lottery runners, and the majority of tickets are sold here. Through these, the Kiangsu people waste much money which should be used for better purposes. The people are continually cheated, and if no remedy is applied, "we people will continue to suffer indefinitely. Why then do you not investigate the question of these tickets which change only in name and face? Why do not the magistrates of the different districts and the police of the province take steps to suppress these tickets? Why is it that lottery tickets before were suppressed and why are these, which are only changed a little, not suppressed! We cannot understand it. We Kiangsu people hate this evil and demand that all lotteries be suppressed for ever in the future as in the past. We demand a reply from you within five days."

H. & S. BANK IN PEKING

First Secretary of British Legation Appointed to Succeed Mr. Hillier

Peking, May 17.

Mr. G. E. Hubbard, First Secretary of the British Legation in Peking, who is at present on furlough in England, has been appointed manager of the Hongkong & Shanghai Bank at Peking, in succession to the late Mr. E. G. Hillier.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

RAIN AT LAST IN N. KIANGSU

From Our Own Correspondent.

Tsingkiangpu, Ku., May 15.

Splended rains, over a period of ten days, since followed by bright sunshine, give the best prospects of good crops we have had here for years.

Yesterday a man from the country north of here told me there were fewer bandits in that district just at this time than for several years. May this be true to-morrow!

STUDENTS MILDLY DISGRACING THEMSELVES

The Day of Humiliation: An Annual Holiday for Public Parade: Great Preparations: But Rather Tame Results

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Wuchang, Hup., May 10.

The day upon which the students of China annually disgrace themselves is safely past. It appears that there are really two days, viz. May 7 and May 9, the former being the anniversary of the day upon which the iniquitous Twenty-one Demands were presented by Japan, and the latter the day upon which they were signed by the Chinese statesmen in Peking. As to which of the two days brought the more of disgrace and humiliation, seems to be a subject not quite clear in the students' own minds. The one fact about which they are quite certain is, that they must have a holiday annually, on which they can go out of school to disgrace and humiliate themselves in public.

In spite of the elaborate preparations which had been made, the two days seem to have passed off quite tamely. Oh Wednesday at 2 p.m., a big meeting was held in a theatre at the end of the Maloo close to the British Concession in Hankow. This meeting was addressed by several speakers, some of whom were delegates from other provinces. The usual talk was made, that China has suffered untold injustices at the hands of Japan, and that it behoves the students of China to rouse national opinion on the subject. Afterwards a procession was formed in 26 sections. After parading along several of the principal streets of Hankow, they crossed the Han, and paraded the principal streets of Hanyang. Then they crossed the Yangtze, and paraded the principal streets of Wuchang. There was no disorder at any point. Police and soldiers guarded various points of the route, and were stationed at the river jetties and on the ferry-boats. On Friday, special forces of police and military were out again, students were forbidden to cross the river in bodies, and there was no procession at all.

Kidnappers Executed.

On Wednesday, three kidnappers were executed in Hankow, and their heads were fixed up on poles at three different points of the maloo. There was a popular rumour that these were three of the Honanese who had been arrested a week before on the charge of kidnapping children and putting them into meat-pies. But the rumour was incorrect, as it was quite a new case. The three men had kidnapped a girl from a wealthy merchant's home; but the police had succeeded in tracing her and in arresting the criminals. There is no doubt they deserved the penalty which they suffered.

The putting up of heads in public places may seem a gruesome method of dealing with crime; but under present conditions, it really seems the best way to deter others from this wretched crime of kidnapping which is so common.

New Pleasure Resorts.

A wealthy citizen of Hankow has just opened a large piece of ground as a park, opposite the Chinese race-course. It is called the "Park of Ten Thousand Pines," and is laid out with pavilions and pools, and roads upon which people may enjoy a run in a motor. Needless to say this is not a purely philanthropic venture, but is expected to be quite a little source of income to the enterprising originator.

Wuchang has also been favoured lately by the opening of three public gardens. Three open spaces, two within the city and one outside it, have thus been converted to the public use by the order of Governor Hsiao. These parks are much appreciated by the people, especially on big holidays like Ch'ing Ming when the spring flowers are beginning to come out. It is pleasant to see this introduction of a western idea in China, and also to notice that it is being encouraged by one of a class of officials who are not always given credit for taking any thought for the welfare of the people.

U. S. FORCES IN THE PHILIPPINES

Gradual Concentration of Garrisons: Five Forts to be Abandoned

Manila, May 10.

Military authorities in the Philippines department have recently discussed tentatively plans for the gradual concentration of the United States forces in the Philippines at Fort McKinley and Corregidor Island. At present the United States troops are garrisoning at seven widely separated points in the islands and the plans under discussion include the abandonment of five of these forts including Fort Santiago, Manila, Camp Nichols, Manila, Camp Stotsenberg, 60 miles north of Manila, Pettit Barracks, Zamboanga, and Camp John Hay at Baguio.

Camp John Hay, which is 5,000 feet above the sea, under the proposed plan would cease to be garrisoned by troops, but would be retained as a convalescent hospital. Fort Santiago, situated within the old walled city, is now department headquarters and in the event of its abandonment by the United States would probably be turned over to the Philippine Constabulary as headquarters. Brigadier-General Rafael Crame, Chief of the Constabulary, has long desired to obtain Fort Santiago as headquarters for his forces and would welcome the change.

The Fort McKinley reservation is composed of more than 2,000 acres, about five miles from Manila, on an elevation perhaps 100 feet above the sea. On Corregidor Island are the fortifications which guard the entrance to Manila Bay.

Camp Eldridge, 40 miles from Manila, has recently been abandoned as a garrison for troops and now only a keeper remains there, where for many years a battalion of troops was maintained.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

OPIUM STAMP TAXES IN SUIYUAN

Suppression Brought About by Action of Anti-Opium Association

Peking, May 16.

The International Anti-Opium Association a short time ago published in the press and brought to the notice of the Waichiaopu the system opium taxes in Suiyuan. Copies of the opium tax stamps in three colours are in the possession of the Association.

The following reply has been received by the Association from the Waichiaopu, dated May 14:—

"In response to your letter of April 23, which states that Suiyuan enforces opium stamp taxes, this Ministry has instructed the Inspector-General of Chahar, Jehol and Suiyuan districts to suppress such taxes, and Gen. Wang has replied that he has ordered the Suiyuan Tutung strictly to suppress the taxes in question. Furthermore, Gen. Wang has sent agents to investigate the matter."—Reuter's Pacific Service.

STRIKING STUDENTS OF PEIYANG

How the Die-hards were Tricked Into Raising Siege of Ministry of Education

TIENTSIN NEWS SERVICE.

Tientsin, May 15.

According to despatches from Peking a few days ago the remaining striking students, of Peiyang University, about 170, who had practically encamped in the Ministry of Education building in Peking until their demands for the resignation of President Feng were met, were induced to return to Tientsin on the promise that if they resumed classes Dr. Feng would later resign. It was stated that this alleged "compromise" was the outcome of Dr. C. T. Wang's intervention.

The truth behind this message was known to a few before it was made public. However, before divulging this truth it is necessary to consider the recent happenings in connexion with the Peiyang students strike. On April 8, 186 students were dismissed for not returning to classes, the dismissal being the penalty, published by the University authorities, for students who still remained on strike, without official leave, up the afternoon of that date. On that day 62 had returned to the campus and 102 had obtained official leave. These accounted for the 350 students enrolled before the strike a few weeks previously.

What Really Happened

While 65 had returned, actually only 18 were attending classes for a few days after April 8, but since then the attendance has steadily increased. There are now 130 attending classes. All of those returning had to sign a pledge stating they would abide by the rules of the University that no student "organizations" would be started.

About 170, however, held out for their demands and have almost lived on the premises of the Ministry of Education in Peking. The officials racked their wits to find a means of getting rid of them and recently a successful method was found. With a certain amount of dignity a conference was held at which Dr. C. T. Wang, a graduate of Peiyang, put forward the suggestion that the students should return forthwith to save the "face" of Dr. Feng, who would afterwards resign for other reasons. This proposal, backed as it was by official approval and in accordance with Chinese custom, met with instant adoption. The students and Ministry were tired of the fight and the students were elated at an obvious though deferred victory. However, it is also in accordance with Chinese custom that when a situation defies all reasonable means of solution it becomes advisable to use others. A refractory child is induced to be quiet with a promise of candy, a hesitant investor is induced to part with his money with appeals of fabulous riches, neither of which promises is made seriously. It is, in the native language, known as the process of "hung."

"Hunged" out of Peking

Applied to the students it worked out according to form. They returned to Tientsin in a body yesterday, with the expectation of being taken back on the rolls en masse and free of any stipulations whatsoever. To be certain of their expected open-armed welcome they sent one student to the University this morning as an advance guard. Upon arrival he was told what he and all the rest had to do before admission. He was told they must sign the pledge to refrain from organizing. The student immediately returned and reported to his comrades who are scattered among several hotels in the French and Japanese Concessions. What they intend to do remains to be seen. Dr. Feng, who took no part in this deception, does not intend to resign and will not be permitted to resign by the Civil Governor, even if he wished. The chief thing, in the minds of the Chihli authorities and the Ministry of Education is that the students have been "hunged" out of Peking, and the police have been given strict instructions to see that they do not return to Peking for some time, certainly not to within the precincts of the Ministry of Education.

JAPANESE POLITICS

Coalition of Three Main Opposition Parties

Tokio, May 18.

The leaders of the Constitutional parties—the Kenseikai, the Seiyukai, and the Kakushin Club—held a joint—meeting to-day at the Sanrokutei, Shiba, and passed a resolution to the effect that inasmuch as the constitutional parties had secured the majority of M. P.'s as a result of the last general election, the Kiyoura Cabinet should resign in a body without the least delay. They also made arrangements that the three parties should do away with all intrigues likely to cause a rupture among the parties, maintain their co-ordination, strengthen their union more firmly, and face the political situation with a united front. It was further decided that a joint meeting of M. P.'s belonging to the three Constitutional parties should be held on the 30th instant, and that negotiations among the three parties be held every Tuesday. —Eastern News Agency.

PAWN SHOP FIRE IN TIENTSIN

$70,000 Worth of Damage

TIENTSIN NEWS SERVICE.

Tientsin, May 17.

Seventy thousand dollars damage caused by a fire breaking out at 11 o'clock last night in the Yuen Shun Pawnshop, Asahi Road, opposite Laou Kiu-chwang's silk store, Japanese Concession. The building is of modern type three storeys, and, with the contents, was insured for $100,000 with foreign companies.

The only explanation of the outbreak is that electric wires fused somewhere on the top floor, which was quickly ablaze. The entire contents of this floor were destroyed by fire, while materials on the two lower floors suffered badly by water damage. The Brigades, including the French Municipal Volunteers, gained control of the fire after an hour's battle, but not before the entire roof had collapsed into the top storey.

MANILA IN DANGER FROM EARTHQUAKE

Same Geological Formation as in Yokohama: Building Precautions to Take

Manila, May 7.

That Manila may at almost any time be visited by an earthquake such as destroyed Yokohama last September, is the warning given by Father Roque Ruano, Professor of Physics and Engineering in the University of Santo Tomas, who has just returned from a visit of several months in Japan where he studied the effect of earthquakes in that country.

"The Philippines lie in the same seismic zone as does the earthquake region of Japan, and conditions in Manila are analogous in many respects to those found in Yokohama," said Father Ruano. "The same sub-soil that is found in Yokohama is found here and building construction is practically identical.

"Pile foundations used in Manila almost exclusively should be discarded for the spread foundation type which was found more resistant to heavy earthquake shocks than the older type. Water pipes, sewers and gas mains are too near the surface of the ground for protection in case of a severe earthquake. Breaks might be avoided if the mains were placed deep enough in the ground to avoid surface oscillation."

He recommends that a committee of geologists and scientists be appointed to study the earthquake regions of the Philippines and make a report in order to impress upon the people the necessity of preparing as far as possible for a severe quake which may occur at any time. —Reuter's Pacific Service.

VISIT TO A CHEKIANG PRISON

Praiseworthy Management of Prisoners: Money They Can Earn: Hygiene and Good Usage

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Shaohsing, Chê., May 16.

A recent visitor was very desirous of seeing the district prison. After securing permission from the magistrate the visit was made yesterday afternoon. The warden, a Kuangsi man who has had charge of the prison for ten years, showed every courtesy. The buildings are old and the grant for maintenance altogether inadequate. Notwithstanding these handicaps there was a degree of cleanliness about the place that gave promise of better things whenever an adequate building can be secured. The warden, however, was not optimistic about securing such a building at an early date as Hangchow is the only district in Chêkiang which has a modern building. In Ningpo a modern building is being erected near the North Gate. According to government rating Shaohsing will be the fifth district to secure a new building. In the meantime such devices as can be used on an old building are invoked to give light and air. Ventilator shafts have been placed in all the cells and also small openings along the floor to allow for the circulation of air. The upper half of the doors are of open work thereby admitting sunlight and air.

One of the interesting things case ever coming into court. which we saw was a lecture hall in which were seated some 30 odd men listening to a lecture by a Buddhist. The warden explained that since there were so many Buddhists in Shaohsing he had decided to have these Buddhist lectures with a view to improving the moral life of the prisoners.

My friend, who is a professor of sociology and much interested in prison reform, was impressed by the plan whereby prisoners are paid wages for work done in prison. Shaohsing being a great centre for the manufacture of spirit-money has made it possible for the warden to open a shop for the beaters. The product is marketed in the city and from one to two fifths of a man's earnings are saved for him. A part of these wages is given to him for important needs while in prison or to be sent to his family and the remainder saved for him as a nest egg when he goes out. After a man leaves the prison the authorities keep track of him through the police until they are satisfied that he has established himself economically.

Sentences are shortened for good behaviour. A five-year term may be reduced to four by good conduct. Only the more serious offenders are shackled on the legs and none of the prisoners are bound at the wrists.

It is significant that in a district with a population of 1,119,000 there should be only 190 odd prisoners in the district prison. One explanation must be found in the inherent good nature of the Chinese and a further explanation may be in the fact that so many matters are settled locally by the parties immediately concerned without the case ever coming into court.

TZELIUTSING NOTES

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Tzeliutsing, Sze., Apr. 30.

We are now enjoying a period of quiet, as only a small percentage of the previous military force are here. It is still difficult to secure carriers for either chairs or merchandise and as there has been little rain the previous market prices have not returned to normal. The country about seems quiet from brigands and good rains in neighbouring counties have made the people more hopeful.

Last week we were favoured by a visit from the British Consul, Mr. Combe, of Chêngtu. He is much interested in the great salt industry. While on leave he intends to visit Tatsienlu, 15 days west of here, on the Big Road toward Batang.

THE Peking Tramway service will begin operations on July 1, reports the "Eastern Times."

JAPANESE GOVERNMENT'S DEFEAT

For First Time the Opposition Wins Clear Victory in General Election: Democracy's Warning to Bureaucracy: Power of the Elder Statesmen Still to Overcome

By Alfred E. Pieres

Tokio, May 14.

For the first time in the history of [illegible] illustrious Emperor Meiji, the Government [illegible] ended, which has resulted in the Opposition [illegible] ity of 100 over the Government [illegible] the fifteenth general election that this country has had. General elections in Japan, up to the present, have simply been a troublesome and cumbersome means for returning a Government majority to the House of Representatives. Accepted practices in the conduct of elections have always provided ample insurance and assurance that the Government party will not suffer disaster. All this has now changed, and the accepted old order is giving way to a new one.

The success achieved by the Opposition is a tangible expression of the lack of confidence felt by the nation in regard to the ability of Viscount Kiyoura and his official family to conduct the affairs of the country, a distrust that brought forth bitter censure from press, platform and pulpit, for even priestly sermons often turned on the less ethereal subject of the Cabinet in power. Viewed broadly, the election results show that constitutionalism in Japan has taken a distinct step forward, and even the astutest follower of, and sympathizer with, Japan's fight for a larger measure of popular control in the affairs of the nation was not prepared to admit that the electorate had progressed to the point where the conduct of the politics of the country has come to a new parting of the ways.

The issues in the election battle were clear-cut. In fact, there was one main issue—whether bureaucracy, albeit in a paternal form, or democracy, in the sense of party [illegible] thority, should prevail. The forces were evenly matched. In fact, the Government had the advantages of possessing the bigger election chest and the tremendous moral power that comes from being trusted by the Throne. Nevertheless, the Government went down to ignominious defeat.

There are no signs that the Government is prepared to hand over control to the victorious Opposition. Viscount Kiyoura is for resigning, declaring that he undertook to form a Cabinet only until after the Prince Regent's wedding had been celebrated. Other members of the Cabinet, however, Dr. Rentaro Midzuno, the Home Minister, in particular, are insisting on carrying on as though the elections had not gone against the Government. The indications now point to the Government party focussing all its attention on the Independents with the object of coaxing them over to the official fold and thereby attaining a strength at least equal to the most numerical of the Opposition parties, namely the Kenseikai. A high official of the Home Department to whom [illegible] while the election results were coming in, registering defeat after defeat for the Government, in reply to a question, laconically remarked: "The [illegible] think that Prime Ministerial bees are buzzing around their heads."

The Elder Statesmen.

One thing is certain. In the event of the Kiyoura Government not resigning, or the Opposition not being permitted to form a party cabinet, the next session of the Diet will assemble in a very strained atmosphere and a vote of non-confidence will form the main business of the Opposition which, with its large majority, could roughly unseat the Government. When indications of a vote of non-confidence became apparent during the last session of the Diet, Viscount Kiyoura dissolved it and went to the country. Will the Premier do likewise again? Can he? There are only two courses open to Premier Kiyoura—dissolution again and another general election, or resignation.

In discussing Japanese politics, however, one has always to take into consideration the powerful influence of the Genro, or the Elder Statesmen, the hidden power behind the Throne. Like the President of the French Republic, these elder statesmen—there are only two alive now, Prince Matsukata and Prince Saionji—are virtual dictators during the period intervening between the fall of a Cabinet and the formation of a new Ministry. In fact, the Genro enjoy powers even greater than those of the French President for, while the latter consults the leaders of the legislative chambers before an appointment is made, the Genro need not do anything of the sort and are responsible only to themselves for whatever action they may take. For formality's sake, the Emperor is supposed to appoint the new Premier. In practice and reality, the Genro do so.

Possible Next Premier.

If Viscount Kiyoura and his official family decide to throw up the sponge and step out of office, there are Opposition leaders, with experience in the conduct of State affairs, who are ready to step in. Viscount Kato, leader of the Kenseikai, the largest Opposition party now—in fact, the largest single party in the new Diet—is already being spoken about as the next Premier. He is a capable man, for universal manhood suffrage and in a re-orientation of Japan's foreign policy, especially with regard to Russia and China and other Asiatic nations. There is one drawback to Viscount Kato as Premier, this being that, when Minister of Foreign Affairs in the Okuma Cabinet in 1915, he vigorously advocated the use of the big stick towards China and was the author of the notorious Twenty-One Demands, the very mention of which rocks China with passion. Just at the present time, when there is much talk of capitalizing China's goodwill, "especially in view of the American immigration legislation" as one vernacular paper puts it, Viscount Kato is not being particularly lionized. But it is possible the Viscount Kato has changed considerably during the past decade.

Mr. Takahashi, who dramatically flung away his peerage and stepped down to the ranks of the commoners to fight against the "satanic attempt" of Viscount Kiyoura to "throttle constitutionalism," was once Prime Minister succeeding the murdered Mr. Hara. His tenure of office was notable for nothing being done. As a matter of fact, astute leaders of the Seiyukai (then the largest party in the Lower House) simply used unsuspecting Mr. Takahashi to further their own ambitions. Mr. Takahashi, so far as indications show, is not anxious to appear in an official cast again.

Mr. Yukio Ozaki, at one time Minister of Justice and easily the foremost Liberal in Japan, will very likely be included in the next Cabinet if this is formed by the Kenseikai or by a coalition of the Opposition parties. If his services are enlisted, then the Cabinet will possess one of the most brilliant and most refined intellects in the Empire and a man whose sincerity of purpose and integrity cannot be doubted. Mr. Ozaki is also a warm supporter of anything that tends to the reduction of armaments. Hjs views on disarmament include not merely the scrapping of engines of destruction, but also the creating of an atmosphere of understanding where suspicion lurks. This, he calls "mental disarmament," and insists that it is necessary as the scrapping of warships or the reduction of armies, if the battle-flag must be kept furled. These are the main figures in the Opposition camp today and are likely Cabinet timber.

RAILWAY COLLISION NEAR TOKIO

JAPANESE PEERESS SHOPKEEPER

Viscountess Inouye Who Sells Perfumes as Relief from Boredom of Society

From Our Own Correspondent.

Tokio, May 11.

Unhappy in her life as a leader of society, bored with being one of the moving spirits in Tokio's smart set, Viscountess Inouyé, daughter of one of the leading statesmen of the early Meiji era, now runs a modest little perfumery store in a narrow street in Shitaya, one of the least pretentious of the many districts into which the huge and straggling capital of the Japanese Empire is divided.

There is nothing that particularly distinguishes this shop from scores of others in Tokio, and thousands on thousands pass it every day, not in the least aware that a titled woman, daughter of one of Japan's oldest aristocrats, is ready to step forth, a prim apron partially hiding her beautiful kimono, and attend to the wants of anyone who enters within the sliding doors that mark the entrance.

Viscountess Inouyé had a very unhappy married life. Her parents had no male issue and consequently there was no masculine heir to carry on the traditions of the Inouyé house. In accordance with Japanese customs, a yoshi (adopted son) was taken into the family and to him was given the family title, all the honour and authority that goes with it and the hand of the daughter of the house. Domestic infelicity led Viscountess Inouyé to throw herself into the whirl of social pleasures, but these soon palled and she decided to take to business instead.

Tired of Idleness

As was to be expected, her suggestion to run a store caused her relatives and friends to hold up their hands high up in holy horror. A member of the peerage to become sullied with sordid commercialism. All manner of argument was marshaled to dissuade her. She was told that it was not at all necessary that she should have to earn her livelihood, while such a step as she proposed taking, others insisted, would reflect on the prestige not only of her own noble house, but also on that of other titled families.

Viscountess Inouyé was obdurate, however, and declared that she would work out her own destiny and lead her own life. The result was this modest perfumery store in Shitaya.

"The desire to do something instead of leading an idle life," she told your correspondent, "came to me when I realized how empty was my existence, how I was living to no purpose. I had many trials and tribulation and believed that the best way to be happy would be to work and be independent."

Viscountess Inouyé is a woman of handsome lineaments and fully looks the daughter of a family claiming to have blue blood in its veins. She is of medium height and has well-chiselled features. Her looks belie her age and her talk is a interesting and attractive as is her face.

"This store of mine is not the result of a fad, one of those notions to do something unusual and be talked about," she continued as she offered me a cup of tea and motioned to me to be seated. "My old life was unhappy and I wanted something to take my mind off it and to enable me to forget it."

Peeress and Geisha

Viscountess Inouyé looks after her little shop single-handed. No maid or sales-girl assists her, although there are several in Tokio who would just jump at the idea of working with and for her, without any remuneration whatsoever. A glance round showed me that the potions and lotion that womankind the world over deems to be absolutely necessary were mostly imported from France. "Yes," she replied in answer to a question, "French powders, perfumes and cosmetics are what the Japanese young women demand now. They are nothing if not Parisian in their powder-and-perfume tastes." I looked to see whether there was not a tinge of sarcasm, but the lips did not twitch a bit. "Anything from Paris," continued the Viscountess, "is accepted without the slightest demur."

Needless to add, there is a constant stream of people visiting the store every day. The Viscountess' friends alone would make quite a tidy number of customers. Then there are those who are attracted because a titled lady serves them and the number of these increases every day.

"The place is becoming busier as day succeeds day and is also thus too small," she remarked. Just then a treble "Good Afternoon" was heard, the voice of a customer in the main room. Excusing herself she hurried to attend to her latest customer. I took a look at the latter. It was a geisha.

DEMAND FOR MOTORS IN NORTH CHINA

Orders Pouring in from Every Quarter for Freight Cars and Passenger Buses

Tientsin News Service.

Tientsin, May 16.

Big activities all over the Northern provinces are reported in motor-transportation and many of the Tientsin, Peking and Shanghai dealers are deluged with inquiries and orders for passenger and freight cars. Early summer usually sees a certain amount of activity but nothing like the present has ever been known. Sales records this season will undoubtedly break all previous records many times over.

The Chefoo-Weihsien Transportation Company has placed orders in Tientsin for 10 Dodge Brothers "screen" bodied convertible passenger and freight cars, and two White trucks. Two months ago they purchased six one-ton Ford trucks with 10 passenger bodies, all of which have been delivered. The same company has placed a substantial order, it is reported, in Shanghai, for Buick cars, with 10-passenger bodies.

The Chinese have at last awakened to the possibilities of motor-transport for inquiries are coming in from the most remote places. Merchants in small towns several miles away from railway lines write saying they have heard of the advantages of quick transport and wish to buy "50-passenger" buses! Nearly all the dozen or more companies already in existence are increasing their services and branching out with bus lines to other towns in their neighbourhood.

It has been proved many times over that light 10-passenger trucks, of one or one and a half tons, are the best for use on dirt roads in the northern provinces. The soft roads will not stand up under anything heavier and it is with the greatest difficulty that newcomers into the field of transportation are convinced that they cannot successfully use "50-passenger" cars.

Motoring in the Gobi.

A great deal of activity is also reported from lines using the Gobi desert, especially in connexion with freight. It seems that the constantly cut passenger rates have reduced profit in that business to a minimum, and most of the lines are turning their attention to freight. They are converting their cars and buying new ones for freight service only.

The principal reason given for the remarkable activity, besides the native awakening to the benefits of motor-transport, is the general belief that there will not be a Chihli-Fengtien war this year. The Chinese have come to the conclusion that the dissension in the Chihli party prevents it taking any hostile stand vis-á-vis of Chang Tso-lin, while, at the same time, they consider Chang is too busy with his own affairs, consolidating his position in Manchuria and watching the outcome of Russian movements in the north, to pay any attention to Peking affairs.

It is reported from Hangchow that a village woman in Supengchiao some time ago gave birth to a child with a body like a snake, and its father, it is said, will send it up to Peking for exhibition.

An unusual accident occurred to the China Navigation Company's str. Foochow at Newchwang some 10 days ago. The vessel was leaving the port, and the task of casting off her mooring chain was in progress. When letting go the chain it fell aslant of the rudder and damaged the rudder post making her unnavigable, with the result that she had to be towed back to Shanghai where she will undergo repairs.

OUTLAWS IN HANG-CHOW

Tobacco Merchant Held up for Tls. 20,000: Well-to-do People Terrified

From Our Own Correspondent.

Hangchow, May 12.

The tufei have been doing very bold things in the city lately. They threatened a big tobacco merchant, who went indoors to get the Tls. 20,000 demanded and made his escape by the back door, but we are told they caught the same train and accompanied him to his home near Ningpo. They have been putting the fear of death in not a few respectable monied people within the last month. Surely the time has come for somebody to help China to put her house in order.

There was little observance taken of the National Humiliation Day here. No demonstration by students, although some of them gave vent to their feelings in their own school, and, in the schools which did not give a holiday, some of the students and two or three of the teachers took the law into their own hands and absented themselves. We thought that a penitent stool would have been more appropriate than a holiday.

The C.M.S. Conference finished its deliberations on Thursday. It took a big step in the movement towards devolution in agreeing to hand over its primary schools and evangelistic work to the Chinese Church. The Secretary of the Mission, Mr. T. Gaunt, generously volunteered to go for a time to Shaohsing to open the middle school in memory of Mr. King, who was killed at Mokanshan two years ago in the typhoon. The Shanghai Cathedral does much to support this school.

For the last 10 days the weather has been bad, and that is putting it mildly. The Easter visitors were blessed with glorious weather, but those who ran away from the races were not so favoured.

AMERICAN AMBASSADOR IN TOKIO

Resignation of Mr. Cyrus Woods for Family Reasons

Washington, May 19.

Mr. Cyrus E. Woods has asked to be relieved of the duties of American Ambassador to Japan.

It is not known whether Mr. Woods's resignation is connected with his recent speech in Tokio disapproving the American Immigration Bill.

Later.

Friends of Mr. Woods attribute his resignation to the ill-health of his mother-in-law, who was injured during the earthquake.—Reuter's American Service.

Tokio, May 19.

The American Ambassador, Mr. Cyrus E. Woods, confirms the reports from Washington of his resignation, which he tendered for family reasons, his mother-in-law's illness rendering his early return to the United States imperative. He said that the termination of the immigration crisis permitted him to yield to family reasons.

Mr. Woods expressed his confidence that in the long run the relations detween the United States and Japan would continue friendly. He said that he admired the dignity and restraint which the Japanese Government and people had shown in the crisis.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Washington, May 20.

President Coolidge has accepted the resignation of Mr. Cyrus E. Woods, United States Ambassador in Tokio, which was tendered by Mr. Woods for family reasons.—Reuter's American Service.

Tokio, May 21.

All sections of the press and public to-day unite in eulogizing Mr. Cyrus E. Woods, the American Ambassador, and regretting his resignation.

The "Jiji" typically remarks:—"Few American Ambassadors ever won greater respect and affection from the Japanese. Even the feelings engendered by the Immigration legislation do not alter the fact that Japan is most grateful to Mr. Woods for his presentation of Japan's cause in it's true light."—Reuter's Pacific Service.

JAPAN MUCH WORRIED OVER THE STATE OF HER TRADE

Imports Vastly Exceeding Exports

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Tokio, May 10.

Financial and commercial Japan is more worried to-day about the country's economic condition than about the immigration question or as regards the result of the general elections.

An official statement estimates that the foreign trade during the month of April has resulted in an excess of imports over exports to the value of Yen 106,000,000 bringing the total value of the adverse balance of trade since January this year to Yen 583,820,000, unprecedent in the commercial history of these islands. Not only is this adverse balance immensely in excess of the adverse trade balance that the country has faced during corresponding periods of other bad business years, but additional statistics go to show that the export trade will be far from flourishing for some time to come. The importation of raw cotton, an item that figures largely in Japan's export manufacturing activities, has been much less active during these past months than during the early half of last year, and this leads merchants to entertain a fear that the immediate future of the country's export trade is far from reassuring, for, after raw silk, cotton manufactures, especially to China and India, form the next most important item in Japan's export trade.

Towards the end of April, however, there was a remarkable decrease in the value of imports and the lull, which was expected to follow the re-imposition of customs duties at the end of March, has now definitely set in.

It is usually during the second half of the year that the export trade of Japan shows the best results. The first six months of the year are generally adverse to this country, but the latter half generally makes up for the excess of imports over exports in the previous six-month period. The present excess of imports over exports, however, is so great—a total value of nearly Yen 600,000,000 in four months—that it is exercising a very depressing influence over industrial princes, financial captains and merchant magnates, especially as this adverse balance of trade for four months is three times as large as that of the worst year Japan's trade has yet experienced. Little hopes are entertained that the export business for the remainder of 1924 will pick up to an extent sufficient to counter-balance the unpropitious effects already sustained.

Earthquake Mentality

On all sides the necessity for economy is being urged on the people. The most recent of those to call attention to this need has been Mr. Ichinomiya, vice-president of the Yokohama Specie Bank, who stressed the fact that, unless the people realize that the abandonment of non-essentials is indispensable for the rehabilitation of Japan's financial status and put their convictions into practice, whatever steps the authorities may take will not fail to bring about the desired results.

Some of the largest stores in the country are stocked full of imported goods, especially those well-known department stores, the Mitsukoshi and the Shirokiya, which are two of the landmarks of Tokio's shopping district. From morn till night customers pour in through their large folding doors in steady streams. The disparity between the Japanese unit of currency and the American dollar or the pound sterling has not yet become so wide that the average person can no longer afford to buy foreign goods.

The Yokohama customs house presents a sight of pile upon pile of merchandise from foreign lands—articles that cannot be manufactured here and which are far from indispensable to the daily life of the citizens. To the average Japanese the fall of the yen carries no meaning as yet. The fear of earthquakes still beclouds the mental outlook of the people and the general feeling seems to be to make the best of life before the next fatal blow falls.

All classes in the country are prepared for a further fall in the value of the yen. It can safely be said, however, that the Japanese unit of currency will not go even remotely anywhere near the regions traversed by the Russian rouble or the German mark, for the Bank of Japan—a State financial institution—holds enough gold to cover the note circulation on the market immediately and entirely. The drop in the value of the yen is not due to the loss of credit in the stability of Japan's currency system or to any anxieties regarding her financial stability, but rather to the loss of proportion between exports and imports, due to the huge amount of goods indented from abroad for reconstruction purposes. When imports and exports adjust themselves to a more proportionate ratio, the yen can be depended on to pick up.

Reconstruction needs have now been met, but the excess of imports over exports continues, largely because of the luxurious habits to which the Japanese became wedded since the European war when money was easily and rapidly made, when wages became inflated and prices soared proportionately, and when the nation abandoned its former modes of living, modes of Spartan simplicity, as became buoyed on the crest of the war-boom wave.

Despite the heroic examples of unostentatious, simple living that the Empress, the Prince Regent and the Crown Prince are setting before the people every day, and despite the fact that every unnecessary indulgence plunges the country into yet deeper financial entanglements—the latter an argument that would have appealed to the patriotic sense of the Japanese only a short while ago—the people in general have not been able to shake off the insidious clutch that luxuries have on them.

What is the reason for this "dancing on the crater of the volcano" as the Governor of the Bank of Japan characterized this trait in the people? In the stricken regions it is due, I believe, to the fact that the people are yet mentally in the grip of earthquakes and the dire consequences of seismic upheavals, for the horrors of last year are fresh in the memory of everyone who went through them. The people desire to make the most of what years of life might yet be spared to them. This is also responsible for the wave of flippancy, levity and frivolity to be seen all around. The women have grown to be even more reckless than the men. The recklessness is so brazen and shameless in some instances that it puzzles and baffles the old-time resident. This is the case in the stricken regions especially and explains to a large extent, why the appeals to abstain from luxuries, especially those imported, fall on deaf ears. In the regions that were spared the charnel-house horrors of last year the self-indulgence evident can only be explained by the fact that the canker of luxurious living, born of the recent war, has spread too far and only some drastic operation can root it out.

SERIOUS FIRE IN JAPAN

Tokio, May 16.

The principal streets of the town of Hachinohe in Aomori Prefecture were gutted by a fire, which lasted three and a half hours early this morning. A thousand houses, including many of the principal buildings, were burned down. The casualties are not known.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

The fire, which may be attributed to a neglected "Firebox," destroyed nearly half the town, including all public buildings. The number of casualties and other details cannot be ascertained at present.

PHILIPPINES' WIRELESS EQUIPMENT

Manila, May 6.

The Philippine Government now has a total of 28 wireless stations in the archipelago, reaching from Basco, Batanes Islands on the north to Jolo on the south. In a number of instances the Government has abandoned cable lines connecting various islands on account of the expense of maintenance and has substituted wireless stations.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

ROBBERS BROUGHT TO THE BLOCK

Praiseworthy Police Work at Huaiking (Ho.): Famine Averted by Recent Rains

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Huaiking, Honan, May 8.

Following the looting of Menghsien city last autumn there were many local cases of daring robbery and banditry. It seemed at the time that most of the bad characters were going to escape the hands of the law. During the past three months, however, some clever secret service work has brought to trial and to the block some culprits that have been a menace to the district for several years. Many more are still at large but their hiding places are known.

Three villians were beheaded a few days ago outside the north gate.

When the much-prayed-for rain followed the next day one man was heard to say, "Lao Tien Yeh (the Old God of the Heavens), by giving rain to the parched land, was just showing his appreciation of the act of justice on the part of the official for beheading the three bandit leaders."

It is a very welcome sound to hear the eves running again after eight months drought. In some places the Chinese are remarking about the timely spring rains that have recently fallen. This is not altogether true because much of the wheat has been dried up for want of moisture, and it is only on the irrigated fields that the wheat yield will now be increased. The wheat fields that should have given a harvest are now being sown with cotton and maize since the rain has fallen.

The Chingmeng extension of the Taoching railway is now showing signs of coming into being. The work of grading the road was to have been a famine measure of four years ago. Since that time there has been wild speculation in land. Much delay has been caused by landholders wanting a high price per mow for the Railway line itself. It is reported on good authority that one wealthy Chinese in company with his friends purchased in advance about ten li of the railway line when the buying was good; afterwards prices advanced considerably and he was standing a fair chance of easily made money. However, now the original holders, finding out that he was an advance buyer and not an official buyer, are after his blood as well as more money. At present he in hiding and the case is up before the local magistrate.

PANCHAN LAMA'S VISIT TO PEKING

Peking, May 13.

Gen. Lu Hung-tao, Tuli of Kansu, in reporting the arrival of the Panchan Lama at Suchow, says that the Lama is staying at the Tahfusu Temple. The Lama informed the Suchow Taoyin that he could not leave there for Peking immediately, as he had no Chinese interpreter. Gen. Lu adds that he sent a message to the Lama saying that he would furnish the necessary interpreters at once, in accordance with the Government's instructions, and requesting that there be no delay in the Panchan Lama's journey on to Peking.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Peking, May 16.

Premier Sun Pao-chi has suggested and the President has approved the appointment of two additional commissioners to welcome the Panchan Lama, namely, the Minchuer Hutuktu and Mr. Tung Shih-en. The Minchuer Hutuktu, who arrived in Peking some time ago to attend the Mongolian conference, has his headquarters in Kokonor. He speaks the Tibetan language fluently. Mr. Tung is supposed to be an expert on frontier affairs.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Peking, May 18.

The Mongolian and Tibetan Affairs Department has received no further word from the Panchan Lama who, with his entourage of 72 people, is supposed to be still at Suchow.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

MAJOR J. L. Isler, the Swiss Consul-General, left for Peking on Sunday on an official visit. He will remain there for about a month.

FRANCO-JAPANESE ENTENTE

Premature Reports as to Commercial Agreement

Tokio May 19.

The French and Japanese representatives have reached an informal agreement to grant to Japan most favoured nation treatment concerning the Customs of Indo-China in principle though reserving the right to fix protective duties on articles which might possibly compete with Indo-China or French industries.

The agreement will be submitted to Paris where a new commercial treaty is now being discussed, but it is understood that the agreement concerning Indo-China will be a separate document.

M. Merlin, the Governor-General of Indo-China, will leave here tomorrow. On his homeward journey he will visit Kioto, Nara and elsewhere.

According to a Foreign Office representative, no political questions or understandings were discussed during the visit of M. Merlin.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Tokio, May 20.

M. Merlin, the Governor-General of Indo-China, and his party left for Kioto this morning. They were seen off by Baron Matsui, the Foreign Minister, officials of the Foreign Office and Municipal authorities.

Later.

Before leaving Tokio M. Merlin donated Y. 5,000 for the relief of the poor in Tokio and Y. 2,000 for the relief of the poor in Yokohama.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Paris, May 20.

Telegrams which were published in the press announcing the conclusion of a preliminary Franco-Japanese commercial convention are described as incorrect in a semi-official statement, which adds that the French Government had simply instructed M. Merlin, the Governor-General of Indo-China, to consider in concert with the Japanese Government means of improving relations between Indo-China and Japan. M. Merlin had not made his report yet. The statement says that no agreement could be made until the negotiators of both countries had met in Paris.

The French Government had informed Tokio of their willingness to negotiate a proper commercial convention to replace the existing temporary agreement, but they await the result of M. Merlin's conversations before negotiation in Paris.—Reuter.

MR. F. W. CAREY LEAVES NINGPO

Royal Send-Off of a Popular Commissioner of Customs

Mr. F. W. Carey, Commissioner-designate of Customs at Swatow, was given a most enthusiastic send-off on his leaving Ningpo to take up his new appointment. Mr. Carey's outstandingly brilliant work in connexion with famine relief work made his departure a real blow to Ningpo and the big famine-affected districts of this part of the province of Chêkiang.

The large numbers of Chinese officials and notables who assembled on Monday afternoon to bid Mr. Carey farewell were a sufficient criterion of the value of his public work here during the last three and a half years.

At Chinhai the C.M.S. Kiangteen was met by a deputation of the local merchants, and a guard of honour was drawn up upon the wharf. Mrs. and Mrs. Carey were entertained at tea by the Magistrate and merchants of Chinhai.

The Kiangteen moved out later honoured by dipping flags from the Customs masts, and Square Island Light-station fired a parting salute to the best-loved Commissioner who has ever occupied the old port of Ningpo.

NAVAL RETRENCHMENT IN JAPAN

Tokio, May 21.

Following on the dismissal yesterday of 1,700 employees by the Naval Arsenals, the Military Arsenal to-day announces the discharge of 2,000 employees, in accordance with the policy of retrenchment.—Repter's Pacific Service.

GREAT DROUGHT IN CHIHLI

90 Days Without Rain: Dust Thick and Choking and Sickness Rife

TIENTSIN NEWS SERVICE.

Tientsin, May 15.

When will the rains come? This question is asked by hundreds of persons in North China, farmers, merchants and everyone interested in the climate whether from business or personal reasons. This spring is considered by many old residents to have been the windiest, dryest and dustiest on record. For close on 90 days this region has been visited by almost incessant wind and dust storms. Only one of the storms emanated from the Gobi desert, but the direction of the wind was a little too much to the west to get the full benefit of its red, choking dust. For a few days this week it seemed as though the wind had blown itself out, but yesterday it came up strongly again from the north, raking up clouds of local dust. It was too windy to play tennis, for control of the ball was impossible. Again this morning a somewhat milder blow started, but died away late in the afternoon.

The dust permeates anything not hermetically sealed, and even then we have some doubts. Even the mercury in our thermometer looks dusty. With the dust has spread several slight epidemics of measles and scarlet fever, for hardly a family has escaped mild cases of one of these two ailments. There were more than 40 cases of measles in April among the foreign children. If there had been rain more than 50 per cent. of the dust would have been laid or washed away into the creeks and rivers. As it is there has been no rain this year, apart from an hour's drizzle that was too slight to register. There was snow in February, quite a heavy fall, and some good falls before that all through the winter. These have saved the spring crops, for without them they must have perished in the ensuing three months' drought.

The lack of rain is hurting the water supply in Peitaiho Beach wells, some of which are nearly dry. One well, typical of many others, has been gradually reduced from 15 ft. of water to 12 in., a low spot it never reached before.

The Chinese have issued orders to native butchers to refrain from killing pigs for three days and the third day expires to-morrow. This is deemed to be an unfailing method of rain-making. It is believed that the angels see the joke and laugh till the tears run down their cheeks. Hence the rain.

However, whether they stop killing pigs, or killing time or killing long-winded stories on the weather like this one, the fact remains this region is badly in need of rain.

MOBBING OF TWO BRITISH SUBJECTS IN ILOILO

Manila, May 22.

Major Burton Read, aide-de-camp to Governor-General Wood and special investigator of the alleged maltreatment of two British subjects, Mr. A. T. Kay and Mr. E. L. Brown, at Iloilo by a Filipino mob recently, recommends the suspension of Mr. Arcosa, Chief of Police at Iloilo, and the forfeiture of his pay.

Major Read says that the Police Chief used unnecessary violence in arresting the Britons, and also humiliated them by conducting them, after arrest, through the auditorium of the Iloilo Carnival grounds in sight of a large crowd of Filipinos and others. Major Read finds that the Britons might have avoided the row by the exercise of a greater measure of tact at the beginning of the altercation.

Governor-General Wood is expected to approve of the recommendation to suspend Mr. Arcosa.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

GEN. Lu Yung-hsiang, Tupan of Chekiang, has, in reponse to a request from the Chinese Silk Guild, signified his willingness to place troops on the railway and water-routes in Chekiang for the purpose of protecting silk and cocoon carriers during the present season. Chekiang is evidently not the law-abiding province of six months ago.

GEN. YANG SEN ON "CLEAN SPORT"

Huge Athletic Meeting Organized by General Ends in Chaos

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Chêngtu, Sze., Apr. 30.

Last week Gen. Yang Sen was responsible for a big athletic field meeting participated in by over 30 schools. Ten thousand students were present while nearly 50,000 interested spectators looked on for two days. The meeting was held on the large parade ground at the southwest corner of the city. The city wall running along two sides of the field afforded an excellent grandstand for the sightseers who were not slow to take advantage [illegible]. They crowded every inch of space on the wall itself and the grassy slopes leading up to it. It made a very pretty sight altogether. All the schools carried large banners. The grandstands and bandstands were plentifully decorated, a quarter-mile circular track ran round the field for the track events, the lanes were carefully marked out, special places were prepared for the field events, and the great centre was reserved for the mass games, Chinese-boxing and Boy Scout manœuvres. Gen. Yang Sen was present both days with his military staff and ample military forces to keep order and assist in the programme. The meeting was in charge of Mr. Lu, the genial Physical Director of the Teacher's College. He had an able staff with him and called half a dozen foreign teachers to assist him and act as judges. He had things splendidly organized and his committee men worked strenuously and most loyally with him—yet the meeting was doomed to failure.

A feature that seems most objectionable in Chinese athletic meetings is the host of men that are appointed by the schools to act as Red Cross men and take care of the athletics as they finish. When only a few schools compete the problem does not loom large, but when over 30 schools compete and each school appoints about 10 men each to catch their winners then the scene at the finish is pandemonium. The judges have no chance to make their decisions. The cheering students press in with their favourite and each cries "my man is first," my man is second" and any poor Chinese judge that dares have an opinion of his own is very roughly handled by the students.

The foreign judges attempted to bring order out of chaos and soldiers were stationed at the finish with instructions not to use force—just to keep the Red Cross men at least 10 feet off the finish. Then the foreign judges came in for abuse at the mouths of the students. Several races were stopped while the rules were made clear, but it was evident the students did not want rules, they wanted their men to win whether by fair or foul means.

Physical Director Mobbed.

At about 3 o'clock on the second day the situation became unbearable, especially when Mr. Lu, the fair-minded director was almost [illegible] by the students. He decided to call the meeting off, and so terminated. Prizes were given for what races had been run. The West China Union University athletes easily won first place.

One of the features of the meeting was the splendid exhibition of the Boy Scouts. Some 10 troops are now organized in the city, and they did some pretty massed work under the supervision of Mr. Shie, a young director that came from the east with Gen. Yang Sen. Both he and Mr. Lu, the Physical Director, received much of their training with the Nanking Y. M. C. A. Physical Department. To them must be given credit for what [illegible] attended the meeting. They were unfailing in their efforts to make things go. At the conclusion of the two days' "sport," Gen. Yang Sen called all the athletes round him and addressed them on "clean sport."

ACCORDING to the "Eastern Times" Marshal Hsiao Yao-nan, Governor-General of Hunan and Hupeh, has ordered from a British firm, a large quantity of copper sheet, with which to make coins. Meanwhile, the Changsha authorities have cancelled their order prohibiting the export of copper coins.

YUNNAN TUCHUN'S MEMORIAL

Piece of Much Appreciated Public Work to Celebrate His Regaining the Province

FROM A CORRESPONDENT.

Yunnanfu, May 3.

There have been great festivities in Yunnanfu at the unveiling of the obelisk commemorating the return of Tang Chi-yao—who it will be remembered was driven out by Gen. Kao when the latter returned from Szechuan in 1921—but who after 12 months in Hongkong fought his way back in the spring of 1922 and regained his old position as governor of the province.

The commemoration took the form of a complete alteration in the South Gate. For many years this has been a most dangerous place For all the chief business portion of the city centres round this spot, and the congestion of traffic through the gate has been a real source of danger even when such minor excitement as a big funeral, attracted a crowd.

A few years ago, another city gate was opened in the south wall, near the southeast corner, but this did not appreciably relieve the situation. The city fathers, with the Governor Tang Chi-yao at their head, decided to alter the main south gate.

Part of the wall each side of the gate was demolished and the outer part of the gate removed.

The result was a big open space with three openings into the city on its north side. viz:—the remains of the old city gate with its superimposed tower and two entrances—one on each side. The open space has been levelled and planned to be circular with a garden in the centre, a wide road all round, and shops on its outer side. The garden has been enclosed by a light railing and turf, flowering shrubs and fir trees planted. In each of the four quadrants is a fountain which gives a very pleasing effect. In the centre is a copper obelisk standing on a square base of solid masonry. This bears the inscription commemorating Tang Chi-yao's return.

The remains of the old gate, very like the Chien Mên in Peking, have been restored and redecorated and stone steps provide an entrance and exit on each side. The first floor provides a large reception hall while above is a museum with works of art, both local and general.

An Aeroplane in the Picture

On May 1, there was the official opening. At noon Tang Chi-yao, now civil governor, attended by his staff arrived, and after being received by the Mayor proceeded to the platform over the gate for the unveiling of the obelisk. A salute was fired and the drapery, made [illegible]. The national emblems were [illegible]. Chairs were placed for the Governor and for the Governor, while one of the new aeroplanes circling overhead, gave an exhibition of nose-diving, etc.

All the officials then paid their respect in the large reception room and refreshments were served. The Governor proceeded to inspect the museum, etc., and later descended from above the gate and proceeded to the garden and to get a near view of the obelisk. He then passed through the arch of the old gate on foot and entered his chair to return to his Yamen. In the evening the gardens were festooned with coloured electric lights and a big firework display brought the day to a close.

Idosyncracies of the River: Extraordinary Tides and Stoppage of Shipping

Ichang, May 16.

The Yangtze at Chungking has been very late in rising this year, and the summer time steamers have had a strange experience. Most of them left here four weeks ago, and got safely up to Chungking, but the river, instead of continuing to rise, fell so low and remained so low that they have not been able to come down again. One, the Alice Dollar, did manage to come down, and went up again. A week ago she tried to come down once more, but she had the misfortune to strike a rock at Mutung and had a hole pierced in her hull. She arrived to-day, only slightly damaged.

The River Inspector, it is understood, has now made a new regulation, by which ships of a certain length only are to be permitted to leave either end at certain depths of water. The smallest may sail on one foot of water, but the largest, like the Wanhsien, must have 12 feet and rising, before she can water here, but Chungking was reported as being six feet and failing yesterday.

The Traffic in Opium.

A resident of this district has recently made a trip to Shinan, and he reports that opium is growing very plentifully. Shinan and each town in that prefecture is full of it, while it could be seen in the Changyang, Patung and even Ichang districts of this prefecture. It is stated that the Taoyin has arranged for the sum of $1,800,000 per annum to be paid as a tax for the growing of opium throughout the Shinan prefecture. Then in Tangyang district, which Reuter's correspondent visited recently, while no poppy was to be seen on the main roads, bureaus have been established for the collection of the tax. These are, as usual, called Bureaus for the Prohibition of Opium. For instance, there is one at the village of Swanglienshih, 90 li from here, and all opium passing through there has to pay a tax of 30 cents per ounce, and when this has been paid the opium is free to be transported as far north as Hsiangyang in this province.

Another interesting fact is that the town of Wufung, which does not grow any poppy at the present time, has been told that the poppy may be cultivated on an annual payment of $50,000. It was evidently intended at first to establish a separate office to collect the tax for growing poppy, but now, since the visit of the Taoyin to these places, it has apparently been arranged that the collection should fall to the magistrate of each district.

Of course smoking is now so common that when guests come to a house they are offered a whiff of opium, just as readily as a cup of tea, and the paraphernalia for the use of the drug can be openly bought in any shop or stand dealing in these wares in this town.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

A PEKING OUTRAGE

Peking, May 22.

Two Heilungkiang men on Monday visited the Peking residence of the Heilungkiang Senator, Mr. Tien Mei-teng, who was absent. The visitors called again yesterday. Again finding Mr. Tien absent, the men forced an entry and tied up and shot a man. The man, who [illegible] Tien's young daughter, hearing the shot, came in and was shot dead. Mrs. Tien, appearing on the scene, was fired on, the bullet grazing her forehead.

Attracted by the noise, the police rushed in, on which the murderers turned their revolvers upon themselves. One died instantly, while the other was dangerously wounded. Mrs. Tien and the would-be suicide are in hospital.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

JAPANESE AND SOVIET

Discussions in Peking Prior to Opening of Formal Negotiations

Peking, May 16.

The fact that Mr. Yoshizawa, the Japanese Minister in Peking, and M. Karakhan have recently been exchanging visits points to resumption of official Russo-Japanese negotiations. While it is premature to predict resumption of formal relations, the present conversations are apparently regarded as sufficiently important to cause postponement of Mr. Yoshizawa's projected visit to the Central Provinces.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Tokio, May 19.

It is stated on good authority that the Russo-Japanese conversations in Peking are now regarded as formal, both negotiators having been vested with powers to draw up a treaty, subject to their agreeing on many intricate issues, such as recognition.

The divergencies of opinion on various questions outstanding at the previous conferences are still wide, but the general opinion is that the prospect of reaching an [illegible] ment is more favourable.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Peking, May 19.

The Japanese Minister had a meeting with Mr. Karakhan yesterday and they will continue their discussions this afternoon. While the discussions are not described as official there is reason to believe that Mr. Yoshizawa's authority for negotiating has been strengthened recently, and that the conversations now proceeding in Peking concern the settlement of questions which have been put forward as conditional to the opening of formal negotiations. It is asserted that while no actual progress can be reported, the discussions on Saturday last helped to clear the air.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

ON account of the [illegible] plight of the Central Go[illegible] and the non-payment of th[illegible] of the officials, no fewer tha[illegible] former Cabinet Ministers, Dr. Lo Wen-kan, Mr. Tung Kang and Mr. Chiang Yung have registered their names as legal practitioners in the Peking and Tientsin courts for both foreigners and natives. Dr. Lo is well-known amongst the foreign community on account of the Austrian loan scandals which caused the downfall of the Wang Chung-hui Cabinet last year and he has now been appointed by Kao En-hung, Director-General of Kiaochou, as the legal adviser of the Tsingtao Administration. At the same time, some high government officials have resigned their posts and become medical practitioners in the metropolis.

SOUTHERN RHODESIA

SOUTHERN Rhodesia which was inaugurated as the youngest self governing Colony of the British Empire on October 1, 1923, and which had previously for 33 years been ably administered by the British South Africa Company possesses one of the finest climates in the world with long hours of sunshine, breezy temperate days and cool nights. For those who wish to take up farming or ranching in order to make the most they can of their capital, energy and technical knowledge, or for those who wish to retire from strenuous business or professional life and make a home, Rhodesia offers many advantages unequalled elsewhere. The business, social, sporting, educational and medical facilities bear favourable comparison with those of other countries. Native labour is plentiful and when properly managed is cheap and efficient. Taxation is light. Good land in healthy surroundings and amidst fine scenery is plentiful and not expensive.

Full information is obtainable on application to The Secretary, Southern Rhodesia Settlers' Board (attached to the Government of Southern Rhodesia), P. O. Box 372, Salisbury, S., Rhodesia.

The giving of advice to prospective settlers will be facilitated if applicants will advise the Board in detail of their circumstances and the amount of capital they would be prepared to invest in a suitable venture

CAPTAIN D'OISY IN SHANGHAI

Nine Hours Flight from Canton to Kiangwan: Accident on Landing: Aviators Unhurt but Machine Badly Damaged: Celebration at French Club

The plucky French aviator, Capt. d'Oisy arrived in Shanghai on Tuesday on his world trip, but his first reception was not of the order that his admiring and enthusiastic countrymen had arranged. They were ready to deluge him with flowers and to deafen him with cheering, but instead he landed almost in silence, broken in a moment by groans and the screams of several women and a few minutes later he was surrounded by a ring of weeping French men and women and he passed from the field by groups of more sorrowful ones. The gallant aviator's landing resulted in an accident, which was too much for the Spectators, roused as they were to a high state of excitement by several hours waiting.

A cable message arrived early in the morning stating that Capt. d'Oisy left Canton at 7 a.m. on his flight to Shanghai and though he would almost have had to beat all the world's speed records to reach here by noon, even before that hour many hundreds of people had assembled on the stands at the Kiangwan race course. Every minute more arrived and there were quite 3,000 there by 2 p.m., which was considered to be the most likely hour of his arrival. The great majority were French people, prominent amongst them being the Consul-General and Mme. Wilden, Capt. Juge of the cruiser Colmar and several other naval and military officers.

Excellent Chinese Arrangements.

Mr. S. K. Chen and several other members of the staff of the Commissioner for Foreign Affairs were early on the scene and Mr. Tang Shao-yi was another interested Chinese. Major-General Wang had a strong corps of soldiers and police on the ground and he and his officers are to be congratulated on the perfect order they maintained throughout the day, dealing reasonably but firmly even with foreigners who attempted to break through on to reserved parts of the ground. To the right of the public stand a matshed hangar had been erected for the accommodation of Lieut. d'Oisy's machine and by the side of it a stand for the Chinese military band which was to welcome him.

It was a long wait and when a message came through that the aviator had passed over Foochow at 11 a.m. and still he was not in sight by 3.30 p.m., many felt confident that he had made a forced landing, and they went home disappointed. Chinese on the roof of the stand swept the sky with binoculars and every now and again one would bring the waiting people to their feet with an excited cry that he had sighted the flyer. By 4 p.m. people were very tired of waiting in the hot sun, but they stood their ground, prepared to wait for official information.

An Unlucky Landing.

After all the false alarms, Capt. d'Oisy was missed until he was quite close to the course. He was flying from the direction of Shanghai, not particularly high, but steadily and at a fair speed, when suddenly a great shout went up and he was seen well on the way to the course. He flew directly over the public stand, circled the course and then went off towards the railway station and was lost sight of behind the trees. In a few minutes he was sighted on the way back, flying much lower and at a reduced speed. He shot over the old owners' stand, flew in an arc past the Golf Club, dropping lower and lower and, after touching ground twice, landed on the thirteenth green. However, he over-ran the green, bumped on the rough ground and made a leap towards the ditch crossing across the ground there. To the dismay of the spectators, the machine was seen to pitch forward, turn half over and then apparently break in two.

Men dashed across the ground from all directions to render aid and the astuteness of aviators was demonstrated by the fact that, although Capt. d'Oisy landed at a point directly opposite to that where arrangements had been made for him to land, the first men to reach him were three or four old aviators, who could tell where an experienced flyer would land and accordingly had taken post near by. The aviator was seen to be unhurt and laughed at the first men up, but then he glanced over his machine and his handsome face instantly became clouded when he noted the extent of the damage.

A young Frenchwoman was amongst the first to reach the aviator and as he climbed out of his seat she pressed a bunch of flowers on him, kissed him on both cheeks and then fell back fainting. Then followed the Consul-General in a great state of grief and loudly proclaiming that the fault was on anyone rather than the aviator. Capt. Juge spoke a few words of congratulation and more flowers were presented, but no one was in the mood to make a speech and the unfortunate aviator was too tired after nine hours in the air and too dismayed at his bad luck to say very much. He and his mechanic were escorted from the ground and driven off in motor cars, a few people managing then to raise a cheer.

THE DISASTER TO CAPT. D'OISY'S AEROPLANE.

The Damage Done.

A definite statement as to the extent of the damage cannot be given until Capt. d'Oisy himself has inspected his machine, but the opinions of others are worth noting. One flying man, who was the first to get into it after the accident, said that the principal damage was the breaking of the main fuselage bars, so that the machine practically is in two pieces. The fractures in the various connexions between the two parts, he said, were all clean and the damage easily could be repaired, but it was different with the fuselage bars and he doubted whether it would be possible either to repair or replace them here.

Later in the evening another aviator who had made a more careful examination gave it as his opinion that the machine was a complete wreck and never could be put right. Besides the damage to the fuselage bars, he said the propellor was broken and probably also the shaft, the fuselage was badly damaged and there were many minor breakages. The aluminium bars could not be replaced here and he doubted whether the machine could be put right even if it were in the best repair shop. This gentleman explained that it was impossible to tie an aviator down to a landing at a definite spot and from a definite direction and that it was patent to flying men that, with the wind as it was Capt. d'Oisy would not attempt a run from opposite the far corner of the public stand to a landing on the eighteenth green. The direction lines on the ground would not help him, for he would follow the smoke from the signal fire. He made his landing in the right way, but probably did not see the ditch, or else had not sufficient room in which to come down and avoid it.

One of the feature film making records in Shanghai was yesterday performed by the B. A. T. Co.'s Motion Picture Department, when they photographed the landing of Capt. d'Oisy, and the subsequent smash-up of his machine. The completed, developed and titled film was shown at the Carlton Theatre in the Town Topics at 9.15 o'clock alongwith a humourous parody on the aviator and his machine. The same film will be repeated to-night.

At the Cercle Sportif.

There were scenes of wild enthusiasm at the Cercle Sportif Français at 7 o'clock in the evening a presentation was made to the airman and his mechanic.

Capt. D'Oisy's arrival in a car, accompanied by M. Wilden, at the corner of Route Vallon and the entrance to the club was the signal for an outburst of cheering. Looking none the worse after their trying experiences, Capt. D'Oisy and Sgt. Vesin entered the building amidst the deafening applause of some 500 members of the club and other residents, who thronged the staircase and ball-room.

When the last bar of the "Marseillaise" had been played by the Cercle Sportif band, M. Wilden on behalf of the French colony congratulated Capt. D'Oisy and Sgt Vesin on their splendid achievement. Speaking with considerable emotion, the French Consul-General said their arrival was un air de France. The French colony opened their hearts to both aviators and wished to express to them their great appreciation of their marvellous effort. They sympathized deeply with Capt. D'Oisy over the accident to his machine.

M. Wilden then handed to Capt. D'Oisy a handsome white jade vase, purchased out of a fund of $7,000 contributed by French residents, and seven boxes of valuable silks and satins. To Sgt. Vesin the Consul-General presented a rare bronze Buddha, and three boxes of silk.

Capt. D'Oisy smilingly responded in a short speech of thanks on behalf of himself and his mechanic.

Mr. Douglas Fleming, in an informal speech, said that he felt he could voice the opinion of all British people in Shanghai—an opinion that would be shared by Britons all over the world—and say that they all felt the greatest admiration for Capt. D'Oisy's courage, resource and skill. They had been delighted at the accounts of his success, no less than their French friends had been, and they were with them in expressing their condolences at the most unfortunate accident that had marred his effort after he had achieved so much.

Following a fresh outburst of cheering, the aviator shortly afterwards left for the French Consulate-General, where he was entertained at a banquet last night.

CAPT. D'OISY TO CONTINUE FLIGHT

Paris Anxious for Him to Complete Programme

Interviewed by a "North-China Daily News" reporter on Wednesday, the gallant officer was in the best of spirits and very hopeful. On the day of his arrival he was disappointed and depressed, hopeless of proceeding and strongly inclined to retrace his steps back to France. On Wednesday the volatile spirit of his race exercised its sway. He shut himself in the office provided for him at the French Consulate, sent off sheaves of cables to Paris, Tokio, Peking and every place on the globe he could think of which could possibly render him any assistance, and generally did all he could in preparation for the continuation of the flight. A machine is practically assured him by the authorities, and his superiors in Paris have cabled him an urgent message strongly advising that he proceed on his way if humanly possible. If it is humanly possible Captain d'Oisy can be counted upon to accomplish the task.

The aviator, asked what he thought were his prospects of getting to Tokio, replied with a characteristic shrug of the shoulders.

"If all goes well with me, I shall get there, may be on June 4.

"And what if the new machine smashes?" he was asked.

"If I smash with the new machine then I will get another. If that smashes then I will get a third somehow, but if the third smashes then I will go back to France."

Asked whether the 'plane it was proposed to lend him was as good as the one in which he arrived, Captain d'Oisy smiled and shook his head.

"The machines are the same make," he replied. "Both are Breguets, but the new one is nothing like so powerful as the old. It will not hold the same amount of power or give the same amount of speed. Had I my old machine I could have gone to Peking straight without a stop. Now I must stop twice to fill my tanks, and I do not know the country."

The Accident Explained

"Your accident at Kiangwan?" queried our representative. "To what do you attribute it? To bad luck, engine trouble, or a bad landing position?"

"The landing place was not good" came the reply. "Kiangwan is not long enough for an engine of the dimensions carried by my machine. It was too powerful and the run was too short. Also I had bad luck with the wind and with my engine. I had trouble with the engine just as I was looking for a spot to land, but before I could choose one the engine behaved so badly I just had to land where I could. It was all tres difficile, very bad luck."

Asked whether it was true there was rain water in the engine, the aviator shook his head. "It might have been so," he said, "it might well have been so, but it is very difficult to say. Both I and the mechanic, we were luckly to escape with our lives."

THE TWO PARTS OF THE BROKEN MACHINE SEPARATED.

Questioned as to his experiences on the journey up from Canton Captain d'Oisy replied:

"It was very tiring. The country was difficult. I did not know it at all and could find no landing place. For ten hours I had to keep awake and alert. It was very tiring, and we were glad to see Shanghai."

As a point of curiosity our representative asked him what he ate and drank during the flight.

Yes, he had a Banana

"I ate as little as possible in the air" he replied. "It is not well to do otherwise. Eat as little as possible and drink as little as possible. All I had during the ten hours I was in the air from Canton was one banana. It was enough; when I am in the air I do not want to eat."

Questioned with regard to weather conditions, he replied that the weather he encountered was very mixed, but at no time were he and his companion in any great danger of crashing."

Captain d'Oisy expressed himself as rather anxious concerning that part of the journey between here and the Korean broder.

"The machine I hope to get will be small" (he repeated) "and on the whole way I know of no good landing places, yet twice I must land. It will be very difficult and I shall not feel happy till I get into Japanese territory. There the landing places are many and good and well laid out. Before then, anything may happen."

In the course of further conversation, quite accidentally the origin of the story that Captain d'Oisy left Paris with no preparation was explained. Our representative happened to ask the aviator what he thought were his chances of succeeding in getting round the world, and once again the reply was characteristic.

A Test of Luck.

"When I left Paris" he said "I expected to get no further than Chateau Hiery, but the luck was with me, everything went beautifully and I thought the opportunity too good to miss. I came right on to Shanghai, and all the way I had the luck with me—till Shanghai. Here I crash. I will go on again until I crash again. It is all luck. If all goes well I proceed, if not . . ." The sentence concluded with a smile and a shrug of a powerful pair of shoulders.

This then was the explanation of the story that the aviator left Paris without preparation. In one sense the story was true. The flight was purely experimental, but when all went so well he decided to proceed. The luck held all the way to Shanghai, and then came disaster—the first accident in eight years for the victim.

"This is my first accident in eight years. During the War I was shot down by enemy planes four times. Since then everything has gone right with me—never an accident till Shanghai. Here I strike my bad luck—I dare not be too hopeful in view of that, but I will try."

After further conversation our reporter picked up his hat and was about to go.

"Stay one moment" called Capt. d'Oisy. "I would like to tell you of my experience in British India, and to make known generally the very fine treatment I received from the British people there, and in particular from my brother airmen. They were all wonderfully hospitable, in Karachi, Agra, Calcutta and Basra. Always I found that same spirit of camaraderie which characterised the relations of the French and British aviators during the war."

Our reporter raised his hat, shook hands with one of the cheeriest and most obliging men he has ever had to interview, and departed.

Capt. d'Oisy is a fine figure of a man. Standing well over six feet in height he is remarkable for a powerful pair of shoulders, and a red, healthy beaming face. His eyes twinkle as he talks, and his conversation reveals a strong sense of humour. He is certainly a man his countrymen can be proud of.

Captain d'Oisy was only married some twelve months ago, and is the proud father of a baby girl. His wife watches his progress with the greatest anxiety and keeps in constant touch with him.

STORY OF THE FLIGHT

The famous French ace, Capt. Pelletier d'Oisy and his mechanic, Sgt. Vevin, left Paris on April 25 in a spectacular non-stop flight to the farthest eastern European capital. He reached Bukharest, a distance of 1,250 miles, under most unfavourable weather conditions, on the same day in the splendid time of 11 hours.

According to the telegraphic news it was then that he decided to continue the journey to Tokio. This fact coupled with the statement that the intrepid Army airman had begun his journey "totally without preparation," at once lent a glamour to the venture which found its expression in the opthet "spectacular" appearing in the first Reuter's telegram. At that time Major Martin, with the American fliers, and the English round-the-world flier, Squadron-Leader Maclaren, were making but indifferent progress, though the cables had previously given long accounts of preparations that had been made to ensure their success. Further interest was centred on the Frenchman when it was announced a few days later that he would attempt to compete with the British and Americans in encircling the world. He proved, however, not to have been so unprepared, the French Aeronautical Department announcing a few days later that Capt. d'Oisy's flight was the result of lengthy and advanced preparations.

Across British India.

Leaving Bukharest within a few hours of his arrival, Capt. d'Oisy on April 25 shaped a course for Aleppo. 940 miles distant which he covered in less than eight hours, traversing the Taurus Mountains at an altitude of over 10,000 feet. He arrived at Basra on the evening of the 26th, leaving on the 27th for Karachi. Descending at Bushire on April 28 to deliver an official letter to the French Air Mission, he left the same day for Bunder Abbas, at which city, as far as can be estimated from the cables, he landed on the evening of April 28.

On May 1 Shanghai was again startled by a Reuter message in the Press announcing the arrival of Capt. d'Oisy at Karachi on the afternoon of April 30, thereby creating a record for a flight from Europe to India, his time being 38½ actual flying hours.

Following an overhaul of the machine, a Bréguet XIX sesquiplane, the pilot and Sgt. Vesin left Karachi on May 3 or 4 on the next lap across India. He stopped at Agra, approximately half way to Calcutta, accomplishing the remaining 750 miles to that port in 6hr. 36min., landing at the Dum-Dum Aerodrome, Calcutta at 1 o'clock on the afternoon of May 5.

After being held up for four days to enable slight repairs to be made to the wings of his machine, he left Calcutta at 5.50 on the morning of May 9, arriving at Rangoon at 1 p.m., covering the 840 miles between Calcutta and Rangoon in six and a half hours. It had been his intention to proceed direct to Saigon, but he was obliged to land at the Burmese capital owing to the rapid evaporation of the water in his radiator and a burst tyre. This part of the journey proved especially trying, as he had to cross mountains shrouded in dense clouds. He reached Bangkok on May 10, departing on the 11th for Saigon. A strong head-wind prevailed on the 500-mile flight from Bangkok to Saigon, several storms necessitating Capt. d'Oisy's ascent to 3,000 mètres. He reached Saigon on May 12, making the Aerodrome at Hanoi at 2.30 on the same afternoon. Although he encountered several storms both machine and engine were in satisfactory working order.

PARIS TO SHANGHAI BY AIR

Sapajou's Study of Captain d'Oisy

Capt. d'Oisy's Achievement.

By his non-stop flight to Bukharest and reaching India in 38½ hours actual flying time, Capt. d'Oisy must be placed in the front rank of airmen who have flown between Europe and the East.

The hero of this flight is one of France's senior and most daring pilots. Before the war he had already earned fame in a flight over France in his escadrille H. F. 19. After the opening of hostilities he soon came to be classed with the most heroic of Allied airmen. On December 9, 1914, he put to flight a German aeroplane that was circling over Crévecœur. On April 2, 1915, in company with Sous-Lieutenant Chambe he made short work of an Albatross, forcing it over the French lines, where it was brought down. During the same month three enemy aeroplanes appeared over the French trenches. Although alone d'Oisy succeeded in barring their passage, and by his audacity and skill at manœuvring drove them off. At Bezonveaux he accounted for a German 'plane and some days after, with the assistance of the ace Navarra, who was wounded in the course of the engagement, triumphed over a Fokker in the neighbourhood of Sanogueux. For his services at the front throughout the war, Capt. d'Oisy was decorated with the Médaille Militaire and the Légion d'Honneur.

Scarcely less notable have been his performances since the Armistice. In 1920 he made excellent times in flights from Paris to Vienna, Paris to Constantinople, Constantinople to Sofia and Bukharest to Constantinople. Flying from Paris to Bukharest in 1921, he accomplished the journey in 19 hours—eight hours longer than on the first lap of his present world-flight.

A HEROIC MISSION

Mrs. Whiteside on Good Qualities of Chinese: Day in a Szechuan Missionary's Life

A large gathering attended the meeting of the Shanghai Ladies' Auxiliary Association of the Church Missionary Society at the residence of Mrs. J. A. Bailey at 89 Range Road last Friday. The Very Reverend Dean Symons gave a brief history of the West China Mission, "always a heroic mission, from its pioneer days 30 years ago down to the present time when two very sad murders again bore witness to the fact that the blood of the martyrs was the seed of the Church."

Mrs. R. A. Whiteside, whose husband was killed with the Rev. F. J. Watt while on an evangelistic trip last year, spoke of the progress of the Christian faith in Szechuan, urging her hearers not to think of the Chinese as a nation of brigands, avowing that her loyalty to the people as a whole had been deepened and strengthened by their understanding sympathy in her loss, a sympathy which demonstrated to her as never before their innate "delicacy of feeling and kindliness of thought."

The Romance of the Field

In a brief review of her 18 years of service in Szechuan, Mrs. Whiteside referred to the comparatively peaceful days of the Manchu régime, when they travelled on their missionary journeys under the protection of an escort garbed in ragged red coats and armed only with umbrellas, an escort, however, which stood for law and enforced respect. Life was hardly placid, however, in spite of the matter-of-fact way in which the speaker referred to the Boxer riots, when some of their buildings were burned and native converts killed. On another occasion, she said, both she and her husband were on the proscribed list of one of the secret societies, and an unsuccessful attempt was made on her husband's life, when with their children they were once held up by brigands on the Upper Yangtze.

Szechuanese Characteristics

Another firm friend of the Szechuanese was the Rev. F. Boreham, of Mienchow, who said that the Chinese there were diifferent from those of any other province, first because floods or famine have denuded the original population at different times so that colonists from other parts of China have rushed into the "garden province," and given it a cosmopolitan character, which is still further increased by some slight intermingling with the aboriginal tribes who were there long before the Chinese. The result was a strong, tall, virile race whose women walk with a sturdy swing quite different from the hobbled gait of golden lily feet.

Mr. Boreham also maintained that brigandage was merely a disease from which the country would recover. In this great diocese of over 13,000 square miles, the speaker said the hope of evangelization lay with the native worker. It is necessary to keep up a steady evangelistic work, inviting in the merchant just freed from the store, who might not understand much about the message, but who might perhaps return and understand a little more the next time. The tired coolie, coming in only for a place to sit down, might listen five minutes and sleep an hour, but the five minutes was often valuable.

Missionary Strategy.

In his description of a concentrated evangelistic campaign Mr. Boreham gave a graphic picture of how the missionary adapts his methods to the country. With perhaps two native evangelists and two volunteer workers, he said, he would set out for a two or three weeks' trip, fitting his itinerary to the market days when a crowd was assured. Reaching a village which perhaps had never seen a foreigner before, the little band would march about its streets, carrying bright banners on which are texts. When the curiosity of the town was excited they proceeded to the theatre of the largest temple, where by previous arrangement they were allowed to hang up their banners and address the multitude who crowded about to see what the "mad foreigner" had to say. First one spoke till his voice gave out. Then came a hymn, and the next man spoke, keeping it up from 11 in the morning till 3 in the afternoon. If the town were large enough to justify it, they might remain three or four days, otherwise they would move on to the next market town. Educational and medical work supplemented evangelical efforts.

WEDDING

Fennell-Bellamy

A very pretty wedding took place on Monday afternoon in Holy Trinity Cathedral when Mrs. Margaret E. Bellamy, widow of the late Major Hugh Maurice Ballamy, D.S.O., M.C., O.B.E., was married to Mr. Roger Charles Bell Fennell, son of Mr. Theodore Fennell, of Knutsford, Cheshire. The cathedral was beautifully decorated with lilies and palms and the Very Rev. Dean Symons read the impressive service. The bride, who was given away by Mr. A. D. Bell, looked charming in a gown of grey georgette, heavily beaded in cut steel, and wore a cornflower blue Condor hat. Mrs. E. S. Wilkinson, who acted as matron of honour, wore ecru lace over a slip of the same shade and a black hat. Little Miss Mary Wilkinson, the flower girl, wore a white taffeta frock, and carried a basket of pink carnations.

Mr. David Brand accompanied the bridegroom as best man and Messrs. W. D. Fiddes-Wilson and R. Gordon acted as ushers. A reception was held at 72 Route Doumer, the residence of Mr. and Mrs. E. S. Wilkinson, after the ceremony.

WILLIAM HEUGHAN'S SONG RECITALS

A Delightful Evening of Songs of all the World at the Country Club

If a man would learn why Scotsmen are so proud of their country and its associations and never tire of boasting thereof, let him go and hear Mr. William Heughan sing the ballads of the land. If a Scotsman in exile wishes for a brief spell to be transported to the romantic Border, or to picture realistically the beauties of Argyll or the Western Isles, the majesty of Inverness, or the wild grandeur of Sutherland, let him go and hear Mr. Heughan. And if a man be outside these two categories, yet loves music for music's sake, no matter what its origin, let him, too, go and hear Mr. Heughan. Truly he is an exceptionally gifted performer and if the name as yet is not so familiar as some others, one can imagine that the only cause is that Mr. Heughan is but 35 years of age.

His short season in Shanghai began at the Lyceum Thaetre on Monday, but he appeeared at a private concert at the Country Club on Saturday and amongst those who were there it was not easy to find one after the performance who adequately could give expression to his opinion. Perhaps one incident will show how great was the appreciation. Mr. Heughan sang 20 songs—a wonderful feat in itself—and had given "Auld Lang Syne," which is taken to be the conclusion of a concert. A basket of flowers was handed to his pianist and the curtain was rung down, but the audience clamoured for yet another song and had it been anything less delightful than that beautiful piece, "The Road to the Isles," they certainly would have called for yet one more.

Mr. Heughan's voice is beautiful in tone but it is far too powerful for such a place as the Country Club and he will be heard to much greater advantage at the Lyceum. His selections were so varied that one hardly can make a choice. When, with his great voice, he made the hall ring with "A Hundred Pipers," "The March of the Cameron Men," and "Blue Bonnets," one expected every moment to hear the echo of clan slogan cries, for one could see the least romantic gripping their chairs with the excitement of the fighting music. Then he went away into Italian opera, from that to old English songs such as "Sir Roger de Coverley," again to "Widdicombe Fair" and even to quaint Irish songs. Never could it be imagined one man could be so versatile, and the programme was the more interesting because he gave a short history of each song before singing it. Mr. Heughan is a man of fine presence and the songs seemed to come better from a handsome six-foot Highlander garbed in a neat and well-cut dress uniform, with lace ruffles at his neck and wrists. It is difficult to believe that any singer ever has scored a greater success than he did on Saturday evening.

Though enraptured over the principal, one must not forget Mr. Dave Kennedy, who would have been entertainment sufficient had Mr. Heughan not been there. Mr. Kennedy is a remarkably clever comedian, singing Lauder's songs almost as well as Lauder himself and one can imagine how the Lyceum will ring when the audiences take up the refrain. But Lauder is for the man who is not a Scot, and Mr. Kennedy, as versatile in his line as Mr. Heughan in his, gave several other selections which provoked roars of laughter and applause. Miss Gladys Sayer also was very well received. Not only did she accompany all the songs of both the men, but she contributed several selections in a most capable manner.

Enthusiastic Reception at the All-Scottish Night

Mr. William Heughan's all-Scottish night at the Lyceum Theatre on Monday was a great occasion for the local Scots. Every reserved seat in the house had been booked beforehand and though the vile weather kept a few people away it was doubtful whether seats could have been found for 30 more, whilst people were standing at the back of the pit and gallery. As a matter of fact, it was not really an all-Scottish night, though it had been advertised as such. Mr. Heughan has found in other parts of the world that he has had to vary his programmes very considerably in order to satisfy cosmopolitan tastes and when he was inundated with special requests for certain English songs he faltered, allowing himself to be persuaded that Shanghai probably was much as other places. One could forgive him for again including that exquisitely tuneful little old English ditty, "Dashing away with the Smoothing-iron," and the comical "Song of the Flea" could be run into any programme, but on a Scottish night "The Trumpeter" well could have been sacrificed for either "The Cameron Men," or "Bonnie Dundee."

Still, the Scots were well content on the whole with what they did have of their own music. Mr. Heughan repeated that grand ballad "A Hundred Pipers" and the equally famous "Grigor's Gathering." He put in a very choice selection of Burns's very best, and Miss Sayer, who on such occasions takes over the duties of arbitrator, very kindly gave him instructions to sing "The Road to the Isles," than which there is no more appealing song of home in all Scotland's music. "The Skye Boat Song" also had a great reception, as it always will when sung to Scotsmen. As was predicted, Mr. Heughan was heard to much greater advantage in the theatre than in the Country Club, for his powerful voice reached easily to every part of the house and was as clear for his twentieth song as for his first.

Mr. Dave Kennedy came up to expectations with his popular humorous songs and the audience were loth to let him retire even after he had sung his sixth. Miss Gladys Sayer again went satisfactorily through her arduous task of accompanying a matter of about 30 songs, besides giving some charming selections on her own account and she was most enthusiastically applauded. The pipers and drummers of the Shanghai Scottish assisted in the programme with marked success.

A SONSIE SCOTTISH SINGER

THE TRIBULATIONS OF THE HWAH JAH

The well-known cadet training ship Hwah Jah, operated by the Far Eastern Shipping Syndicate, continues on her interesting career and her eventful voyages. A recent arrival from Hongkong states that the vessel was to have left that port on the 15th instant, in ballast for Saigon. When she cast off from her buoys it was discovered that she had developed some sort of engine trouble, so she anchored and later returned to the buoys. It is stated that since the chief officer (and other foreigners) were dismissed at Tsingtao the second officer, a Chinese, has been acting as chief officer, but at Hongkong the present master of the ship, a Norwegian, decided that he could not leave without a qualified foreign chief officer. A real chief officer was accordingly signed on, and it seems that when he went on board to assume his duties he discovered that the chief officer's quarters were being occupied by the Chinese second (acting chief) officer.

The Chinese cadet-training-ship Hwah Jah has continued on her voyaging, having left Hongkong on the evening of May 16 for Saigon, where, it is stated, she will load a cargo of rice for the Yamashita Kisen Kaisha. Her complement of cadets has sadly been depleted, no fewer than 12 having returned to Shanghai. Eight came on the str. Kwangtah and four on the Kwanglee. We have been informed that those who arrived on the Kwanglee demanded saloon passages and were more than a little surprised when they were sent as deck passengers.

A Rosta message to "Shanghai New Life," reports an interview with Karakhan, in which the Soviet representative resents American interference in the Chinese Eastern Railway negotiations. The matter, he says, can competently be discussed by China and Russia, and outside interference will only hinder the negotiations. He points out that Russia, the owner of the railway, took no part in the Washington Conference, at which resolutions concerning it were passed.

SHANGHAI WORLD EXHIBITION

Mr. Bena's Project: Meeting of Business Men Called to Discuss Feasibility

Since publishing in outline his suggestion for a World Exhibition at Shanghai, Mr. G. A. Bena has busied himself in discussing the matter with prominent people, Chinese and foreign, and has so far succeeded in enlisting their sympathies as to warrant the holding of a public meeting to consider the scheme, at least in principle. The meeting will be held on the 29th instant at the rooms of the Shanghai General Chamber of Commerce (in the "North-China Daily News" Building), and will be attended by representatives of various nationalities who are members of the Chamber, and of the principal public and commercial organizations in Shanghai: the Chinese Chamber of Commerce, the China Association, the American Chamber of Commerce, etc.

Varying Opinions.

Naturally, in introducing a scheme of such magnitude Mr. Bena has met with varying success. By some the idea has been approved without hesitation, and among the enthusiasts may be included leading French and Japanese merchants. The American Consul-General also has expressed approval of the suggestion, and has kindly placed at Mr. Bena's disposal a complete set of the records of the St. Louis Exposition. Another warm supporter is Mr. Julean Arnold, the American Commercial Attaché, who, in a recent latter, wrote:

During the past few decades, and more particularly during the past 10 years, physical means of communication have been improved so rapidly as to bring the West and East in close physical contact. Unfortunately, intellectually the West and East are coming together very slowly. A World Exhibition at Shanghai along the lines suggested by Mr. Bena will be signally helpful towards making for closer and more effectual intellectual contact between the West and the East. Much indeed has been done during the past few decades to train the peoples of the Orient better to understand Western civilization, but very little has been done towards bringing the Occident to a better appreciation of the civilizations of the nations of Asia. Thus, I am heartily in favour of the proposal as made, and congratulate Mr. Bena on the able manner in which it has been presented by him."

Not all, of course, are so enthusiastic as Mr. Arnold. Others who have been approached, if not entirely against the scheme, at least hesitate and point to the present unhappy state of affairs in this country as a reason for not proceeding, for the time being. On the other hand, there are those who think with Mr. Bena that the present time is essentially an occasion when a great united effort, loyally supported by foreigners and Chinese, and above all worked for with enthusiasm by Shanghai, would have the effect of greatly improving Chinese and foreign relations, help to remove many outstanding difficulties, and pave the way for further progress, more particularly the progress of Shanghai. It would be a purely international enterprise, conducted for the general benefit of all and without reference to the profit of any individual group.

Financial Prospects.

The further development of the idea will depend entirely upon whether a sufficient number of influential people can be got to approve of the scheme in principle and give it their support; and this point having been gained, it will then be for a provisional Committee to prepare a working foundation—a task in itself which would probably occupy the greater part of a year. Incidentally, Mr. Bena suggests 1930 as Exhibition year. Expert opinion, of course, will have to be brought to bear on the matter, for very many important considerations are involved and even the preliminaries—before any definite step were taken—would require a vast amount of organizing effort. But Mr. Bena is optimistic; even in the matter of finance he is persuaded that, however the necessary funds were raised—by formation of a public company or otherwise—the enterprise would pay its way.

The scheme has not passed out of the stage of indefinite discussion, and thus no set plan will be submitted to the forthcoming meeting. What is required is careful discussion of the general situation from a variety of points of view, but under the guiding idea that the exhibition is intended to promote the development of China and mark a path for the future of Shanghai. Mr. Bena will be happy to receive comment and criticism from all who are interested.

OBITUARY

Mr. R. C. Faithfull

Members of the legal world in Shanghai learned with deep regret of the death of Mr. Richard Chamberlain Faithfull in the early hours of Tuesday, following the amputaton of his right leg. He had practised in Shanghai as a solicitor for the past seven years, and was well liked by his colleagues.

Aged 74, Mr. Faithfull was a remarkable personality. His appearance as he drove through the street in his broker's carriage—a vehicle he would never give up, was familiar to most Shanghai residents, for the "old man" was remarkable for a pronounced Victorian cast of countenance and was wont to sit bolt upright with a sternness of features, believed by the kindliness in the eyes.

Mr. Faithfull came of a fine old Hampshire family, and is believed to have been a native of Winchester. The Hampshire Faithfulls are, of course, known all over the South of England. He commenced his legal career many years ago in London, where he practised on his own account for some years. In 1912 he first came East, when he set up in practice for himself in Hongkong. He did not, however, do too well in that Colony and his practice proved a poor one, with the result that he eventually came to Shanghai in 1917 and joined Messrs. Hansons. He remained with that firm for a short space of time, leaving them to take up the position of legal adviser to the Shanghai Municipal Council, which post he held till 1923 when his agreement with the Council expired and he once more started a private practice, dying in harness.

Mr. Faithfull's legal friends will be interested to learn that it was he who gave Sir Thomas Matthews his first brief.

In the presence of many old friends and colleagues, the remains of the late Mr. R. C. Faithfull were interred at Bubbling Well Cemetery on Wednesday afternoon, Dean Symons conducting the service in the Chapel and at the graveside. Amongst those in attendance were Sir Skinner Turner, Judge of the Supreme Court, Mr. R. F. le Mesurier, Chief Clerk, Mr. A. Sims, Usher, Mr. H. Browett, Mr. G. H. Wright, Mr. J. H. Teesdale, Mr. A. C. Holborow, Mr. George Matheson, Mr. C. P. Holcomb, Mr. T. Vaughan, Mr. L. Friedman, and Mr. M. Friedman. Mr. G. W. King, Registrar of the Supreme Court, was unavoidably absent owing to indisposition.

Messrs. S. A. L. McCandless, F. M. Gram, Geo. Matheson, R. F. le Mesurier, J. H. Teesdale and W. C. H. Knight acted as pallbearers. were sent.

RACING AT YANGTSZEPOO!

A proposal for the establishment of a third race course in Shanghai was mentioned on Monday in the "Journal of Commerce." It was therein stated that a local merchant has established a Land Investment Co., the special business of which will be the purchase of 200 mow of land at Yangtszepoo for the laying out of a race course similar to that at Kiangwan. The Military Governor has been approached for permission to carry out the scheme.

Meanwhile, opposition, doubtless inspired by financial motives, has arisen in the village council of Ying Ziang Zong, members of this august body having laid it down that the race course within their jurisdiction shall not be used for gambling purposes. It is not surprising to hear that efforts are being made to change the personnel of the village council. If the story has any value at all, it does show that we still have some first-class optimists, hard times notwithstanding.

NATIONAL CHRISTIAN COUNCIL

Need of Church Work in Rural China: Peasantry Bled White by their Misrulers

The subject of the rural church occupied the time of the morning's session on the third day's meeting. The discussion was opened by Rev. H. C. Cheng who read a paper on the question. Mr. Cheng pointed out that this report applied to some three hundred million of the population of China and that these were among the most needy in the country. He reported that their Government blunds them, the military leaders rob them and also steadily on the increase in numbers they are correspondingly on the downgrade in economic position. This speaker asserted that the church had not put her heart into the work in the villages and that the salvation of China could only come through the rural population. A second paper was read by Rev. M. Chen on the same subject. Mr. Chen emphasized the willingness of the rural population to accept outside help in educational problems and that if the Church could help more effectively along these lines it would mean much for itself a great opportunity for evangelism. Mr. Chen then turned to the urgent need of a better pay for rural work and the necessity for extensive independence for the village Christians and village Churches.

The Rev. E. L. Chapin presented the report of the Committee on Rural Problems and the Christian Church. He also touched on the need for the extension for the rural school system be introduced; that a voluntary movement for rural service should be organized; that Agricultural Seminaries and Bible Schools should give special courses in training for village work; that a rural social survey should be carried out; that pioneer centres should be developed to [illegible].

The Rev. E. J. Craig also spoke on the rural problem among the multitudes of the province and the need for an indigenous church not dependent on outside finances. He mentioned in this town were 18 [illegible] and to none of these was an evangelist assigned to rural leaders. The statement was questioned later when Dr. Keller declared, on behalf of the Christian Rural School, a course for such teachers.

Mr. James Yen spoke very eloquently on the necessity of the situation of illiterates, supporting very strongly the use of the [illegible] character system to this end.

Church and State.

In the afternoon session the relations of the National Christian Council to the Governments in regard to public affairs in China was considered and an address on the subject was delivered by Mr. S. T. Wei Commissioner of Foreign Affairs for Kiangsu. A number of questions relating to this problem were raised and replied to by Mr. Wei.

The Rev. E. C. Patton presented the report of the Commission on Church and Industry. Keen discussion followed especially on the opium question and how it might best be tackled not by individuals only but by the Church as a whole.

Dr. S. H. Chuan, formerly Surgeon General in charge of Military Hospitals, addressed the meeting on the subject of opium and presented a report calling for united and vigorous action to show that the use of the drug was generally abhorrent to the mass of the people, who, however, were largely inarticulate in view of the pressure brought to bear on them by military and civil authorities. Dr. Chuan insisted that it was the duty of the Church to give voice to the people's urgent need of assistance and to appeal to the world through the League of Nations to check forever the manufacture and import of opium and its alkaloids.

Attention was called in this report to the inadequacy and obscurity of the regulations governing the importation of morphine for the [illegible] of medicine and smuggling of narcotic drugs.

Fourth Day: Church and Home

The sessions of the Council and the Home occupied the first part of the morning session and the discussion was opened by the Rev. S. Y. Hsu, who stated that without the rising power of Christian home all reforms were useless.

The report of the Council's Conference on the Church and the Home was presented by Mrs. S. M. Woo.

The question of the relations of the Council to the Governing Church and the measure of support that might be expected from the latter, was dealt with in speeches by the Rev. S. P. Chao and the Rev. K. T. Cheng.

In the afternoon the Rev. C. E. Patton presented the Report of the Commission on Church and Industry. Among the proposals of the Commission was one to secure the services of a full time secretary for this work. Speaking on this Mr. Patton pointed out that 18 local commissions had been formed in as many of the principal cities in China.

Dame Anderson's Work

The meeting was addressed by Dame Adelaide Anderson, who reviewed the growth of industrial problems and called on the Church as the only body so organized as to be able to express the needs of the people to renew its strength for the movement.

Bishop Roots, in a resolution of thanks to Dame Anderson, called attention to the fact that she had promised to give a year of service in the cause in China and expressed the gratitude of the Council therefor. The meeting, standing with the exception of Dame Anderson, carried the motion of thanks, and Dame Anderson briefly responded.

Mr. M. T. Tehou then addressed the meeting on the same subject. He pointed out that though Confucianism might pervade China as it has some of the Western nations, there would still be an industrial problem. Mr. Tehou insisted on the great importance of getting to work on the subject at once with a view especially to reducing the hours of employment of women and children in factories.

Fifth Day: The Church and Internationalism

The subject for special consideration at this meeting was that of the Church and Internationalism. The Chairman introduced Mr. Miyazaki, General Secretary of the Japanese Christian Council, who was accorded a very hearty welcome by a standing vote of the Council. Mr. Miyazaki then addressed the meeting prefacing his remarks by expressing the very hearty thanks of the Japanese for the gifts received from China for mitigating the sufferings of the recent earthquake victims. He referred in detail to the loss of life among Japanese Christians and the very extensive destruction of property sustained by them and by the Churches, and concluded with an appeal for the masses of Asia in their weakness and ignorance.

Professor Chao presented the report of the Committee on International Relations and in a short speech defined the position of the Committee as being first for study of this question, pointing out how much harm may be done by text books for schools making false statements on other nations. A study has been made of these and it has been found that, particularly in the United States, harmful misconceptions of China are introduced into school text books.

Sixth Day: Medical Missionary's Work Overwhelmed by Other Demands

The morning session was largely occupied by the reports to the Council of the work of kindred organizations.

The first report was from the Secretary of the China Medical Missionary Association, who presented the report of the Association's work as it affected the National Christian Council.

Dr. Maxwell spoke of the outside work which was gradually overwhelming the essential work of the medical missionary's calling and referring to some extent the special message that his work brings to China's ills. He emphasized the loss to the West of the complete absence of medicine from Christianity and claimed that by the earliest part to this side of the work [illegible] Council the same process was going on here.

The Rev. E. W. Wallace presented the report of the China Christian Educational Association and claimed that one the greatest needs of the Church at the moment was that of educated Chinese leaders. He pointed out the difficulties that the college were meeting and thought that this most important branch of work claimed the sympathetic consideration of the Council, especially as regards the framing of the Rev. E. C. Lobenstine for a part of his time to devote his help to the work of the Educational Association.

Dr. F. J. Wampler presented the report of the Council on Health Education and dwelt on the great loss among Christian workers due to preventable disease, which might and ought to be obviated. The activities of the Council on Health Education were enumerated and members were invited to inspect in the Council's offices the posters and material for exhibition. Mr. T. Y. Chung in speaking to this question suggested the desirability of doctors being appointed to give their whole time to the teaching and development of hygiene work in different districts.

The report of the China Sunday School Union was presented by the Rev. T. F. Pan, who spoke of the advance that had been made by the preparation of the lessons in Chinese directly and not by the use of mere translations.

Mr. J. W. Dovey presented the report of the Survey Committee which was accepted with many thanks to the Committee.

In the afternoon session the Rev. C. E. Patton presented the report of the new Missions Building. Considerable discussion took place as to the appropriate name in Chinese and suggestions for this were referred to the Business Committee. A resolution of hearty thanks to the donors of the building was adopted.

The Rev. P. Chuan advocated the provision of a Christian magazine in Chinese. There was general agreement that this was very desirable if the cost of issuing it were not too heavy a strain on the financial side.

Native Church Problems: Delegates Kept from Conference by Civil War's Turmoil

The National Christian Conference began its last day with a very full programme. Earlier in the day reports of the Denominational Groups were given. These Groups had met on Friday evening; but not until this morning had the reports of their meetings been given in to the Conference. Most of the reports gave suggestions for making the work of the Council better known to the individual churches.

A letter was read from one of the delegates in Kuangtung, stating that he desired to attend the Conference but could not because of fighting all around his village. The letter said that the same condition had prevailed the year before and that within the last year the city had changed hands five different times.

Devotional services were conducted by Mr. F. S. Brockman of the Y. M. C. A.

The report of the Business Committee was considered in the morning session. It contained many recommendations of importance which were acted upon by the Conference. Among other things passed was the appointing of Dr. S. H. Chuan and Mr. T. Z. Koo to represent the National Christian Council at the Anti-Opium Conference to be held in Geneva, arranged for by the League of Nations, this coming autumn. Miss Ruth Cheng and Mr. T. Z. Koo are to bear the greetings of the Conference to Christian groups and organizations in America nad Europe.

A new Committee was formed for the study of the problems of the Indigenous Church. The Standing Committee on Industrial Relations and Social Problems was subdivided into (1) The Industrial Committee, (2) The Committee on the Church and Home, and (3) The Anti-Narcotic Committee.

In the afternoon the Standing Committees of the Council met for organization and the consideration of the problems of the next year's work. Most of the Committees are made up of able and energetic representatives and much work should be accomplished by the time of the annual conference next year.

The closing services were led by Mr. D. E. Hoste of the China Inland Mission and the Rev. F. C. Huang.

CHURCH PARADE OF S.V.C.

Over 600 Men and Officers: Mr. Rowland's Sermon on Loyalty to Religion

"A very creditable turn-out" was the unanimous verdict passed on the Shanghai Volunteer Corps' Church Parade at the Cathedral on Sunday. Over 600 men and 51 officers turned out. The parade formed up on the Bund foreshore at half-past nine in the morning, and, headed by the band, marched by way of the Bund and Foochow Road to the Cathedral. The men presented an impressive sight as they swung along the roads, and a large crowd followed them up.

The Cathedral was full to its limits, and only just sufficed to hold the congregation. Through some misunderstanding the men were brought to the Cathedral at a few minutes after 10 and thus had to wait a considerable time for the Service to begin. The Rev. A. N. Rowland, Chaplain to the S.V.C., preached a short and interesting sermon.

The preacher said there were many people who adopted the attitude that they would join the Church when all the sections of it had settled their differences, and it had become one unanimous whole. The attitude was a wrong one, for in true religion the worship of Christ was the great and primary thing, and the troubles of the Church today were only secondary. Personal loyalty was the thing which counted, and the thing should strive after,—the hero-worship of Christ. The attitude which said, Let us wait and have a good time until the Church is perfect, was a wrong one, and brought to mind the case of the Chinese cadets on the Hwa Jah, who, when told to do some rough work, refused to put a hand to it until they had eaten, and then, when told that they would never make seamen, replied that they came aboard to be made officers, not seamen, to give orders and not to take them. The contrast this action afforded to the discipline of their own fine navy recalled to mind, again, that in the non-Christian country they should never forget htat they were here as the representatives of a Christian nation, and that they should bear themselves as such.

The service closed with the hymn "O Worship the King." The men formed up in the Cathedral grounds, and marched back to the Bund via Nanking Road in the same formation as they arrived. The parade was dismissed on the Bund.

Band, 27 other ranks.

Headquarters, nine officers, four other ranks.

Light Horse, four officers, 35 other ranks.

Field Artillery Battery: five officers, 45 other ranks.

Engineer Company, two officers, 16 other ranks.

Mr. Kan Yuk-kai and Mr. Kan Shu-ching (brother and son, respectively, of the late Mr. Kan Chiu-kang) have been elected president and general manager of the Nanyang Bros. Tobacco Co., Ld. The latter is a comparatively young man, an American returned student and the son-in-law of Mr. Chun Bing-him, compradore of Messrs. A. W. Burkill & Sons.

S. V. C. ANNUAL INSPECTION

Tactical Exercises with Good Results: 886 Members on Parade

Wednesday's inspection of the Shanghai Volunteer Corps, by Major-General Sir John Fowler, K.C.M.G., C.B., D.S.O., assumed a novel form, as instead of the usual parade and march past on the Public Recreation Ground, the inspection comprised tactical manoeuvres, in which the Volunteer Corps was divided into three distinct columns, each of which included members of all branches of the Corps, as well as of the Cadet Corps.

Marching from three bases by converging routes, the three columns concentrated in Bubbling Well Road, near the junction with Hart Road, and after forming into column of route, and headed by the Municipal Band, proceeded eastwards down Bubbling Well Road to the saluting base, just east of Hardoon Road, where there were present Major-General Sir John Fowler, commanding H. M. Forces in China; Major Trench, M.C., his chief of staff; Mr. Stirling Fessenden, Chairman of the Municipal Council and Civil Commandant of the S.V.C., Mr. W. P. Lambe, Vice-Chairman, and other members of the Council; Col. W.F.L. Gordon, C.M.G., D.S.O., Commandant, S.V.C., the road being lined from Loongfei to Hart Road by hundreds of interested spectators.

The march past the saluting base was headed by Major R. W. Davis, in command of Column No. 1, followed by Major A. J. Stewart (Column No. 2) and Major S. A. Ransom (Column No. 3).

There were 886 officers and other ranks on parade, details of which are as follows:—

FOUR SUSPECTED ARMS RUNNERS CAUGHT

Italian and Three Frenchmen from the M. M. S. Amboise

One Italian and three French seamen, suspected to have been smuggling arms and ammunition ashore from the M.M.S. Amboise, are in custody, following an exciting chase in which the Settlement and River police participated.

Shortly after 6.45 p.m. on Thursday, while playing tennis in the Yangtszepoo Police station compound, several members of the Municipal Police were surprised by the sound of police whistles in the direction of Lay Road Jetty. A minute later four foreigners were seen to land from a sampan. They ran to a vacant plot near the police station, followed by a Riveer policeman and Chinese constables, who effected the arrests.

The Chinese River policeman afterwards reported that while patrolling the stream in his sampan, he saw another sampan, with the foreigners on board, put off from the Amboise. Suspicion that they might be arms smugglers led him to pursue the craft. Presently the foreigners threw a quantity of pistols and ammunition overboard. He chased them, whereupon they made for the jetty, which proved their undoing.

The Trustees of the Sethna Cricket Prize Fund (Capt. E. I. M. Barrett, Mr. G. M. Billings and Mr. T. Wallace) have awarded prizes for the season 1923 to A. Nobleton, of the Shanghai Public School, and J. H. Bhoora, of the Parsee Cricket Club. The prizes were given to encourage young cricketers in Shanghai in all-round play.

CATHOLIC GENERAL COUNCIL OF CHINA

Momentous Meeting in Shanghai: 45 Bishops in Procession at Siccawei: Catholic Church in China Past and Present

The first historical monument attesting the introduction of Christianity into China dates from the eighth century. It is the famous stone slab discovered A.D. 1625, near the city of Sianfu, in Shansi. It bears the date of A.D. 781, and states that the early missionaries had several churches and monasteries, and enjoyed liberty to preach the Gospel. They were banished in A.D. 845, by an edict of the Emperor Wutsung, of the T'ang Dynasty.

Scattered groups, however, continued to live in various parts of the country, and the Venetian traveller Marco Polo found several Nestorian congregations at Kashgar, Samarcand, Peking, Yangchow, Chinkiang and Hangchow at the close of the 13th century.

In the second half of that same century, and during the 14th; several Catholic missionaries were sent to China by the Roman Pontiffs and by Catholic Sovereigns. Among them were Dominicans and Franciscans, the latter having an archbishop at Peking, the well-known John of Montecorvino. Towards the middle of the 16th century, the Portuguese occupied Macao, and in A.D. 1575 erected a bishopric there.

Soon afterwards, the Jesuits entered China, settling at first at Chaok'ingfu, (1583), the official Capital of the Two Kuang Provinces; and proceeding later on to Nanch'ang, in Kiangsi, Nanking in Kiangsu, and finally going to Peking. In this latter place Ricci resolved to secure the esteem and good-will of the Emperor and Literati, in which he wonderfully succeeded, thanks to his exquisite tact, his scientific accomplishments and his thorough knowledge of the language. He thus enabled other missionaries to enter the field, the Paris Foreign Mission, the Vincentians or Lazarists, followed in the present century by various Foreign Missionary Societies, Italian, Belgian, German, Irish and American, representing the principal nations of the West.

At the opening of 1924, the Catholic Church reckoned in China 57 bishops and 2,552 ordained priests. Of these 1,481 are foreign, and 1,071 native. Comprising the bishops, the whole ordained clergy totals 2,609. These are distributed over the Eighteen Provinces and Outlying Dependencies, 393 in Chihli, 187 in Shantung, 181 in Mongolia, 172 in Kiangsu, 152 in Hupeh, 84 in Chêkiang, 79 in Manchuria, 64 in Anhui, and 18 in far-off Tibet. The number of Catholic converts reached at the same period 2,208,000 souls, Chihli having over 600,000, Kiangsu over 200,000, Mongolia, Hupeh and Kuangtung over 100,000, and Tibet nearly 5,000. These are recruited from almost every class of society, official, literary, commercial, industrial, agricultural and labouring. In large cities and towns, converts belong principally to the former class, while in rural and village places they are taken from the ranks of petty farmers, artisans and peasants. Some of the Shanghai Catholics, such as Messrs. Loh and Tsu, are industrial magnates, and carry on ship-building, manage tramways and electric works in the native city. Mr. Loh employs part of his fortune in educational and philanthropic works. Others engage in banking, or trade as merchants, manufacturers, brokers, etc. The increasing progress of the Church, the large number of converts and their various needs have determined the summoning of a General Council, to be held in Shanghai, and to which were convoked all the Bishops, the Superiors of Mission Centres, a certain number of consulting theologians, notaries, secretaries, typists, masters of ceremonies, choristers and other minor officials.

Preparatory Meeting of Bishops.

The greater part of the bishops and others convoked, having reached Shanghai about May 10, it was resolved to open the Council on the morning of the 15th. On the previous afternoon, a preparatory meeting was held at St. Joseph's Church, the residence of the Bishop, Right Rev. Prosper Paris, S. J. The hours of special sittings were then notified to all, and Five Commissions established to deal with all matters submitted to the Council. Bishop Taeconi, of Eastern Honan, presides over the First Commission; Bishop Aguirre, of Foochow, over the Second; Bishop Fabrèques, of Peking, over the Third; Bishop Guerts, of Eastern Chihli, over the Fourth; and Bishop Fatiguet, of Kiangsi, over the Fifth. Italy, France, Spain and Holland are thus represented. Among the consulting theologians, notaries and secretaries, members of the foreign and native clergy are equally represented on the Board.

Among the important matters to be discussed are Christian life and discipline, how to increase the number of converts, and helpers, recruiting and training of the native clergy, educational and philanthropic work, the Press and Catholic literature, dealings of converts and pagans, religious architecture, etc.

Opening Ceremony of the Council.

The opening ceremony of the Council took place on the morning of the 15th, in the large Siccawei Church, five miles south-west of Shanghai. From 8 a.m., a bustling and gazing crowd occupied the square in front of the building, eager to enjoy the spectacle of so many bishops and delegates from all parts of China. Punctually at 8.30 a.m., the assembled bishops started in procession from the old church built in 1851, and proceeded through the open square to the new church opened in 1910. The spectacle was most imposing, 45 mitred prelates, all in red capes, walking in the procession. With reference to nationality, 17 were French, 10 Italians, 5 Spaniards, 5 Belgians, 4 Hollanders, 2 German, and 2 Chinese. Among them were several veterans, who had laboured long years on the Mission, Bishop Henninghaus of South Eastern Shantung, Bishop Timmer of Southern Shansi, Bishop Ciceri, of Kiangsi, Bishop Prosper Paris, of the Shanghai Mission, Bishop Wittner, of Eastern Shantung, this last seized by brigands on the night of November 13, 1923, and released the next day, on condition he would get his captors enrolled in the army. Preceding the bishops were the clergy, comprising Dominicans, Franciscans, Augustinians, Vincentians, Passionists, Jesuits, members of the American Foreign Mission, Kuangtung, of the Irish Mission of St. Cohemben, Hanyang, and other Societies working in the field. His Excellency the Papal Delegate, Celso Costantini, Archbishop of Theodosia, brought up the rear. On the way, several cameras and a cinema operator worked hard at taking the most important scenes, while amidst the crowd and beyond, fire-crackers exploded, imparting to the ceremony a peculiar touch of Oriental life.

Within the church were a large but orderly congregation of the faithful, many of whom came from Shanghai, Sungkiang, Tsingpu, and the country bordering on both sides of the Huangpu. The bishops were ranged in two parallel rows in the chancel. At 9 a.m., solemn-mass was celebrated by the Papal Delegate. After the gospel, all joined in chanting the Nicene Creed, thereby affirming their conformity of belief with the Fathers and Council of the Church from the 4th century down to the present day. Mass over, the Litany of the Saints was solemnly chanted, followed by a sermon addressed to the bishops and officials of the Council. The names of the prelates convoked were then read out, each one rising and answering for his presence. The ceremony closed by solemn benediction, given by the Delegate, after which the clergy and bishops returned in procession to the old church, and unvested. It was 11.15 a.m.

At noon, the Jesuit Fathers of Siccawei offered hospitality to the assembled Bishops, Superiors, theological consultors, and other officials of the Council. As many as 145 sat down at table, and enjoyed the generous fare provided for the occasion. At the close of the banquet, Very Rev. Father Verdier, S.J., Superior-General of the Mission, rose and addressed the Assembly, greeting the Delegate, bishops and other guests, sketching the various phases of the Catholic Church in China, and laying stress on the progress made in the last 20 years, thanks to the arrival of new Societies, Tolesians, Passionists, the American Foreign Mission, and the Irish Mission of Hanyang. His Excellency the Delegate replied in appropriate terms, thanking the hosts for the "royal hospitality" received, and exhorting all to labour for the spiritual and moral welfare of the Chinese people.

At Siccawei College.

At 2 p.m., Siccawei College entertained the members of the Council to a series of tableaux vivants, representing the latter scenes of the Passion of Christ, his glorious Resurrection, a few of the Apparitions, and the early days of the Church, terminating with the Master's Great Commission: "Preach the Gospel to every creature" (Mark VI. 15). All ended about 5 p.m., after which the venerable guests returned to Shanghai, where they are billeted among the various Catholic Churches of the city, St. Joseph's, St. Francis Xavier's, the Sacred Heart, and the general agencies representing the Missions in the interior, Augustinians, Vincentians, Franciscans, Paris Foreign Mission, Belgian Procure, etc.

UNION CLUB IN ITS NEW HOME

Auspicious Opening in Avenue Edward VII: A Great Sino-Foreign Institution

The commodious new quarters of the Union Club situated at 38 Avenue VII, on which premises the organization occupies the entire third floor, were opened on Monday afternoon and evening with an informal "at home." Mr. V. G. Lyman, President, with a few introductory remarks, declared the Club open. He was supported by Messrs. Drakeford, Powell, Steen, Calder Marshall and Campbell, a representative of Mr. Chu Pao-san, Chinese Vice-President, and other Chinese committee-men.

Mr. S. Fessenden, Chairman of the S.M.C., and Mr. E. S. Benbow Rowe attended on behalf of the Municipality, and the various Consulates delegated representatives. Mr. Hsu Yuan, Commissioner of Foreign Affairs, was in attendance.

Members of the Club acted as hosts and escorted the many guests throughout the new premises, showing them the card room. the mahjongg room. through the large ballroom in which it is proposed to hold tea dances, the billiard room, spacious enough for two tables and the Chinese lounge. Private dining rooms as well as the large banquet hall are a feature of the new rooms, lacking in the old quarters on the Bund, while the new reading room is ample enough for a good portion of the membership.

Although festivities began with a tea dance at five o'clock guests lingered through dinner at eight and the dance which followed. Heartiest congratulations were expressed during the evening on the Club's new home.

Mr. Lyman's Speech.

Mr. Lyman prefaced his remarks with words of welcome to the members and their guests and continuing, said:—

"The Union Club has been in existence sufficiently long to justify its place in the business community, and to assure its definite continuance, while its usefulness along the lines for which it was formed will, without question, steadily increase in scope and influence from year to year. Unique as an institution, it provides the necessary facilities for the business men of the three nationalities of which it is composed to meet in social and business converse under agreeable surroundings. A realization of business conditions as they exist in China suggests the value of an institution having for its main purpose the promotion of an increased feeling of cordiality and a degree of closer co-operation among the people of which this Club is composed.

"To a large extent the considerable lack of sympathetic interest existing between Chinese and foreigners as such, is due not to inherent prejudice or disfavour, but to suspicion, and to an unfortunate lack of appreciation and understanding of each other which it is so essential to correct, and which only increased personal and social contact can effectively remove.

"The Chinese and the men of the West will never know each other as they should until they are accustomed to meet not merely in their offices. or at occasional functions, but from day to day and time to time in such an institution as this where, surrounded with an atmosphere of friendship and good will, they can sit down and reason together general interest, and thus on scores of subjects, and with much satisfaction, find that their minds meet on common ground. To make this possible of accomplishment the Club was formed, exists, and will continue to exist in order to promote and extend a beneficent and wholesome influence: and it is our hope that as a nucleus for the bringing about of a better understanding, a more genuine appreciation between the men of the East and of the West, the results of its efforts will extend far beyond these walls in everwidening circles.

"It is because of this need for the development of closer and more cordial relations and good fellowship that this Club is sustained by its membership to whose continued support great credit is due, and with all the possibilities which lie before us it requires no great vision to foresee the beneficent power the Union Club will exert in the days to come."

GLENAMOY'S PLIGHT

Unsuccessful Attempts to Tow Her off Video Island: More Rough Weather

All attempts to salve the motor-vessel Glenamoy have so far failed and the ship remains on the rocks in a perilous position. The damage originally done to her bows has considerably been increased by the force of rough weather which has been experienced, and on several occasions the officers and men on board have had to make a hurried transfer to the tug boats of the Shanghai Tug & Lighter Company, which have been standing by in turn.

Two or three attempts have been made at high water to lift the bows of the vessel off the rocks by flooding the after holds and towing at the same time, but the vessel held fast. Nothing can be done now until the next high tide, in about 10 days' time, when similar operations will be carried out.

ROSE SHOW

Shanghai Horticultural Society's New Innovation A Great Success

The Shanghai Horticultural Society's first Rose Show, held at the New Carlton on Tuesday afternoon, proved a great success, and there should be little dispute concerning making the event an annual one in future. The entries were numerous, and considering recent conditions the exhibits well up to standard. The cool weather of the last few days assisted the blooms tremendously, though the rain smashed the petals rather badly. This is the first time the Society has embarked on a show devoted almost entirely to roses, the reason being that the spring exhibitions usually fall rather late in the season for this particular bloom, and as roses are so popular it seemed a pity they should not be given an equal chance with later flowers. It is hoped, also, that the show will have the effect of encouraging Shanghai's amateur horticulturists to take a bigger interest in roses. One of the most interesting classes from the point of view of the exhibitors as well as spectators was that for the best arrangement of rose blooms in a bowl of not less than eight inches in diameter, which was won by Mrs. Rayner.

The awards were presented to the winners by Lady Skinner Turner, who, together with her husband Judge Sir Skinner Turner, evinced a great interest in the proceedings. Both are keen horticulturists.

Sir Skinner Turner, in the course of a short address, said he thought they could really congratulate themselves and the exhibitors on the excellence of the flowers they had seen there that day, and in presenting the winners with their prizes, Lady Skinner Turner presented with them the congratulations of both herself and her husband.

ANOTHER BIG HAUL OF ARMS

Over 50 Pistols and 7,000 Rounds of Ammunition in the Amboise

Customs searchers found another large consignment of arms on the French mail boat last Friday. Over 50 automatic pistols and 7,000 rounds of ammunition were discovered in the stewards room of the M. M. S. Amboise, which arrived on Thursday.

The steward was subsequently alleged to be responsible for the smuggling, and arrested and handed over to the French authorities. It is understood that he is being sent to France to be dealt with.

AMERICAN WOMAN'S CLUB

At a business meeting of the American Woman's Club held on Tuesday afternoon, it was voted almost unanimously to raise the Club dues to $20 a year, payable semi-annually. A new Executive Board for the coming year was also elected composed of the following ladies:—Mrs. C. R. Boynton, Dr. J. B. Fearn, Miss Ellen Jansen, Mrs. W. H. Lacey, Mrs. J. Scott Emens, Mrs. W. H. Lunt, Mrs. W. L. Merriman, Mrs. R. W. Squires, Mrs. P. W. Giovannini, Mrs. H. B. Lane.

A proposition to buy a piece of property within the city was brought before the meeting on Tuesday. This proposition had been approved by the Advisory Board and was also approved by the meeting.

SHANGHAI is to have another Russian newspaper, publication of the "Cossack Messenger" in the near future being announced.

THE engagement is announced of Montgomery Reader Harris, younger son of the late Reader Harris, K.C., and Millicent Damaris, only daughter of Sir Skinner and Lady Turner.

THE Shanghai Chinese Bar Association, in a statement just made in connexion with the rendition of the International Mixed Court, recommends the retention of the present Chinese Magistrates as, they state, the men now on the Bench are fully qualified men, honest and efficient.

THE ART EXHIBITION

An Unqualified Success: Summary of Results

(Contributed).

Now that there has been time to analyze the results of the recent Spring Art Exhibition held under the auspices of the China Society of Science and Arts, it is possible to pronounce the undertaking an unqualified success.

The rooms lent by the "North-China Daily News" were very suitable for such an exhibition, and the public owes a debt of gratitude to the proprietors of this newspaper. It is to be regretted, however, that Shanghai does not possess suitable public rooms for such purposes as this exhibition, and that those desirous of promoting such undertakings for the benefit of the entire community should have to depend upon the generosity of a private firm for suitable accommodation.

Artists from Tientsin, Peking and Shanghai participated in the exhibition to the number of 69. One lady sent pictures from Fukien province which arrived too late to be inserted in the catalogue. Five Peking artists and five Tientsin artists exhibited, the remainder being local residents.

Altogether, some 342 water colour sketches, drawings in inks, crayons and pastels were shown, together with 168 oil paintings and 13 pieces of sculpture, making a total of 523 exhibits. The sale of pictures was far from satisfactory due, it is feared, to the fact that a great many of the best pictures were too highly priced to meet the pocket books of would-be purchasers and those who had seen good pictures were not desirous of buying those of inferior quality.

It may here be noted that many pictures were marked by their owners at prices which they could not hope to realise in any part of the world. In London, for five guineas, a purchaser may obtain a very good oil painting or water colour by some artist either with an established reputation or at least with a rising reputation. Certainly, many of the pictures in Shanghai were marked at considerably more than their possible market value. Many inquiries were made as to whether an artist would not be willing to lower the price and in cases where they were, sales were negotiated.

Altogether, 36 pictures were sold, fetching something over $1,000. The best sales were made on the first day of the exhibition.

A Large Attendance.

That the exhibition was highly popular may be judged from the number of people who passed through. Estimating from the number of tickets sold, some 962 foreigners visited the exhibition, while at least 200 foreign school children, mainly from the Thomas Hanbury School, the Cathedral Schools, and the French School, took advantage of the special hours set aside for children who were admitted free. Chinese art students were also admitted free, fully 500 passing through during the six days the exhibition was in progress. The majority of these latter came from the Shanghai College of Fine Arts. The Pootung Middle School sent also a large number, as well as the Ecole Speciale des Beaux Arts.

A Surfeit of Exhibits.

From these facts and figures it will be realised that the art exhibition filled a certain need in the life of the Shanghai community. A certain amount of difficulty was experienced in getting the knowledge of the exhibition to the public, and although it was advertised and written up in the papers throughout the whole of its duration, many people have been heard to remark that they were ignorant of its existence. It may be remarked that, owing to the success with which the exhibition was meeting, it was decided to carry it on for three days longer than was originally intended. It is felt, however, that an exhibition of this kind should be kept open for at least a month, in order to give everybody an opportunity to view the pictures thoroughly. Many people complained that there were too many pictures for them really to see in one visit.

A certain amount of criticism has been levelled against the committee for not making a selection of the pictures exhibited, but it was felt that for the first exhibition, at least, all artists who were sufficiently interested to send in their work should have it exhibited, regardless of the quality. After all, the exhibition was to show the public the work that is being done in China.

Fully one-third of the exhibitors were Chinese who have taken up the European style of art with considerable success. If a criticism may be made regarding their work, it is that their colours are somewhat too crude to please European patrons of art, which doubtless accounts for the fact that there were not more sales of their pictures. They have yet to learn a lot in regard to the blending of colours, though their workmanship and technique are particularly good.

DOLLAR LINE ROUND-WORLD SERVICE

President Harrison's Trip of 26,000 Miles in 107½ Days

Representatives of the press attended a press tiffin given on Wednesday on the Dollar str. President Harrison and if the passengers have the same food that was on the table, and Captain Ahlin, master of the ship, assured them it was, and they are not seasick a trip round the world on one of these boats must add at least 20 lb. to the average man's weight.

The President Harrison left Shanghai on February 1 of this year on her round-the-world voyage, being scheduled to steam 26,000 miles and her round-the-world voyage, being return to Shanghai at 5 a.m. on May 20. She was actually off the Dollar Wharf at 5 a.m. on May 20 and tied alongside at 5.25 a.m., having touched different countries and visited 21 leading world ports, returning to this city at the hour set several months ago; 107½ days, Shanghai to Shanghai, 55 days Shanghai to New York, and 46 days New York to Shanghai.

The Dollar Line purchased from the U. S. Shipping Board seven vessels of this identical type, which are operated on a fortnightly service. They are now all strung around the globe and it is hard to conceive that there is a sailing every 14 days of a Dollar passenger liner from each of the 21 ports of call, all headed forever westward, making a chain around the world linking together many of the leading countries and most interesting peoples of the universe.

The significance of this ... can only be appreciated when considered that this is the first ... its kind to be attempted in the world. A success cannot be ... overnight, and it will require ... great amount of tireless pioneering. Even in the Mediterranean Sea it is interesting to learn that, from Alexandria to Marseilles via Naples and Genoa, every spare cabin is sold out considerably in advance, as they have never had such a service between those ports as is now offered by this Company, both in the way of accommodations, courtesy and table.

Silver.

With a steady rise each day, the price came yesterday at 34 1/16d. ready and 34⅛d. forward, showing rises of one penny and 1 1/16d. respectively, compared with a week ago. India, China and the Continent have all been reported as buyers.

Bars in stock, 5,235, including silver Yen 10 lakhs.

Stocks of sycee and dollars amount to Tls. 365 lakhs and $416 lakhs, against Tls. 353½ lakhs and $442½ lakhs last week, and Tls. 210¾ lakhs and $385½ lakhs on May 22, 1923. $33 lakhs have been shipped from Shanghai to the cocoon districts during the week.

Exchange.

Exchange left off last week with the official quotation at T.T. 3/2½d. On Monday it was 3/3d., on Tuesday and Wednesday 3/3¼d. On Thursday it opened at T.T. 3/3¼d., the market opened steady with sellers at 3/3⅜d. for near delivery, but with practically no bills offering gradually eased off during the day and closed with the best sellers only quoting 3/3¼d. for May/June delivery. Late in the afternoon the official rate was lowered to 3/3¼d., at which it remains, nearly 1¾d. below the parity of forward silver.

The market yesterday morning opened steady with sellers at T.T. 3/3⅜d. May/June and quickly firmed up and inter-bank business was done at 3/4d. for June. It gradually eased off again and closed easy in the forenoon, with sellers at 3/3⅜d. May/June, 3/3⅛d. July/August, 3⅜d. September/December and Gold $ T.T. 71⅜ May/June, 71⅜ July/August, 72 September forward.

THE SILVER MARKET

India still dominates the silver markets and prices are higher even against selling by China, states an American report. Of the $25,352,639 exports from this country during the first three months of this year, the greater part has gone to India, despite China's large January purchases. This combined total is more than double that of the corresponding period of last year, when it totalled $13,843,766, with silver around 67 cents, against 64 cents at present. In the first three months of 1922 combined exports were $16,375,344.

Although India's total overseas trade is smaller, the decrease is in imports, with an actual larger net favourable balance because of the sustained level in exports. For February, this net favourable trade balance was Rs. 174,700,000, one of the best showings of this kind in its history.

The London market fails to reveal any increased consumption by Europe. Apparently new silver coinage is being taken care of against old silver reserves, although these do not amount to any appreciable totals.

SHANGHAI MARKET REPORT

A More Promising Week Again Upset by Rain: Piece Goods Statistical Position Sound

May 24.

Until yesterday, merchants were feeling quite happy once more, for throughout the week there had been no more rain than was necessary to make the morning canter comfortable and business had brightened up very considerably. The quantities disposed of were not particularly great, but prices on the whole were better and there was a distinct improvement in the demand. Then came renewal of the deluge and again the market is full of doubts. The cotton and produce men are exceptions to the above. Most of the Chinese cotton dealers still are gambling on the gold exchange, whilst the sudden advance in exchange rates has taken all the interest in life out of the export merchants and they have rather less to do than a wildfowler in July.

Piece Goods

The northern markets again have been the principal contractors this week, but the gross sales have not been very great. The market was much brighter and some slight concessions by dealers led to a few sales. With improved weather conditions, clearances increased. The statistical position is the most satisfactory feature of the market and attention has been drawn to the fact that just now it is practically the same as in 1919. There is, however, the great difference that in 1919 there were abundant supplies of cotton in hand and when these were unloaded prices slumped, but now there is no cotton to spare and, indeed, it is said that unless there is a bumper crop this season—which is most unlikely—there will be very little available. So there is every reason for believing that prices will be kept up.

Cotton, Yarn, etc.

China Cotton—The market has continued fairly steady at last week's quotations, but it has been a very dull week, for speculators still are hovering round the gold market. Very little business was done in the Chinese Cotton Goods Exchange, sales amounting to less than half of the recent average. Yesterday's closing quotations there were:—May, 46.75; June, 46.30; July, 45.85; August, 44.80; September, 41.30; October, 38.90. Spot quotations:—Tungchow, 48.50 to 49; Shanghai, 45.50 to 46; Shensi, 46.50 to 47.50; Hankow, 45 to 45.50.

Yarn.—With very little demand, this market also has remained dull. Yesterday's closing quotations on the Chinese Cotton Goods Exchange were:—May, 178.30; June, 176.30; July, 173.90; August, 172; September, 168.80; October, 165.20.

Produce.

The slight revival of interest which was recently experienced in the produce export market has been checked by the sudden advance in exchange rates. Home buyers show no signs of adjusting their ideas to the new C.I.F. values and business in all commodities is moribund. Supplies are scanty and, in consequence, native holders are in a strong position. The outlook generally is far from promising.

ADDITIONAL SALVAGE TUGS FOR SHANGHAI

Two Purchased by Tug & Lighter Co. from H. M. Government

The Shanghai Tug & Lighter Co. have just acquired from H. M. Government the rescue and salvage tugs Saucy and St. Aubin, these two tugs having been taken over by Mr. Firth at Bombay late last month, and both arrived in Shanghai last Friday.

The Saucy is a two-funnel two-masted tug of a very much larger type than the Saint class, having been built to the order of H. M. Government during 1918 for extra heavy work. The St. Aubin is of the same class in all respects as the St. Dominic and St. Sampson previously acquired by the Company. The two tugs made the run from Bombay to Singapore in 9½ steaming days and from Singapore to Shanghai in the same time, after having been delayed owing to the St. Aubin having called at Hongkong and the Saucy having been called by wireless to proceed to the wreck of the motor ship Glenamoy.

RUBBER PRODUCTION IN CEYLON AND MALAYA

London, May 19.

In the House of Commons to-day, replying to a question suggesting the desirability of the Malayan and Ceylon authorities not changing the assessment of standard production of rubber estates while the owners or lessees are visiting the British Empire Exhibition, the Colonial Secretary, Mr. J. H. Thomas, said that such consideration as was desirable in the light of local conditions would no doubt be given by the Governments concerned in such cases, but he did not think that it would be practicable to adopt a suggestion of the nature proposed.—Reuter.

THE C. P. R. SHARES

The latest statistics regarding the distribution of Canadian Pacific Railway shares are contained in the last annual report, which shows that the United Kingdom controls 50.73 per cent. of the total stock outstanding. Canada comes next with 21.14 per cent., followed by the United States with 20.69 per cent., France 2.95 per cent., and other holdings with 4.49 per cent.

THE COTTON MARKET

A cable received from Messrs. Anderson, Clayton & Fleming, New York, May 16, states:—

The continued low temperatures in the south, scant supplies and the strength of the old crop are steadying influences. Better grades and staples are in moderate demand; medium and lower grades are neglected. The domestic spinning condition is bad."

The total output of the Kailan Mining Administration's mines for the week ending May 10, amounted to 93,291 tons and the sales during the same period to 10[illegible] tons.

The Local share market has continued an inactive during the past week and generally conditions are very depressed. A few "Rubber" shares exhibited very small transactions at prices and buyers are holding them offer for more parcels on most cases. There has been no business in London and quotations reported by cable to-day cover nominal approximately the previous week's "Closings".

Cotton mill shares also exhibited very small transactions with prices and buyers are holding at the same as last week's closing quotations. Shanghai Dock & Engineering Co. shares are quoted at Tls. 95 with buyers at Tls. 94 and sellers at Tls. 96. Shanghai Dock and S. & H. Wharf are again quoted as "Buyers" but no business is reported.

Our London market quotations with the exception of Gula Kalumpong Rubber Estates and Shanghai Electric Construction Co. show no marked changes and the following are the latest prices offered to us by cable this week:—

COMPANY MEETING

LANE, CRAWFORD & CO., LD.

Annual General Meeting.

The [illegible] annual general meeting of Messrs. Lane, Crawford & Co., Ld., was held on Thursday afternoon; Mr. James Ambrose presided, supported by Messrs. D. W. Crawford, E. H. Dunning, (directors) J. F. Lucas, (secretary) and other [illegible] representing 1,848 shares.

The Chairman said:—

As the report and accounts for the year ended February 29, 1924, have for some time been in your hands, with your consent I propose taking them as read.

Your directors have great pleasure in presenting to you what is, in their opinion, such a satisfactory result of the past year's working, for though the great bulk of the work of reconstruction and alterations to your premises was completed during the previous year [illegible] done during the year under review to finish off the premises internally which I believe may now be considered as completed and in a manner satisfactory to you all. The work took a long time to complete, but as you must be aware it is much more difficult to carry out such changes as we have made than it is to [illegible]

There was [illegible] any particular [illegible] in our trading during the year except that the turnover was not a record one, was larger than that of the previous year and the business which so far has been done during the current year is very satisfactory, and would be about in still more so if general business conditions in Shanghai improved.

Turning to the accounts you will see that the balance of working accounts is $77,125.44 against $40,081.65 which may be considered a satisfactory increase.

Land and buildings still stand in our books at $330,000 but you will see that we have expended on these buildings the sum of $126,113.02 in addition to $14,343.25 received from the Municipal Council for the surrender ex the lots for widening the Nanking Road, or in all a total of $140,456.27.

The assessed value of our land is Tls. 292,125 which is more than ample cover for our debenture issue of Tls. 240,000.

Furniture, fixtures and machinery stood in our last balance sheet at $23,778.69 and during the year we have expended on these the sum of $6,781.11 less depreciation written off of $5,559.80 leaving this item as shown in the balance sheet now before you at $25,000.

I would like here to draw your attention to the fact that during the three years ended the February 29, last we have expended on:—

Furniture, fittings and Machinery	$25,890.00
Buildings improvement account	126,113.00
Buildings on B.C. Lot 925	92,443.00
Paid off mortgage on B.C. Lot 925	13,341.00
	$257,787.00

the bulk of which has been paid out of revenue and in addition during the same period we allocated to stock reserve $75,000, which figures are, I think, ample evidence of the soundness of your business.

Our stocks have been carefully taken, checked and valued at actual cost or less and stand at $[illegible] an increase over last year of $[illegible]

Stock reserve has disappeared from this year's balance sheet the $20,000 standing at credit of this item having been used during the year to write off stocks damaged and general reserve is unchanged at $150,000.

Bank overdraft is $422,007.13, practically the same as last year when it stood at $420,724.80.

Investment account is unchanged at $5,805.97, a list of which investments can be seen by any shareholder or depositor to date present value of which is over $12,000.

I run the report you will see that the balance at credit of profit and loss account including $5,539.52 brought [illegible] to $[illegible] out of which [illegible] to deal with [illegible] overdraft [illegible] and [illegible] to stock reserve [illegible] to staff pension [illegible] $5,000 and to [illegible] $[illegible] carried to the [illegible] account to [illegible] this item will then amount to $100,000, as against $126,113.02 expended in alterations and improvement, so that if all goes well during the current year this item on both sides of the account should almost or quite disappear at the end of the current year.

This, gentlemen, is all I have to say in connexion with the report and accounts now before you, but I will do my best to answer any questions shareholders may wish to put to me.

Resolutions.

The following resolutions were unanimously passed:—

That the statement and accounts as presented for the 12 months ending February 29, 1924, be accepted and passed—proposed by Mr. J. Ambrose and seconded by Mr. D. W. Crawford.

That a dividend at the rate of 10 per cent. on the capital of the company be declared, payable at the Hongkong & Shanghai Banking Corporation to shareholders on record on May 22, 1924 proposed by Mr. J. Ambrose and seconded by Mr. E. H. Dunning.

That Mr. D. W. Crawford be re-elected a director of the company—proposed by Mr. H. H. Reed and seconded by Mr. B. H. Goying.

That Messrs. M. Thomson & Co., be reelected auditors to the company to [illegible] until the [illegible] general meeting and that their remuneration be Tls. [illegible] per annum proposed by Mr. B. H. Goying and seconded by Mr. P. W. Egharave.

At the conclusion of the regular business Mr. Reed, in resolving a vote of thanks to the directors and [illegible], said that they had with their able management of the business [illegible] through a difficult period when in the past year [illegible] the entire front of the building was nothing but a blank wall.

In reply the Chairman stated that the success was due to a hearty co-operation between company officials and employees.

THE SHANGHAI TOTAL ABSTINENCE LEAGUE

Seventh Annual Meeting: Teaching Temperance in the Schools

The seventh annual meeting (eighth year) of the Shanghai Total Abstinence League was held on Tuesday afternoon, when a small, but keenly interested, number of members were in attendance. Mr. G. E. Peet, the President, occupied the chair.

The various activities carried on by the Committee throughout the year were reported to the meeting. It was noted that the Bulletin had been issued regularly and that appreciative remarks had reached the Committee about the successive issues. Correspondence with the Municipal Council about introducing temperance teaching in the Municipal Schools was referred to. Also a sub-committee had spent time writing to America and Great Britain to gather information about methods of teaching temperance in the schools of those countries. The Committee entered a protest against the issuing of new licences in [illegible] and other districts.

Reference was made to a prize competition for children attending the Municipal (Foreign) Schools, on the subject: Alcohol, What it is, and What it does. The results of this competition will be announced later.

The treasurer's statement showed a small balance of $146, and it was made clear that funds are needed to carry on the work.

A [illegible] was read, a number had failed to pay dues for the year just completed. It was hoped that better results would forthcoming next session.

Officers and a Committee were appointed, as follows: [illegible] G. E. Peet; [illegible], Captain H. McCallum; Secretary, W. M. Cameron; Treasurer, C. J. Parsons; Committee, G. W. Shipway and J. Mason; W. A. B. Inwood continues as editor of the Bulletin.

A hearty vote of thanks was passed to [illegible] for their co-operation.

MUNICIPAL GAZETTE NEWS

Police Report for April.

Serious Crime.—This includes the murder of two Chinese and the attempted murder of a Foreign Constable and coolie by an armed gang of robbers in the Gordon Road District on the night of April 5: the murder of a railway coolie who was shot dead on the Chekiang Road on the morning of April 19: the murder of an unidentified Chinese who was shot in a house in Yunnan Road on April 20: the death of a wheelbarrow coolie on April 24 following a fight with another coolie in the Central District on April 22: the murder of a Chinese who was found with bullet wounds in an alleyway off Park Road on April 24 and who died in hospital the following day: the wounding of a Chinese who was shot in the stomach on the afternoon of April 26 on the Fokien Road: the murder of an unknown Chinese whose body with a bullet wound in the head was found in an alleyway off Taku Road on the night of April 28: and the murder of another unknown Chinese whose body bearing two bullet wounds was found in the country off Penang Road in the early morning of April 29.

Seven men arrested in the first mentioned case and one in the fourth were under remand at the end of the month.

Robbery.—Seven reports of armed robbery from dwelling houses and shops and two of armed highway robbery were recorded. Shots were fired by the robbers in six instances, resulting in the death of two Chinese and the wounding of a Foreign Constable, a Chinese coolie and a Chinese female. Two cases of attempted armed robbery from dwelling houses also occurred, the robbers in both instances making good their escape on an alarm being raised by the inmates.

In connexion with the foregoing reports and with armed robberies committed prior to April 1, eighteen persons in possession of two automatic pistols were arrested. Four were remitted to the Court of the Military Governor, one was sentenced to imprisonment and the charge against six was withdrawn, while the remaining seven were under remand at the end of the month. The charge against three men arrested for beng associates of armed robbers was withdrawn. Two men arrested for being associates of in possession of a loaded pistol each for an unlawful purpose. One was sentenced to imprisonment whilst the other was under remand at the end of the month. One man, arrested for murder and armed robbery in territory under Chinese jurisdiction, was handed over to the authorities concerned.

A robbery from a building in course of construction in which no arms were used occurred in the Yangtszepoo District. In connexion with this report and with a case which occurred in March, four men were arrested. One was sentenced to three years' imprisonment whilst the other three were under remand at the end of the month.

Trafficking in Firearms.—During the month two Japanese were arrested and charged with trafficking in firearms. They were sentenced to seven and five days' imprisonment respectively. Two Chinese charged in connexion with the attempted sale of an automatic pistol were also dealt with. One of them, who was further charged with offering a bribe to a police officer, was sentenced to two years' imprisonment whilst the other man was acquitted. Another Chinese charged with being in possession of pistol ammunition was under remand at the end of the month.

False Information.—A Chinese, who was arrested in connexion with armed robberies in the Gordon Road District and against whom the charge was subsequently withdrawn, was at the Mixed Court on April 25 sentenced to thirty months' imprisonment for giving false information implicating himself and two others in the above robberies.

Illtreatment of Slave Children.—Reference has been made in previous reports to cases of illtreatment of slave children in Chinese families. While the buying and selling of children is just as illegal in China as elsewhere, it is common knowledge that it is recognized and extensively practised and there need, therefore, be no apology for setting out for purposes of record yet another case which has been dealt with and which goes to show that these children even when placed in homes where their lot might be a happy one are very badly treated. As a rule previous reference has been made to these cases when the cruelty has been of a particularly revolting nature. In the instance now dealt with, however, the main point of interest lies in the fact that the cruelty was perpetrated with the full knowledge of and in the house of an ex-official of high position. Two slave girls aged 13 and 15 had been accused of the theft of a silver spoon. Their mistress, previously the mistress of a brothel and now married to the aforementioned official, is alleged to have assaulted the girls with a thin iron rod on several previous occasions, and this instrument, according to their statement, was again requisitioned to punish them for the loss of the spoon. Subsequently the girls ran away from the house intending to proceed to the Door of Hope. They spoke to a Constable who took them to the Police Station from which they were sent to the Shantung Road Hospital. The medical certificates show that one of the girls was suffering from extensive and severe bruising in both shoulders and thighs and the second from a small scalp wound probably caused by a blow. One of the girls states that she was sold into a brothel previously managed by the woman, now the official's wife, for the sum of $70. On the girls being brought before the Mixed Court they were at their own request sent to the Door of Hope.

Crime beyond Settlement limits.—Two cases of murder and twelve of armed robbery were reported as having occurred during the month in territory under Chinese jurisdiction in the neighbourhood of Shanghai. In three instances inmates of houses plundered were wounded, whilst in a case of armed highway robbery the victim was shot with fatal results.

Executions.—Five Chinese were executed at Lunghua in the presence of a representative of the Municipal Police. Three of these men had been found guilty of murder, attempted murder and armed robbery in the Settlement during December 1923 and with being in possession of two loaded automatic pistols when arrested. The other two men were convicted of armed robberies in the western district during September 1923.

On April 29 a brigand, who had been found guilty of kidnapping in Shantung two women whom he later brought to Shanghai, was executed at Lunghua.

Legal Assistance to Armed Robbers.—It would have been surprising if the decision arrived at by the Magistrates and Assessors of the Mixed Court, namely, that in every charge of armed robbery brought before the Court the accused should have the benefit of legal assistance, had not very quickly given rise to discussion. It is well known to the Police that news of the Mixed Court decision travelled very rapidly indeed among the members of the armed robber fraternity—in itself extremely significant as proving the importance with which they regarded it—and there is unquestionably grave reason to fear that the good intentions which led up to the innovation will be set at naught and may even cause dire results by reason of the attitude of those whom it is sought to benefit. Far from viewing the new rule as a worthy attempt to copy the best methods for the administration of justice, armed robbers already inside the Settlement regard it as a further loophole of possible escape. With the spread of the news to the neighbouring provinces, it is quite certain that their brethern in crime outside the Settlement will welcome it as an additional and determining reason why they should migrate from their native villages to the foreign Settlement of Shanghai where, instead of the short shrift provided by Chinese methods, they will find themselves entitled to the benefits of legal advice when captured.

THE YACHT CLUB

The members of the Shanghai Yacht Club had a splendid time on Sunday on the occasion of the opening cruise. All the six new boats of the Byrne class turned out and with this substantial addition to the fleet there was what was said to be a record muster, 21 cruisers, motor boats and racing yachts following the Commodore's Phantom up to the Seven Mile Reach, where the Foam anchored, the others tying up round her. Nearly 100 members, with a number of ladies, then gathered on the Foam, where the customary pleasant formalities were observed and on the call of the Commodore (Mr. E. T. Byrne) toasts were drunk to the King and the Shanghai Yacht Club.

Arrangements had been made to sail three races after tiffin, but a number of exciting happenings during the race for the Byrne boats reduced the programme to two. Early in the morning there was practically no wind, but it freshened during the run up to the anchorage and by the time set for the first race there was a spanking sailing breeze and all were anxious to see how the new boats would behave. Four of the six got away to a very level start, but the Vice-Commodre's Gnome (No. 25), which had been performing wonders on the way up, soon forged ahead and thereafter had the race to herself. The Sprite fouled a mark-boat, and the Rear-Commodore's Ghost, halfway through the race, struck a submerged stone-bank and her rudder-post snapped off short, putting her out of the race. The rest performed splendidly, showing fine sailing qualities and proving to be very seaworthy. Mr. H. K. Strachan's Spook ran in fourth, but a sudden gust just as she was rounding the Foam carried her on to the flagship, her mainsheet was torn away and she capsized, the skipper, the owner and two others getting a ducking. The experience was worth it, for no harm resulted, the boat remained afloat and in 20 minutes had been set right again and could have been sailed if necessary, showing that there need be no fear of serious accidents. After this the whole fleet raced for home.

The Gnome won the Byrne class race, the Haikuan (Dr. Hill) won the old boats' race on time allowance, and there was a most exciting run home, the Viking and Phantom finishing almost dead level, with several others close behind and the result will not be known until the allowances have been calculated. Altogether it was a most interesting and enjoyable cruise.

France Unexpectedly Beaten by United States in Rugby Final

Paris, May 18.

The United States to-day defeated France in the final of the Olympic Rugby by 17 points to 3.

The United States, whose victory upset all calculations, scored the first try four minutes from the opening of play and thenceforth had the best of the game. The lighter Frenchmen did not like their hard tackling. Two Frenchmen were incapacitated and one was badly shaken, and the losers became demoralized towards the end. The Americans showed superior speed, weight and dash. The French forwards played well, but the backs failed to pierce the American defence.—Reuter.

LEECHES AND LAPPERS

To the Editor of the
"North-China Daily News."

Shanghai by swarms of snakes, eels, turtles, tortoises, terrapins, frogs, salamanders and alligators, reminds me of an interesting conjecture which I came across recently. I hope you will let me repeat it as it has a bearing on prohibition. No. Sir, I am not going to intimate that the creatures mentioned were nothing more than the effects of a disordered imagination; when Shanghai people see snakes they see the real thing, and I am quite prepared to accept Mr. Sowerby's explanation that in spring time every Chinese home is turned into a Noah's ark for the sake of acquiring merit, just as in a recent trial the magistrate was half inclined to believe that a foreign young lady kept bluebottle flies during the winter, putting them into a fresh bottle of milk every morning. At the same time I think my story is much more instructive and quite as scientific, even though leeches are not such imposing creatures as snakes and alligators.

In your leader on prohibition it was stated that in days when no one was aware of the dangers of drinking impure water, those who did not drink water in its natural state stood as good or even a better chance of surviving than those who did. In a theological work just a very interesting incident in Old

narrate, as perhaps it is not familiar to everyone. A Jewish general in Palestine with an army of 32,000 men determined to make a night accomplish his purpose he wanted only a few picked men. How were these to be selected? First, he told all who were afraid to go home, and 22,000 left him. There were still too many. So the remaining—10,000 were led to a pool of water and told to drink. All but 3,000 went mouths into the water and drank freely. The 3000 scooped up water in the hand and lapped it with the tongue as a dog lappeth. The moderate drinkers were the men chosen. A great victory was won. What is the explanation of the test? It is usually said that it weeded out the soldiers who were deficient in self-control, just as some "Tommies" to-day on a long march on a hot day drink the contents of their water thirst, leaving none for the rest of the day. However, it is now said that painful experience led to the drinking of the water cautiously and sparingly.

"During the campaign against the Turks beyond the Jordan in 1918 a careful observer noticed a fact which probably is the real key to the behaviour of Gideon in making the final selection of his fighting men. It was observed that the raw recruits in the Arab force thrust their faces into a pool of water to drink. The pool was alive with leeches, which fastened themselves in the noses and throats of the drinkers and caused great pain accept this as the real explanation of a decision which has been so variously, and even symbolically, interpreted by comment-

Alike to the Prohibitionist and Anti-Prohibitionist the whole story should be very suggestive.

A Lapper.

PROHIBITION OF SMOKING

To the Editor of the
"North-China Daily News."

Sir,—When will some of us in the world learn "tolerance"? The letter from our lady correspondent, M. H. Polk, is an example of that intolerance which, carried to its logical conclusion, is the cause of the breeding of strife between man and man and the upsetting of this world's peace.

The remedy; your correspondent does not like "[illegible] of" and therefore if we can enforce it [illegible] will be prevented [illegible] for in the [illegible] decided [illegible] A proposed [illegible] to the [illegible] of women to smoke [illegible] a most inconvenience selfishness vs. selfishness.

Your lady correspondent proposes victory for herself by might—enforced prohibition, and the wishful smoker proposes to ride rough-shod over the feelings of others and puff as he selfishly feels inclined. Now I would maintain that the same blame attaches to both, and that the solution of the problem is a conversion of your lady correspondent to the attitude that: "if to be truly unselfish I must suffer being smoked, then smoked I am willing to be." And on the part of the wishful smoker, his attitude should be that: "if my smoking is displeasing to others, then I am content to forgo that indulgence." But prohibition and mailed fists and all tyrannies of that order should in these more enlightened days be relegated to the scrap heap (as tried and found wanting) since prohibition is a usurpation of the fundamental right of all individuals to choose good, not have it jammed down their necks, for that conveys no virtue to the recipient nor to the bestower. Your correspondent quotes: "Self preservation is the first law of life," but I would remind her of a higher and nobler law, that whosoever is willing to lose his life, etc. Prohibition is basically dishonest and a sham.

I am, etc.,
Spectator.

Shanghai, May 16, 1924.

To the Editor of the
"North-China Daily News."

Sir,—The correspondence columns of your most respected journal are entertaining by reason of the discussion now proceeding as to whether a lady who objects to smoking or a man who objects on his part to not being given permission to smoke after dinner should have the right of way.

Rumour has it that those brave and glorious great-grandfathers of ours were chased into the Ritchen to enjoy their pipes. In later years, however, the hand which rocks the cradle would seem to have allowed the evil-smelling thing the entry of her dining-room.

To-day, if one's hostess has a soul—ask Epictetus about that—she will mark the moment when her male guest approaches utter extinction and retire with her retinue of ladies. Then one smokes the pipe or cigar or cigarette of utter peace—perfectly certain that all the innocent ears are very near and on the qui vive for the best story told.

But if the sweet lavender and pot-pourri scented drawing room should be reserved from all possibility of taint, the hostess is either one of those virgins who grow lilies or an amazon who never captured a man.

According to our modern usage, one expects to be allowed to escape from the super-rule of the female for at least 50 minutes after dinner—and to be allowed to smoke, for "Woman is only a woman. But a good cigar is a smoke".

I am, etc.,
Twemlow.

THE LINCHENG AFFAIR

To the Editor of the
"North-China Daily News."

Sir,—In your correspondence [illegible] of the Ten [illegible], "Barbarian" reminded us of the Lincheng affair which happened a year ago, but "Fraternity" on the same date asked us to forget the incident of the Japanese 21 demands.

It is not that "Barbarian" and "Fraternity" belong to two different schools of thought—one is "lest we forget" and the other "let bygones be bygones." But like King Edward, who was accredited with being able to say the right thing at the right time, each of them has not the least doubt as to which school he should belong when occasions arise. It depends very much on how matters have affected him.

Much prominence was given to the Lincheng affair when it occurred, and constant references were made to it on subsequent dates in your paper, but the murder of Chinese after the Japanese earthquake did not seem to have aroused general indignation. Your paper did not give such prominence to it as the gravity of the matter deserved. Indeed the heading of the article of the 8th instant would lead a reader to think that Koreans only were concerned.

A year has now elapsed, since the Lincheng incident occurred, so most of us, excepting "Barbarian," can view the matter in a reasonable and sober light. It has been admitted that the perpetrators of the crime were bandits and not ordinary citizens who were the murderers in Japan. I believe no country in the world can afford to subjects of other nations immunity from the molestation of its outlaws. But if Chinese can be murdered by Japanese country folk with impunity, then might is indeed right. If suitable restitutions are not forthcoming from Japan for the murders, the payment of a heavy indemnity for the Lincheng affair will only embitter Chinese feeling, who were responsible merely because they had not power to overthrow the warlords who are ruining the country.

MOSAIC LITERATURE

To the Editor of the
"North-China Daily News."

Sir,—I have read with interest Cione's letter in your issue of May 9. With the change of one word let me apply to myself the last statement in that letter. "My object in writing is only to endeavour to counteract the misleading impression that Cione's letter is liable to leave on the casual reader."

His reference to "a Prof. Wilson of Princeton Theological Seminary" would give a casual reader the impression that Prof. Wilson is an obscure, unknown person, so as a preface to my remarks it seems necessary to give some facts along this line.

Prof. Robert Dick Wilson has spent about 40 years studying the languages and literature bearing on the Old Testament. He has mastered Greek, Latin, French, German, Hebrew, Italian, Spanish, Portuguese, Syriac, Arabic, the various Aramaic dialects, Babylonian, Ethiopic, Phœnician, Egyptian, Coptic, Persian and Armenian—in all about 26 languages or dialects.

He studied with Schrader (called the father of Assyriology). He studied Arabic and Syriac under Sachau and Arabic under Jahn and Dieterich, Hebrew under Dillmann and Strack and Egyptian under Brugsch.

After a patient and careful study in every language of all the extent literature having any bearing on Old Testament criticism, Prof. Wilson has come to the conclusion that the composite origin of the Pentateuch in the sense claimed by the critics is a fallacy.

What, then, are we to do with Cione's statement that "Biblical scholars are agreed that the Pentateuch is a composite work etc."? The inference is that Prof. Wilson is not a Biblical scholar. In the same way many other noted and brilliant contributors to the discussion of Biblical questions would be ruled out.

Cione has well illustrated the critical position, which is practically this: "Those who agree with us are scholars; those who disagree with us are not scholars."

There are many cogent reasons why conservative scholars refuse to accept the documentary hypothesis. Out of many passages that disprove that hypothesis let me refer briefly to two.

First, the critics claim that nowhere is the composite nature of the narrative more evident than in the Bible account of the deluge. But one of the Babylonian flood stories that goes back to about 2000 B.C. follows in a general way the Bible narrative and contains both the so-called J and E elements of that narrative. This startling refutation of the documentary hypothesis moves Prof. Sayce to speak of that hypothesis as "a philological mirage."

Secondly, take the narrative of the plagues. The first nine plagues, taken in the order given fall naturally into three groups.

1. Blood	4. Flies	7. Hail
2. Frogs	5. Murrain	8. Locusts
3. Lice	6. Boils	9. Darkness

The first plague in each series is introduced, with slight variation, by the words, "And the Lord said unto Moses, Rise up early in the morning and stand before Pharaoh—lo! he cometh forth to the water."

The second plague in each series is introduced by the words, "And the Lord said unto Moses, Go in unto Pharaoh and say unto him [illegible]

Thus the first plague in each series is announced to Pharaoh by the river side, and the second in his palace, but the third in each series is brought on without warning. This orderly arrangement could not be brought about by combining separate documents.

Compare with this analysis the one given in the Oxford Hexateuch.

J	E	P
The river smitten death of the fish	Waters of the river turned to blood	Waters of Egypt turned to blood
Frogs	—	Frogs.
—	—	Lice.
Flies	—	—
Murrain	—	—
—	—	Boils
Hail	Hail	—
Locusts	Locusts	—
—	Darkness	—
Death of firstborn	Death of firstborn	Death of firstborn

Let the casual reader compare these two analyses and take his choice. As to the possibility of the Pentateuch having been written in the time of Moses (1300—1400 B.C.), Prof. Sayce tells us that there was a postal service between Canaan and Babylonia in the days of Naram Sin (about 2650 B.C.), and that some of the clay bullae which served as stamps are now in the museum of the Louvre. The Phœnician alphabet was invented several hundred years before the time of Moses, and the Hebrew language was spoken in Canaan before the time of the Exodus. There is absolutely no reason why the Pentateuch could not have been written in Hebrew by Moses, using either the Phœnician script or the Babylonian cuneiform script, both being current at that time, and Moses being "learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians."

The trouble with a great many radical critics is that they are so wrapped up in their preconceived theories that facts have no chance to penetrate.

A modern writer puts the matter thus

"Facts are quite helpless in the face of theories. For after all, most facts are insufficiently encouraged with applause. When a fact comes along, the people in charge are generally looking the other way. This is what is meant by not facing the facts.

All the experiences of the theorist's life tend to confirm his theory. This is always so. Did you ever hear of a theory being confuted?"

A PROCLAMATION OF THE DAYS OF CHRIST

To the Editor of the
"North-China Daily News."

Sir,—According to Home papers just to hand, ecclesiastics and theologists of all religious convictions are intensely excited over the discovery by the French Government Archaeological Mission of Southern Tunis of a document which it believes is the original decree issued by the Romans that denounced Jesus and under whose clauses He was tried and crucified.

Nothing touching the discovery of the document has aroused scepticism of its authenticity. It seems to substantiate the history of Jesus's trial, placing the responsibility on the Roman Government rather than on the Hebrew high priests. According to the decree it would also appear veritable that Jesus's crime in the eyes of Rome was that He named Himself "King of the Jews."

A summarized translation of the decree follows:—

"To all Colonial Governors of the Roman Empire in Palestine and Near and Further Arabia. Prophets and religious revolutionists have arisen among the people. These prophets are not to be interfered with under Roman law except when their teachings are of such a nature as to cause disturbances among the people. In such cases they are to be effectively suppressed. It is particularly desirable that these prophets be not allowed to interfere with collection of taxes or any other political affairs."

Since Rome at this time was dominated almost exclusively by Pagan religionists and by Pagan religious doctrines, it is highly credible that contrary beliefs were treated with the extreme severity this decree indicates. While the Government itself was liberal in attitude toward religion, it was nevertheless so superstitious where its strength and dignity were concerned that anything which tended to hamper its movements was speedily exterminated as inimical to its sacredness.

It is generally admitted that this period of Rome was one in which the conduct if its Armorial and Civic government was the real [illegible] ligion. Under such [illegible] it is easily believed that Jesus's [illegible] turbances, in making it difficult for the Roman tax collectors and other officials to function smoothly, invoked the wrath of Rome.

Shanghai, May 19, 1924.

*Abler pens than ours will [illegible] bably reply on this subject, but the general trend of our correspondent's letter does not at all suggest substantiation of the history of our Lord's trial as given in the New Testament. The Romans certainly had no ground of complaint against Him in respect of tax-collecting (Vide "Render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's"). Nor do we know what our correspondent means by "Jesus's disturbances." The only popular demonstration, on His side, was the entry into Jerusalem on Palm Sunday, which ended in the throwing out from the Temple of money-changers and those who sold doves for Jewish ritual—no Roman tax-collectors were involved.—Ed.

TRAINING SHIP HWAH JAH

To the Editor of the
"North-China Daily News."

Sir,—With reference to the article published in your paper of the 8th inst., we are to point out the letter you referred to contains nothing else but tissues of falsehood and the comments made thereform were therefore misleading.

We know, as well as the cadets of any other nationality do, what we must learn from and what duties are assignable to us by officers appointed for that purpose. To get us to execute any work of the crew in which the officer themselves even do not feel inclined to participate, or to take an interest in the training of ourselves for its performances is an infernal mistake. They must be conscientious, if their respects and capacities desirve recognition. We have been treated as chattles: we would not tolerate longer. We can learn and have learned nothing from the officers, who could not even mind their own business for which their removal from the ship is perhaps, one of the reasons.

The defects of the ship and in her engines are said by the officers to be none, when she first came into commission on January 12, 1924. They were put on board prior to January 1 for purpose of examining the ship for which they were paid. For the above purpose and in their brief association with contractor Tung Tai, who repaired the ship, they were somehow able to give him, the contractor, a certificate of works done to their entire satisfaction and, we understand, if was on strength of this certificate, the owners made payment. The statements of the letter above referred to must, therefore, go wholesale against themselves in view of the facts above alluded to. More serious still an affair entirely detrimental to the interest of their employers, a responsible officer declared damagd cargo to the extent far more than what the Marine Surveyor could discover from his survey at Yokohama. It is, therefore, proved by fact that he is incapable of carrying out his duties and is equally incapable of not only teaching ourselves, but of maintaining discipline of members of the crew under his control. Talk of plugging the soil pipe through which water gained its way into No. 4 hold thereby causing to cargo is an absolute lie. Plugging could not be done without lifting out the cargo and no cargo was lifted throughout the voyage.

The most sorrowful scene that occurred on board was the time they were told to leave the ship and to appear in the Charterers' office in Shanghai to answer to certain questions before allowing their pay. To this, they protested and were eventually given their pay, but, so far, they did not appear before the Charterers as promised.

The lost of an anchor and chain at Yokohama has made them the laughing stock to the Shipping Community. In consequence, the Charterers had it let their original plan a stay of execution which are, in our opinion, justified.

We are glad the suffers and frequent fright we had are now things in the past. Pardon us, Mr. Editor, for most writing too much. We mind our own business and need no public sympathy.

We suggest that owners or agents of ships should not have their ships officers, who devote their energy to the purchase of ships [illegible] conversion of ships artificially called "scraps, to their own benefits, the "earning," of unwarranted money for overloading their ships.

Thanking you for inserting this letter in the columns of your valuable paper.

We are, etc.,

THE CADETS.

The above letter, unsigned and undated, reached us from Hongkong and is published mainly for purposes of interest. Some of its wilder statements are dealt with to-day in a leading article, because, if the cadets did not write it, some one else evidently is interested in trying to get a false version of the story of the Hwah Jah accepted.—Ed.

CHINESE HEBREWS

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—May I be permitted to contribute the following information in answer to the query contained in your article under "Notes and Comments" in to-day's issue on the subject of "Chinese Hebrews?"

The first appearance of Jews in China is presumably much older than the time stated in the "Jewish World" of April 3 (205 B.C.E. and 2[illegible] C.E.). The oldest record, probably, is the one which is contained in the second Isaiah, who, to conclude from his prophecy on Cyrus (Chap. XLV), was a contemporary of Cyrus the Great (530 B.C.E). Isaiah prophesies in chapter XLIX, 12: "These shall come from far, and these from the north and from the west and these from the land of Sinim" whereby no doubt China (Sina) is meant, as Manasseh-ben-Israel translates it (see History of the Jews in China, by S. M. Perieaam, London 1913). We can take this as proof that Jews were already settled in China prior to the erection of the second Temple by Zerubbabel, and the re-establishment of the Jewish commonwealth by Ezra. These Hebrews may have come viâ the great Central-Asiatic trade-routes and they were probably immigrants from Chaldea because of their being in possession of fragments of the Prophets Zachariah and Malachi and their knowing several Talmudic rites.

The Ten Tribes.

The "Chinese Recorder," Shanghai, Vol. XVI, page 47 states that: "According to Forster. . . .

"[illegible] remainder of the ten tribes, according to the Cochin History Roll emigrated through Media and Persia in the direction of Chinese Tartary, and [illegible] of Simeon, Ephraim and Manasseh are represented to have settled in the country of the Chazar Tartars, when they became ferocious nomads, celebrated for their horses, and dreaded for their warfare. Moreover, the Royal Family in this great Tartar tribe were Jews, and the Chagan or King of the Chazars was always chosen from this Jewish Stock. . . . . From the sixth to the tenth century the Chazars were the lords of Central Asia."

The Jews themselves asseverate that their ancestors immigrated into China at the time of Han Dynasty, viz. towards the end of the reign of Ming-ti (58-75 C.E.).

During the following centuries the Hebrew population increased rapidly until the great Bai Chi Revolution in the 9th century when a large percentage of the Jews perished. After this they slowly recovered until the time of the travels of Marco Polo (1286) when the principal settlements of Jews in China were Khansa (Hangchow), Pienlang (Kaifengfu), Kanfu (now Kanpin) and Ningpo. The first named two settlements were the most important ones. The Jews at that time numbered several thousand. In 1329 and 1354 the Jews are mentioned in Chinese history as having rendered help to the declining Mongolian Dynasty. Their name is mentioned as Dju-Hudu (Yehudim).

Towards the end of the fourteenth century the large Jewish colony in Kaifengfu (Honan) suffered heavily from inundations of the Yellow River, and frequent conflagrations sadly reduced the importance of the city. The Jewish quarter was situated not more than 500 feet from the river embankment, and was especially prone to damage by floods. In 1642 Kaifengfu was besieged: the embankments were destroyed, 100,000 people perished, among them many Jews and many Hebrew manuscripts were destroyed. The Jewish Synagogue was subsequently restored. At the time the Jews were called by the Chinese: Tiao-Kin-Kiao, the sect "that pluck out the sinews," referring to the ritual slaughter of animals. Naturally, if a Chinese saw a Jew picking out a sinew it would not take long for him to name the sect. This nickname adheres to the Jews up to the present time.

Father Ricci's Record.

The first personal observations were reported by the famous Jesuit Father Ricci in the early part of the seventeenth century, when he received a visit from a scholar who had come to Peking from Kaifengfu in order to pass his examination for a government appointment. This man's name was Ngai and he mistook Father Ricci for a co-religionist as he had heard it mentioned that he worshipped one God. The features of this man were distinctly different from those of an ordinary Chinese. Very valuable information was gained from him and Father Ricci and his successor, Father Julius Aleni, were able to verify all his statements by visits to the congregation at Kaifengfu. In 1704 Jesuit Father Gozani visited Kaifengfu and gave full details of the Jewish customs, and he described their Synagogue, which was called "Li-pai-tze," i.e. weekly meeting house. In the centre of the principall hall was erected a high chair covered with embroidered cushions, on which the Jews used to put the Thora scroll when reading it before the assembled congregation. They called it the "Chair of Moses." When the Jews entered the Synagogue they removed their shoes and when reading in the Thora scroll the reader covered his face, imitating Moses (Exod. 34. 33). No Talith was used by them; they only covered their heads with blue turbans and threw red shawls over their right shoulder and tied them beneath their left arm.

In 1842, after the conclusion of the Treaty of Nanking Mr. James Finn, afterwards British Consul at Jerusalem, wrote a letter composed both in Chinese and Hebrew to the Chinese Jews, which was forwarded by the British Consul at Amoy, but no reply was vouchsafed to the same until fully 28 years later. The then Rabbi deplored in pathetic tone the decay of the Jewish colony and their assimilation into the surrounding Chinese population. Another attempt to inquire into the condition of the Jews at Kaifengfu was made in 1850 by the Rt. Rev. Dr. Smith, Bishop of Victoria, when paying a visit to Shanghai. Two messengers were sent to visit the congregation, and returned after many hardships, reporting the decline of the Jewish colony numbering only 200 heads.

Massacre by Taipings.

The Taiping revolution 1860-64 dealt a mortal blow to the Kaifengfu Jews, who were massacred in great numbers. This period was started off with the great inundation of 1860 when half of the Jewish settlement was carried away by the floods. During the second half of the last century the Chinese Jews seem to have been the target of energetic endeavours to convert them to Christianity and in consequence they shut themselves up entirely. In 1866 Rev. Dr. Martin of the Tsung-wan College in Peking reported in the "New York Times" a journey to Kaifengfu, the 470 miles of which it took him nearly a month to cover. He found that the Jews did not more follow Jewish rites, they no more circumcised their new born sons and the Hebrew language was being forgotten. End of last century many Hebrew documents and scrolls found their way into European museums. Bishop Smith secured eight small books containing each one of the Sabbath sections of the Law in Hebrew, six copy scrolls, 30 of the weekly portions of the Law and over 30 quarto books on Chinese paper containing prayers for every day use, for Sabbaths and festivals. In 1898 Dr. Neubauer of Oxford described these documents fully in the eighth volume of the "Jewish Quarterly Review." They were deposited at the museum at Lincoln's Inn of London Society for Promoting Christianity among the Jews. These are evidently the "some 60 Hebrew manuscripts" mentioned according to your article by the "Jewish World" as having been acquired by the Hebrew Union College of Cincinnati. One scroll each was presented by the Society to the British Museum, and the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge. One copy is at present in Hongkong. Rev. Dr. Martin has supplied Yale College and the Lennox Library at New York each with a scroll. The Hon. Mayer Sulzberger possesses another. Dr. Scherzer of the Austro-Hungarian Novara Expedition obtained a Roll for the Vienna Imperial Library and the Jesuit Father at Siccawei exhibited another one at Shanghai, which was afterwards sent to Paris. Marcus N. Adler in "Chinese Jews" states that these are all "Chinese" copies of a faulty old copy executed by ignorant scribes.

Help from Outside.

Toward the end of the last century the Jews of all the world became aware at last of their isolated brethren in China. Several abortive attempts were made to bring help to the Jewish colonies in China. Amongst those interested in Shanghai in this movement were Messrs. Lewis Moore, S. J. Solomon, D. E. Abraham, Sir Edward Sassoon, and others. Letters and messengers were despatched but beyond bringing a few individuals to Shanghai, nothing tangible was achieved. Rabbi Hirsch and the late Mr. Edward I. Ezra were authorities on the subject of Chinese Jews. Major Lehmann of the ci-devant German garrison in Kiaochou, according to Mr. S. J. Solomon, visited a place about a hundred miles southwest of Kaifengfu, where there were about 500 native Jews, most of whom were engaged in the silk piece goods trade. From this it would appear as if the greater part of the Jewish colony at Kaifengfu in order to escape persecutions perhaps, or for other reasons, migrated to a near by place. In his book: "Wandering in Northern China" (The Century Co. New York & London, 1923), Harry A. Franck, the author of "A Vagabond Journey Around the World" describes a visit to the Jews in Kaifengfu. He found them to the number of 200 in very poor surroundings. He states that they intermarry with the Chinese and some have even taken up Chinese idol-worship; circumcision has not been practised for generations. Their features in no wise distinguish them from their neighbours, the Chinese. A man named Chao was the "head Jew" and the colony consisted of eight families with seven family names between them. If anything they were more friendly and communicative to Mr. Franck than pure Chinese of their class would have been. As a last relic of the former Synagogue he found a memorial stone in the compound of the Kaifeng Mission of the Canadian Episcopal Church bearing a sketch of Hebrew history and the names of the patriarchs. "Once it bore also the names of the principal Jewish families in Kaifeng, but they were obliterated in order to throw off the scent those who tried some decades ago to persecute them."

A Personal Experience.

I have personally visited the Jewish colony in Kaifengfu on two occasions. The first time in 1903 when I met with the same result as the last mentioned author. The second time in January of this year. When mentioning the poor results of my investigations made for a home paper, to my business friend, a Chinese druggist, in his shop at Kaifengfu, one of his customers present at the time mentioned that he knew of Jews in much better circumstances than those met with until then. On my request he introduced me to the accountant of a large oil hong, who in turn invited me to partake in an old-fashioned Sabbath-eve dinner. My objection that I was not a co-religionist was politely waved aside. At the subsequent dinner in a well furnished private house I met a very patriarchal-looking host and a score of persons of both sexes, garbed in Chinese dress and apparently belonging to the better and best class. The features of some of them bore the unmistakable stamp of their forefathers. The dinner consisted of the usual Chinese courses with the exception of the customary fat boiled pork. After dinner my venerable host permitted me to inspect a large chest filled with ancient scrolls and books in Hebrew characters. My query whether these documents were for sale met with a refusal and a hasty closing of the chest.

Another Jewish colony in China was situated at Hangchow. The Synagogue at this place seems to have been destroyed during the Taiping uprising and it was never rebuilt afterwards. As far as I could ascertain there are no Jews left in Hangchow proper. The present Austrian Consul in Shanghai, Mr. Franz Winkler relates that on a houseboat trip during one of the first years of the Great War, which he undertook in company with Messrs. Pucher, Engel and the late Mr. Dabelstein the party met with a crowd of Jewish-looking individuals on a river bank about 70 miles southwest of Shanghai, presumably the channel between Kashing and Haining. They wore Chinese dress but their features were of a lighter, rosier hue than the other Chinese country people. They had curly hair and noses of a distinctly semitic type. Their behaviour was much more courteous and fearless than that of the average Chinese peasant. It is safe to assume that these people are emigrants from Hangchow shut up in some place of refuge in the country where they have remained in practically unbroken isolation since their migration. It is a pity that Mr. Winkler omitted to make exact notes of the spot of his interesting encounter.

The details of the present letter have been taken from the various sources mentioned therein, from informations personally given and from personal observations.

PIRACY

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—This is extracted from Admiral Sir Percy Scott's book "Fifty Years in the Royal Navy" and forms an interesting comparison as to how piracy was dealt with, just 50 years ago, and now.

"The remaining part of 1874 brought the Active some lively work. We got information that a trading schooner, the Geraldine, while beating up the Congo river, had gone on shore, and had fallen a victim to the pirates who infest the river. The bandits had boarded the vessel, killed the crew and looted her. We went off at full speed and anchored in the delta of the Congo. The following day the Commodore with a small party of Officers proceeded up river in a gun-boat. We inspected the Geraldine and found she had been gutted. We then went on to a trading station about 40 miles up. All the Chiefs were summoned to a palaver. They arrived, armed, in war canoes. Sir William Hewett, through our interpreter, told them that unless they produced the murderers, he would return later on, in the dry season, and burn every village from the mouth of the Congo to where we were then. The Chiefs refused to give up the murderers. At the end of August the Chiefs were again summoned and asked to surrender the murderers. No reply being received, hostilities were begun, such operations ended with the destruction of the villages and canoes by fires. Thus Sir William Hewett kept his promise of burning everything from the entrance of the river to Punta-da-Lenha the lesson effectually stopped piracy and increased trade on the river."

AVENUE ROAD

"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—I imagine there are many who will not agree with the writer of your Notes and Comments that the appellation "Avenue Road" is absurd. I, for one, think it is both euphonious and picturesque and not necessarily redunant, for "Avenue" in this instance is not a noun but a descriptive term. It suggests to the mind a vista of green and shady trees with the bright sun above and birds singing in the branches.

There are so many unbeautiful things in city life that we really should be allowed to retain our street names which are, in many cases, very felicitous. The French practice of immortalizing their heroes, until they fall from grace, in their street names has its drawbacks; and I think we should find some other way of honouring them than by inflicting their sesquipedalian cognomina on our citizens.

By the way, it is not only small and sleepy towns at home that tolerate an Avenue Road for there is one in the Metropolis itself and Herbert Spencer, the philosopher, lived in No. 64 for some yars.

LAW REPORTS

MONEY-LENDERS' HOTEL VENTURE

Court Sequel to Sealing Up of Premises: Large Sums due to Tradesmen

The three Indian moneylenders whose venture as hotel proprietors seems likely to have an unhappy financial ending appeared before his Honour Judge Cunnington at H. M. Supreme Court on Monday on judgment summonses. The first was by the Great Light Electric Co., for $298 and $58 costs.

His Honour—Their story is that they were deceived by the Portuguese who entered into partnership with them. He put no money in the firm, but the consideration was that he should act as manager of the hotel, and they said that the hotel was paying but that the Portuguese would not allow them to enter the premises or pay them any money.

Mr. Tyche Wing, for plaintiffs, said the hotel was now sealed up and proceedings were pending in the Portuguese Court.

Upon "the leading member of the firm" being called, Gujjan Singh went in to the witness box, on behalf of himself and the two other defendants, Sucha Singh and Bishen Singh, and asked for an adjournment. He stated that five months' rent was due to the hotel landlords, Messrs. Brandt & Rogers, and they could only pay if they were allowed to reopen the hotel and carry on business.

"Burden on His Friends"

Cross-examined by Mr. Wing, witness admitted that he was a moneylender, but added that he had no means and no occupation, and was "a burden on his friends."

Mr. Wing—Is Bishen Singh also a burden on his friends?

Witness—He can speak for himself.

Bishen Singh stated that he had no money except $400, out on loan at 2 per cent. per month. He added that if they were unable to restart the business they stood to lose $6,000.

His Honour, observing that the defendants seemed to have been rather unfortunate in associating with the Portuguese manager, da Silva, adjourned the matter for a fortnight.

In the second case, the Wing Tai Co. asked for payment of $600, for which judgment has been given, the balance of a furniture account. Plaintiff's representative said the original account was for $1,650, and Gujjan Singh had paid $1,300, but other accounts made up the balance claimed.

Gujjan Singh said he had paid $1,300, and denied that more than $350 was due, and his Honour adjourned the case for plaintiff to produce a detailed account.

WINTERGARDEN CAFE FRACAS

Manager Committed to the Higher Court on Assault Charge

After several more witnesses had been heard on Saturday morning in the continued action against L. E. Brown, manager of the Wintergarden Café, by Mr. Martinson and Mrs. Shmakova, arising out of allegations of ejection and undue violence, Mr. N. E. Lurton, U. S. Commissioner, found that a prima facie case had been made out and bound defendant over to answer to the Higher Court.

The Commissioner, in giving judgment, said in part, "In reviewing the evidence before me, it seems that the complaining witnesses went to the Wintergarden Café in a peaceful manner. There was a disturbance on the floor and it would seem that a portion of the blame may be attributed to them, while Mr. Brown attempted to suppress the commotion. There arises the question of the amount of pressure that he, as manager, possessed. The evidence shows that complainants were seriously injured and that excessive force was used. Martinson was clearly struck heavily over the eye and the doctor's certificate states that undue force was used on Shmakova.

"The big point to my mind is the degree of force that a manager may use to suppress commotion and I am inclined to believe that excessive force is unlawful. He appears to have stepped beyond that degree of judgment which is permitted all citizens to exercise (but it less than that of the police). I find that a prima facie case has been made and will bind defendant over to the U. S. Court for China and fix bail at G.$50."

Preceding the finding, Mr. Schuhl stated, in argument, that there was no question of the assault, both having been set upon and beaten within the café. Referring to witnesses he was of the opinion that two of them were entirely disinterested, while with reference to another (defendant's), he would not believe him on a stack of Bibles. Five qualified witnesses stated that they saw defendant strike both Martinson and Shmakova.

Mr. Snyder, for the defence, declared that the evidence of complainants was highly insufficient, while the fact that Martinson asked a marine outside to go to the station was in itself enough to show that he did not know who struck him. There was no question but that witnesses for plaintiff had talked the matter over before coming into Court.

MAHJONGG AT THE U. S. COURT

A Chinese Claim for Payment for Tons of Sets Forwarded to America

The U. S. Court for China and its attendants sat in on a prolonged Mahjongg session on Tuesday morning and afternoon, which, if not as lively as some games, was quite as intricate and involved high stakes. Wong Chen-tai, with other Chinese dealers associated with him in the suit, brought suit against Marion L. Gregg, doing business under the firm name and title of the Shanghai Domino Co., claiming $16,677.11 due on merchandise delivered to the defendant. Mr. Sidney Moss appeared for the plaintiff and Mr. H. D. Rodger for the defendant.

The first witness called was the plaintiff, Wong Chen-tai, a dealer in mahjongg sets, who claimed to have done business with the defendant and produced his Chinese account books in evidence. In order to identify the books it was necessary to call another witness. Tsien Tsze-chao, who said he had been employed by the defendant from March 1, 1923 to February 4, 1924, at a salary of $60, as an accountant and general worker and after Mrs. Gregg left for the States on September 4, 1923, he became her attorney in fact and was empowered to sign invoices for the company. While Mrs. Gregg was away, he said, he bought from 4,000 to 5,000 sets of mahjongg for her, paying the dealers first by check, and then when the letters of credit sent by Mrs. Gregg were not negotiable, he borrowed money and gave promisory notes to pay for the goods.

Books Under Question

To prove this statement he produced a set of books which were challenged by the attorney for the defendant, as not being bonâ fide books, but giving the appearance of having been written up at one time, and not having been used. He later stated that he had copied these entries from the office books into a new set of books because Mrs. Gregg had not acceded to his request for an accounting when she returned to the office and he feared that he could not prove the amount due him without this duplicate set, which he claimed, was an exact copy of the original books. When asked where the origined books were he said he had seen them in the office on the day when he was "kicked out." On cross-examination he stated that he had inspected the mahjongg sets shipped to Mr. Cowen of San Francisco and to the International Trading Co. and that he had been informed by Mrs. Gregg later that the shipment had been refused as unsatisfactory.

In the afternoon Mrs. Gregg was called to the stand by the plaintiff's counsel, to answer questions with regard to the present whereabouts of the books, which she stated could not be found. On cross examination she further stated that on her return from the States she went to the office on January 30, and found everything intact. She remained there only an hour with some friends and did not return, on account of illness, until February 4 when she found the place looking like a Chinese Tea Room, with 50 Chinese about, and the room in filthy condition. She had to call the police to clear the place, on asking the accountant, Mr. Tsien, for the books he said he did not have them and did not know where they were. She said she had never been able to secure the books although the Mixed Court had ordered their return.

Promissory Notes

The remainder of the afternoon was taken up with Mr. Tsien's statements with regard to the amounts claimed as owing to plaintiff. He stated that he was obliged to borrow money and give promissory notes because the money he had received from defendant did not cover the shipments forwarded. When it was put to him in cross-examination that he had shipped mahjongg sets costing only $2.50 or $3.00 apiece he denied the statement and said he had shipped no sets costing less than $4.50 or $5.00.

The plaintiff, recalled to the witness box submitted samples of the goods furnished by him. Cross examination was reserved, until resumption of the case this morning.

"TOOK HIS FUN WHERE HE FOUND IT"

Discharged Seaman's Plight in the Paris of the East

James Kelly appeared before Judge Purdy at the U. S. Court on Monday, charged with vagrancy.

The acting U. S. District Attorney, Mr. H. D. Rodger, prosecuted and Mr. N. F. Allman, at the Court's request, appeared for defendant.

Kelly, according to his own story, had been paid off and left his ship on April 7 and from that time till May 1 life had been a gay round of wine, women and song. At that time he realized that nothing remained of his $130 and G.$100 except $3 which he gave to a fellow-sailor who was destitute and then applied to the Shipping Office of the U. S. Consulate-General for medical relief, having contracted a certain disease.

Mr. J. T. Wright, of the Shipping Board, said that defendant did not ask for medical relief, but only for "two dimes" and as defendant was "staggering drunk," he was taken to the U. S. gaol where he had been since that time.

The Judge found accused guilty and postponed sentence.

BIG CLAIM AGAINST DRUG COMPANY

Allegation that the Wrong Ointment was Supplied: a Lady's Subsequent Sufferings

The case of Magdalena Guignard v. the American Drug Co., a claim for Tls. 50,000 damages for alleged injuries arising from the use of an ointment which it is said the defendants negligently substituted for the harmless ointment ordered, was begun in the U. S. Court for China on Thursday, Mr. F. J. Schuhl appearing for the plaintiff and Mr. W. S. Fleming for the defendant.

The complaint sets forth that on November 22, 1923, the plaintiff's husband handed to defendants a prescription written by Dr. Reiss calling for a certain ointment for the cure of dhobie itch. On November 23 Dr. Reiss informed the plaintiff that the ointment could be used by plaintiff as well as by her husband. On November 26 the plaintiff inquired if defendants could duplicate the prescription. The defendants said unqualifiedly that the prescription could be filled accurately from the records. The defendants failed to deliver the ointment ordered but negligently and unknown to the plaintiff substituted another and dangerous compound which fact was unknown to the plaintiff until she was badly injured by its use, suffering intense pain, being confined to her bed and sustaining internal injuries from which she can never recover, her health and activities of mind being permanently impaired. It is further alleged that the defendant was through these injuries unable to care for her infant child.

Mr. Guignard, husband of the plaintiff, said that on the evening of November 26 the second ointment was received, but was not examined or used by him. His wife retired early and he was reading in his study when he heard her cry out in agony, and he found her in great pain. He then learned that she had used the new ointment, and on comparing the two ointments he found that they differed in colour and the numbers were different. He telephoned to the drug store and went for Dr. Reiss, who gave a soothing lotion. His wife suffered extreme pain at the time and was still subject to nervous seizures.

Mr. Guignard denied that his wife previously had been neurothenic.

The plaintiff substantiated her husband's evidence, adding that as she still suffered from nervous attacks she had to keep very quiet, not being able to see many people without subsequent exhaustion. When she was examined by physicians in February internal growths were found.

Dr. O'Hara stated that he could not find any other cause for plaintiff's condition except the use of the second ointment, although other irritation might have produced it.

Dr. J. E. Murray stated that he examined plaintiff previous to the use of his ointment and found her in perfectly healthy condition and that it was quite possible the growths had been caused by the second ointment.

Mr. Henry Schloten, general manager of the defendant company at the time the ointments in question were compounded, said that, unless the physician gave the name of the patient for whom the prescription was intended, no record of the patient's name was put on their records.

Mr. B. Shmoulevsky, of the pharmacy department of the defendant company, testified to refilling the prescription according to a number left on his desk. He had no knowledge of the patient for whom the ointment was intended, but said that it was an ordinary formula.

The case was adjourned.

ARMED ROBBERS SENTENCED

Gang Who Fired at P. C. Bennett Before the Mixed Court: Two Sent to Arsenal

Seven armed robbers, one of whom is thought to have shot at P. C. Bennett while he was in charge of a search party on the night April 5, came up for trial by Mr. Martin and Magistrate Kuan at the Mixed Court last Friday. Mr. Allman defended in one of the first cases in recent years where poor prisoners capitally charged have been legally represented.

Chief Det.-Insp. Cruickshank stated that the men were accused of having robbed three shops on Cho Da Koh Alleyway at about 9 o'clock, murdering the master of the first, ransacking it and the other two, after which they shot a wheelbarrow coolie and murdered another passer-by on the road. It would be remembered, said the officer, that P. C. Bennett's skull was fractured in two places by bullets, one passing entirely through, while the other had to be removed by the surgeon's scalpel. A third, of .32 calibre glanced from the holster and saved what might have been a severe injury to the groin.

The group were also thought to have participated in robberies in Kashing Road and Alabaster Road on the following day, on which after many shots were fired they wounded two other Chinese.

Det.-Sgt. Andrews stated that information was received on April 8 that four men connected with the gang intended to come from Chapei and proceed to a tea shop on East Yalu Road and detectives were despatched to that point. As was expected they arrived in due time, two of their number going to an upstairs room while two others remained below. While men in plain clothes remained on guard in the main portion of the premises three detectives entered the adjoining room to that occupied by the suspects and one of them heard an inmate tell the other to have no fear, for he was quite prepared for the officers.

Drawing their weapons the detectives forced the door and one of the accused pointed a [illegible] them and jerked at the trigger but the gun jammed. Quick as a flash the officer was on his man and had the gun. He noticed [illegible] suspect reach for his [illegible] stopped him and drew another one of .32 calibre, from [illegible] clothes. When these arrests had been completed the two [illegible] were taken into custody, one of whom told them that he would [illegible] foreign assistance because he knew where others were. Acting upon his information Settlement Police charged two more and then accompanied by Chapei police went to the designated address and found, not the man wanted, but another in his bed. He was arrested and charged with being an accomplice.

Continuing his evidence Sgt. Andrews told the Court that when the information was first received at Gordon Road Station, he went to the scene and found the murdered master of the shop at 47/48, as well as two cartridge cases, of .32 and a .25 calibre, at 39/40 he found one 25 calibre, while outside the shop he picked up one of each. At the third shop the inmates pointed out the spot where the wheel barrow coolie fell. Before leaving the box, he introduced as evidence the bullet extracted from Bennett's skull and the one taken from the coolie's elbow at the Shantung Road Hospital.

Mr. N. F. Allman asked him whether he meant the Court to believe that these bullets came from the guns introduced by Mr. Cruickshank, to which he replied that it was quite probable.

Evidence was then called. A shop assistant said the robbers came in and took $102. They came in and shot his father. One jumped over the counter and the bullet struck his father in the head. He died at once.

Fell Down in a Fright.

Another witness, who was in the first shop, stated that as the murderers entered, one of them pointed a gun at him, whereupon his feet gave out from under his knees and he fell down from fright. First accused had the gun and he recognized third and fifth in the dock as being in the gang, who were brought by the police to the shop afterwards.

Replying to Mr. Maitland's question whether he could identify any of the men, a 12-year old boy said he knew third and fifth accused as robbers. There were five or six in the gang, but he had his back to them most of the time, for as they entered he was counting the coppers. He was very sure, certain, that these two came into the shop.

A Sikh, who was in the search party, told a graphic story of the encounter with the robbers in Haiphong Road. Bennett ran after them and fell, shot in the head. None were captured.

Accused then gave evidence, several denying any complicity in the affair, though all had made voluntary confessions.

The first and third accused were sent to the Arsenal to be shot, the second and fourth to Kompo for trial there by the Chinese authorities, the fourth accused was expelled, the sixth sent to prison for five years and the seventh prisoner discharged.

GERMANY EXPECTED TO ACCEPT THE DAWES REPORT

Financial Houses Strongly in Its Favour as a Check on Speculations in Exchange: France Proposing Certain Modifications

Berlin, May 17.

The Socialist Party, which will be the decisive factor in any coalition which may presently be formed, as a result of the elections, is expressing [illegible] hesitation to acceptance of the Dawes reparations report, a meeting of the party to-day deciding in favour of continuation of the policy of the Marx-Stresemann Government.

Industrialist banks are now desperately in favour of adoption of the report, in consequence of the financial crisis due to the belated effort of the Reichsbank to arrest the indiscriminate grant of credits that followed the stabilization of the mark. The necessity of meeting commitments, as such has caused a stream of bankruptcies among smaller banks and retailers. The crisis has been intensified by the appreciation of the franc, which has caused widespread havoc among the innumerable speculators on its fall.

There is every indication that the parties of the Right will use the strength which they acquired in the elections [illegible] and settlement, but to complete the destruction of progressive movements that have gradually weakened since the revolution.

A [illegible] demonstration at Hahn and similar demonstrations, which have been planned at Berlin, Breslau and elsewhere, testify to the growing strength of [illegible] and the political effort at self-assertion on the part of the masses on the Ruhr, half a million of whom were locked out because they insisted on the establishment of a seven-hour shift, is evidence of the weakness of the workers.—Reuter.

Suggestions from France

Paris, May 16.

The French Ambassador in London handed Mr. Ramsay MacDonald the letter from M. Poincare, which submits certain points of principle which appeared to the Premier to facilitate putting into execution the experts' report.

It also deals at some length with the question of the Ruhr and emphasizes the importance of allowing some latitude to the specialists appointed to supervise the change of régime in the railway regie with a view to putting the experts' report into operation without loss of time when the time comes.—Reuter.

Conversations Between Italian and Belgian Premiers: Inter-Allied Debts

Milan, May 19.

A communiqué regarding to-day's conversation between the Italian Premier, Signor Mussolini, and the Belgian Premier, M. Théunis, and the Belgian Minister for Foreign Affairs, M. Hymans, states that the Ministers expressed the opinion that as soon as the exchanges of views between the Allies were sufficiently advanced, it would be advisable to convène an inter-Allied conference to put the finishing touches to the reparation agreement. They decided to do their utmost to execute the same when it would be possible to give effect to the experts' plan. The Ministers agreed that in any case the question of inter-Allied debts should be considered as being connected with the reparations problem.—Reuter.

SCARCITY OF MONEY IN GERMANY

Industrial Firms' Inability to Obtain Credit: High Rate of Interest

Berlin, May 19.

The Becker Steel Company of Willich, Rhineland, one of the biggest in Germany, have been compelled to place their affairs in the hands of an official receiver owing to the difficulty of obtaining [illegible] which all industrial undertakings in Germany are suffering, but the works will continue for the time being.

The Deutsche Werke Company, another big concern which is also a victim of lack of credit, has been compelled to retrench by closing some of its works.

The scarcity of money is so pronounced that 50 per cent. interest is demanded for cash.—Reuter.

BOLSHEVIK MENACE IN THE NEAR EAST

Strained Relations Between Russia and Rumania: The Little Entente and Italy

London, May 19.

[illegible] the Belgian Ministers, Dr. [illegible], the Czecho-Slovakian Foreign Minister, is also visiting Italy. His conversations with Signor Mussolini have already had satisfactory results in securing favourable conditions for Czecho-Slovakian trade, especially with regard to Adriatic ports but, according to diplomatic experts, they may result in remodelling the Little Entente, the [illegible] of which has been recently impaired by the increasingly strained relations between Rumania and Hungary on the [illegible] of Bessarabia.

[illegible] has been strengthened recently between Rumania, Poland and Turkey, the three countries most threatened by the Bolshevik menace. It is noteworthy in this connexion that a Japanese Military Commission has arrived at Bukharest.

Later.

Reuter's Agency learns that there is no truth in the report from Bukharest that any negotiations are proceeding between Japan and Rumania for the purpose of military co-operation against Russia.

It is pointed out that the Japanese Military Mission, which is now at Bukharest, is touring the world with the purpose of investigating [illegible] military systems from the point of view of efficiency, and particularly with a view to the reduction of armaments by Japan. The Mission is devoid of any political status. It has already visited Spain, France, Italy, Turkey and Hungary and is going to Austria, Czecho-Slovakia, Poland, Germany, Belgium and England, returning home via the United States.—Reuter.

THE ANGLO-SOVIET CONFERENCE

Unparliamentary Suggestions in House of Commons as to Political Propaganda

London, May 19.

Protests against questions reflecting upon the representatives of a friendly power were made in the House of Commons to-day, when Sir Leonard Lyle, Conservative member for Epping, asked the Premier whether his advisers were assured that no political propaganda was being carried on by the Russian representatives now in England.

The Prime Minister, Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, replied that the Soviet delegates were here on a friendly mission and until definite evidence to the contrary was forthcoming it was to be presumed that they would abstain from action which could only stultify the negotiations.

Mr. J. E. Davison, Labour member for Sheffield, said that the Prime Minister himself had anticipated that the delegation might be guilty of monkey tricks (Cries of "Order" and "Withdraw").

The Speaker said that it was impossible to allow such comments on negotiations between the Government and a friendly power. The Government of Russia had been recognized by the British Government and must be treated as any other foreign Government (Ministerial cheers).—Reuter.

Russia's Request for a Long-term Loan for Purchases to be Made in Britain

London, May 20.

A communiqué on the Anglo-Russian Conference states that the Soviet Delegation handed to the British Delegation a memorandum in which it was stated that, if Britain would assist in the flotation of a long-term loan, the Soviet would devote a lump sum to cover Russian pre-war debts to British holders of bonds before March 12, 1917. The greater part of the loan would be spent in Britain for machinery and other necessities.

The British Delegation replied that closer examination of the proposals was necessary, but any assistance in the flotation of the proposed loan would be very limited and there could be no question of a Government guarantee.

The Soviet Delegation stated that the Soviet were not prepared to [illegible] bonds at the full pre-war value. Interest arrears should be ignored and the principal reduced, as Russian assets had been reduced in consequence of the war and civil war. Limited payments to bond-holders should, however, be made as soon as possible. The Russians urged the British to do their utmost to help the loan, which, they said, would develop Anglo-Russian trade. They submitted that participation of the Russian State Bank would afford solid security.

The British delegates again emphasized their inability to guarantee the loan, although they would sympathetically regard Soviet efforts to raise a loan privately.—Reuter.

DUBLIN'S MUNICIPAL ADMINISTRATION

Allegations of Negligence in Management of City's Business

London, May 20.

The Free State Government has dissolved the Dublin Corporation and appointed three Commissioners to perform its duties on the ground that these were not being effectually discharged.

The Irish Free State Local Government Ministry has reported that efforts of individual members of the Dublin Corporation to secure efficient and economical management of the city's business have been unavailing in the absence of support from the majority. Efficient administration of the capital has become a matter of national interest and it is proposed to examine the problem of city government as early as possible in the light of the modern results achieved elsewhere.—Reuter.

UNEMPLOYMENT IN BRITAIN

Government's Insurance Bill: Boys' and Girls' Allowances: Agriculture Not Included

London, May 20.

The Unemployment Insurance Bill, introduced by the Government, passed the second reading in the House of Commons to-day without a division.

The Minister of Labour, Mr. Tom Shaw, explained that it abolished the period during which unemployed had hitherto not received benefit. It gives for the first time benefits to boys and girls between 14 and 16 years of age of 4/- and 5/- a week respectively, provides instructional courses for them when unemployed, increases men's and women's unemployment benefit and also the allowance for dependents and children, and removes the disqualification from benefit for workers indirectly unemployed through a dispute. Agricultural workers are not embraced by the Bill. Mr. Shaw declared that the scheme was financially sound.

The opponents of the bill declared that it extended the dole system and did not advance the unemployment schemes, which it had been expected that the Government had cut and dried. They contended that children would be prematurely employed in industry, instead of being kept at school. The Conservatives insisted that drastic amendments were necessary in Committee.

The question of the Government's lack of employment plans is likely to be raised in an acute form on Thursday, when a doubtful division is likely.—Reuter.

Phenomenal Decrease Due to Government Policy

London, May 21.

The attack on Mr. Tom Shaw, Minister of Labour, on the subject of his Unemployment Insurance Bill opened in the House of Commons to-day with a number of questions demanding what the Government had done to deal with unemployment.

Mr. Shaw said that the employment exchanges in the year ending April 7, 1924, had filled 962,063 vacancies (Ministerial cheers), which was a great deal more than before the Government took office.

Replying to supplementary questions, the Minister of Labour said that the members of the Opposition would have a better opportunity of scalping him to-morrow, when he would show that the phenomenal decrease in unemployment was directly due to the Government's policy (cheers and counter-cheers).—Reuter.

Mr. Lloyd George, who was repeatedly interrupted by Labour Members, denounced the bill as establishing a gigantic coal trust in the interests of a section of the community, but he was sure that the House would not examine in a partisan spirit any broadminded proposal to improve the miner's lot (cheers).

The Liberal vote was split.—Reuter.

THE NAVAL BASE AT SINGAPORE

Questions in Parliament as to Purchase of Rubber Company's Land

London, May 21.

In the House of Commons to-day, replying to Mr. R. Spence, Labour member for Berwick and Haddington, Mr. A. V. Alexander, Parliamentary Secretary to the Board of Trade, on behalf of Major Ammon, Parliamentary Secretary to the Admiralty, stated that the late Government had bought no land from the Bukit-Sembawang Rubber Company with the object of establishing the Naval Base at Singapore, as the land required for the Base was acquired by the Government of the Straits.

With regard to Mr. Spence's further questions as to the price paid per acre, the number of acres [illegible] leased to the Bukit-Sembawang Co., the date and terms of the lease and the rental, and whether the land leased was fully cultivated for rubber production, the Government had no information to regard to what transactions had passed in the Colony in that connexion.—Reuter.

An airship highway to the East would be provided suitable for ships of the largest size, and also harbour accommodation and repair facilities, which would be open to all.

The death is announced of Major-Gen. Sir Charles Townshend at the age of 63.—Reuter.

The late Major-Gen. Sir Charles Townshend, K.C.B., C.B., D.S.O., will chiefly be remembered for his heroic advance on Kut-el Amara, while in command of the 6th Division and Force in Mesopotamia early in 1915, and the tragic surrender of that force to the Turks. Goschen's special embassy to Constantinople in 1880 and became second secretary there in the following year. He was appointed secretary to the Legation in Peking in 1885, to Copenhagen in 1888, Lisbon in 1890, Washington in 1893, and Petrograd in 1894; acting as chargé d'affaires at Copenhagen, Lisbon and Washington, and Minister Plenipotentiary at Petrograd during the absence of the Ambassador. THE LAUSANNE TREATY

Turks much Worried over Non-Ratification Ascribed to French Intrigue

London, May 17.

The "Daily Telegraph's" Diplomatic correspondent say that Angora is worrying greatly about Japan's delay in ratifying the Lausanne Treaty, which would have rendered the Treaty operative, since it had already been ratified by Great Britain and Italy. He asserts that the Turks ascribe Japan's dilatoriness to French diplomatic intervention in Tokio, as the Poincaré Government has so far withheld ratification.—Reuter.

WEAKNESS OF THE FRANC

The Gold Reserve Extensively Overdrawn: Fears of a Spendthrift Policy

Paris, May 21.

Political circles are very much alarmed over the weakness of the franc, which has fallen 13 points to £1 since the general election, although it recovered to-day to 78.70.

It is stated that the previous intervention of the Bank de France was so profitable as not only to leave the British and American credits intact, but to build up a strong reserve of sterling and dollars. The reserve, however, has since been extensively dr... ...

If this announcement does not reassure the market the question of issuing a fresh counter-offensive in support of the franc will be considered.

Reliable observers attribute the collapse of the franc as being partly due to the bloc national "bearing" the franc and partly to the anxiety of financiers lest the new Government should prove spendthrift.—Reuter.

CONGRESS'S FIGHT WITH PRESIDENT

Insistence on Exclusion Measure and Soldiers' Bonus

Washington, May 16.

After being passed by the House of Representatives by an overwhelming majority and the Senate by 69 votes to 9, the Immigration Bill, with the provision excluding Asiatics after July 1, is now before President Coolidge, who will probably send the measure to the State and Labour Departments for their recommendations before deciding to sign or veto it.

The Senate has passed the Soldiers' Bonus Bill over the Veto of the President.

The measure now becomes law.—Reuter's American Service.

New York, May 20.

The newspapers of the metropolis are unanimous in condemning the Soldiers' Bonus Biill, estimating that it entails an expenditure of about $4,000,000,000 and opens the way for numberless further demands for largesse for the benefit of special groups at the expense of the whole people.

The "New York Herald" predicts another four years' term for President Coolidge to keep up the fight against such extravagance, praising his courage in exercising the veto. The "New York Times" and the "New York World," on the other side of the party line, ridicule the law-makers who expect to go before the country to sustain President Coolidge's candidacy for the presidency, but fail to render him loyal support where it is most needed, namely, in Congress. STRENGTHENING THE U. S. NAVY

Proposed Construction of New Cruisers and Alterations in Battleships

Washington, May 20.

Mr. Butler, Chairman of the Naval Committee, has advised the House of Representatives that at least $150,000,000 must be expended on the Navy if it was to equal the strength of the British Navy, and that, before the present session ended, action must be sought for a Bill designed to establish a ratio of 5/5/3 as far as the United States was concerned.

Mr. Butler added that the present actual comparative strength of the British Empire and United States and Japan was 5, a fraction ... The construction of eight fast cruisers by 1930 at an estimated cost of $15,000,000 each, and six gunboats for use in Chinese waters, and also the conversion of five or six battleships into oil-burners, and increased elevation of the guns of 13 battleships would be proposed in order to strengthen the Navy.

Later.

The United States light cruiser Trenton is sailing on a 25,000 miles test cruise round Africa with the object of determining the effectiveness of long-range scouting and the ability of this type of vessel to operate independently away from a base. The data are likely to be used to support the Navy Department's request for 11 similar ships, which, experts claim, is the requisite to equalize the British cruiser strength.—Reuter's American Service.

U. S. SHIPPING BOARD INVESTIGATION

Losses on West and East Coast Routes: Dutch Indies Service Abandoned

Washington, April 21.

The House Shipping Board Investigating Committee spent to-day in going over with Captain Inman Sealby, travelling director of the Emergency Fleet Corporation, the technical details of foreign shipping conditions.

Prior to last July, Captain Sealby testified, the west coast service was losing from $16,000 to $50,000 a month with the east coast route losing not under $30,000, except during the wool season when the losses were slightly reduced. Present losses in the Pacific service, the witness continued, have been pared down to from $10,000 to $12,000 a month. No relief has been found, he said, for the New York route. He had recommended that the service to the Dutch East Indies be discontinued on account of cargo conditions.—Reuter's American Service.

Listeners-in Disappointed by Result of Melinite Discharge

London, May 17.

A telegram from Reuter's correspondent at Paramushiru of yesterday's date says that the American flight from Attu to Paramushiru of 936 miles took 12 hours and 10 minutes, during which the fliers were forced down by strong winds and a heavy impenetrable snow storm for a six-hour wait off the shores near Koloski, Behring Island. The weather at Paramushiru is at present a wild gale with rain and snow. The temperature is under freezing point.

The fliers, who since leaving Santa Monica on March 17 have flown 5,335 miles in 73 hours actual flying time, declared that the Attu-Paramushiru leg was the worst with the leg to the Sitka Sea a close second. Lieutenant Lowell Smith stated that, though they are 17 days behind schedule, they hope to make up and reach Santa Monica on September 1.

SATURDAY'S TELEGRAMS

UNEMPLOYMENT IN GREAT BRITAIN

Motion in House of Commons to Reduce the Salary of the Minister of Labour: Alleged Unfulfillment of Government's Pledges

London, May 22.

The unemployment policy of the Government was to-day challenged in the House of Commons on a motion by Sir W. Joynson-Hicks, the former Minister of Health, to reduce the salary of the Minister of Labour, Mr. Tom Shaw, by £100.

The Government had warned its supporters of the urgency of the occasion.

The debate was begun by Mr. Shaw introducing the estimates of the Ministry of Labour in the Committee of Supply. He made a fierce attack on his predecessors and declared that their "blundering incompetence has not been equalled in our history." He praised Mr. Ramsay MacDonald's restoration of British prestige abroad and stimulation of employment at home.

Mr. Shaw's review of foreign policy, and forecast of Government schemes to increase the national wealth and efficiency, was made to the accompaniment of laughter and ironical cheers from the Opposition benches, and the Chairman had to intervene to remind Mr. Shaw to keep to his subject.

Sir W. Joynson-Hicks, in moving the resolution for the reduction of Mr. Shaw's salary, said that parts of Mr. Shaw's speech might have been made by the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, the Minister of Health or the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but little of it by the Minister of Labour. Mr. Shaw had not told them a single scheme to provide work for one man. The only explanations of the Government's unfulfilled election unemployment pledges were that they knew they could not fulfil them, or alternatively, they had not the ability to carry them out.

Mr. C. F. G. Masterman, Liberal Member for Rusholme (Manchester), while expressing neutrality on behalf of the Liberals, said that it was sheer nonsense to pretend that the Labour Party was in any way responsible for the reduction of unemployment since it assumed office.

Another Liberal, Dr. T. J. Macnamara (Camberwell), was an even less sympathetic critic.

Miss Margaret Bondfield, Labour member for Northampton, was speaking when the debate was interrupted by private business.

The debate was concluded by a Conservative motion to apply the closure, which was defeated by 244 votes to 210. Sir W. Joynson-Hicks' motion was thereby talked out.—Reuter.

THE SUGGESTION OF A WORLD COURT

Discussion by Foreign Relations Committee of U. S. Senate: Conditions Proposed

Washington, May 22.

The Senate Foreign Relations Committee to-day discussed the World Court question with results which, several Senators predicted, might lead to an agreement and ensure a report to the Senate before the adjournment of the session.

Some Senators are of the opinion that an agreement may be reached upon the Harding-Coolidge proposal of membership in the present Court with the so-called Hughes safeguards included as definite amendments to the Court Statute to be specifically ratified by the signatories to the Protocol. It is said to be practically unanimously agreed that the United States could not agree to any Court plan binding her to recognize the authority of such a tribunal and to render ex parte advisory opinions.

Washington, May 23.

Senator Pepper has submitted to the Senate a composite plan of adherence to the World Court with reservations.

The plan, which has been referred to the Foreign Relations Committee, provides for modification of the late President Harding's proposal so as to transfer the election of the judges from the League of Nations Council and the Assembly to similar bodies appointed by the Court. It also urges the summoning of a third Hague Conference to clarify and codify international law.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

CITY EQUITABLE FIRE INSURANCE CO.

London, May 22.

Mr. Justice Romer to-day gave judgment in the case in which the Official Receiver as Liquidator of the City Equitable Fire Insurance Co., asked on a misfeasance summons that Gerard Bevan, who was sentenced to prison on December 5, 1922, the other directors and the auditors of the company should be ordered to pay £2,000,000, the amount of the losses resulting from Bevan's frauds. Mr. Justice Romer found that the Official Receiver's action had failed against all the Directors, except Gerard Bevan, against whom he made an order for the payment of £247,000 in respect to losses sustained by the company.—Reuter.

THE WORLD'S NEED OF LIBERALISM

Mr. Lloyd George's Revival Campaign: Conference at Brighton

London, May 22.

Mr. Lloyd George has started a great Liberal revival campaign. Addressing the annual conference of the National Liberal Federation at Brighton to-day, he said that Europe and the world needed Liberalism. Replying to the taunt that the Liberal party was dead, Mr. Lloyd George said that over four millions had voted Liberal during the last election and that there would be many more if the Tories proved as ineffective in Opposition as in office and if the Socialists continued to demonstrate that they were frightened of their job. He looked forward to the day, which was not far distant, when the Liberals would resume office.

Sir Robert Hudson, who was re-elected Treaturer, dwelt on the Federation's need for money and said that if the position was no better at the end of the year he must resign.—Reuter.

NATIONALISTS IN INDIA

Differences of Opinion Between Party Leaders in Conference

Bombay, May 23.

Some difference in Indian Nationalist opinion is revealed by statements following a conference between Messrs. Gandhi, Nehru and Das to decide their future attitude with regard to non-cooperation.

Mr. Gandhi made a statement reiterating his opinion that entry into the Legislatures was inconsistent with non-cooperation, but said that he could not be a party to putting obstacles in the way of the Swarajists. If he entered the Councils, he would strengthen the constructive programme.

Messrs. Das and Nehru, in a counter-statement, defend the policy of obstruction, but accept Mr. Gandhi's suggestion with regard to a constructive programme of definite enconomic policy and prevention of drain on the public wealth from India. They say that they will consequently fill elective posts and serve on every committee possible, but add that, if they find it impossible to resist the bureaucracy without disobedience, they will retire from the Legislatures and help to prepare the country for disobedience.—Reuter.

FROM THE FOUR WINDS

WEMBLEY OPEN AT LAST

British Empire Exhibition Opened by King: But Show Still Far from Ready

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

London, April 23.

Wembley opened to-day, or at least as much of it as was ready, did. There never was any doubt that it would open in time, but the publicity artists attached to the Exhibition, who are quite the most inefficient that it has ever been my lot to meet, doubtless thought it was a great stunt to keep public anticipation keyed up. In that case, it was about the only stunt they ever have thought of.

It will be about June 1 when the Truthful Chronicler will be able to write the Only Reliable Narrative on what the British Exhibition at Wembley really is. I doubt whether any section of the whole concern, with the possible exception of Canada, had its exhibit ready to time. It was the intention of the Exhibition authorities to allow one month between the completion of the Exhibition for the purpose of clearing up and adding finishing touches. It can well be imagined what the state of the grounds is therefore, to-day, when the King started in its course to a successful outcome, as we hope, this vast Imperial undertaking.

We all hope it. Lloyd's especially hope it, since they have guaranteed about £2,000,000, and in respect of this outlay, I understand that the receipts are each evening paid over to the officials of the Bank, which has in the grounds a special branch. The Bank is so enthusiastic that it has printed at its own cost stamps in colours showing these Bank premises, and affixes them to all the letter it sends out. So doubtless hope the purveyors of entertainments in the grounds, since they have paid very large sums for the privilege of a monopoly. Yet to-day when the Exhibition opened, I think 10 per cent. would be a generous estimate of the side-shows which were actually ready. Still, there is one really good scenic railway ready, and this covered up the fact that some of the other shows are only in the initial stages of being constructed at all.

It will undoubtedly be a very fine Exhibition when ready. They say it represents £24,000,000 in value. No doubt it does. Or will. Later on it will be a picturesque aggregation of first-class exhibits. It is not the aggregation yet, unless you include those exhibits—and their name is legion,—which are still in packing cases. It is certainly not picturesque at present, for there are no leaves on the trees, few flowers in the beds, and some of the turf is only being laid down at this late moment. Of course there have been blunders. I have alluded to the biggest and worst, the failure in respect of publicity. There are others, though many of them are ancient history. Had a greater effort been made and a broader view been taken months ago of the outlook, we should not now be faced with the undoubted fact that half the visitors will consider the opening of the Exhibition would profitably have been delayed for another month.

The Home Exhibits.

It is true that some of the exhibits are fairly complete, more especially the machinery section, but many Overseas Departments are greatly in arrear. There have also been some errors of judgment. A special little theatre was built to reproduce by the employment of electrical power marvellous miniature spectacles of the naval battles of the late war. It is now discovered that there is not enough power to give the show, at all events for present. There seems, too, to be some doubt as to whether feeding accommodation is quite adequate, not because Messrs. Lyons are not doing it well, but because, the principle of open-air cafés is very extensively adopted, and many of us are not quite accustomed to this sort of thing in our climate. Nor have the roads been adequately prepared, at all events at present. Debris of all kinds abounds, and though it is quite true that owing to the great good fortune of a brilliantly fine and warm week before the actual opening ceremony, there was little mud about, it is very clear that unless there is caution and provision, the place may very soon provide all the swampy inconveniences, which it did on the occasion of the England v. Scotland Football Match. On the opening day, the circular "Never-Stop" railway rather suggested a "Never-start" railway, because this had not got going at all, but at all events, there are plenty of means of locomotion when once they are in full use. Something of the kind will be necessary, because the distances are considerable, and to see everything you have apparently to walk about 10 miles.

Broadcasting His Majesty.

The opening ceremony was undoubtedly a great success. The King delivered his speech in the Stadium, in which a royal pavilion had been erected and for which there had been planned a semi-military pageant of much imposingness. There were at least 120,000 people present, though whether all who ought to have got there actually arrived is another matter, since with their genius for blundering, some of the official invitations were only sent out four days before the event and the tickets issued the night before. The King's clear voice is suited to broadcasting, and the substance of his speech which he wrote himself frankly does His Majesty credit. On this occasion he spoke to about million people, all of whom heard him clearly. I suppose there was not a seaside place in the country, which had not erected on or near the pier a special receiving arrangement, which not only carried the Royal words, but the music and the cheering, and the reverberation of the crowd's repetition of the Lord's Prayer repeated by the Bishop of London.

Round the World in 80 Secs.

The only thing the five millions missed was the little incident of a small telegraph boy ascending to the royal pavilion and handing a telegram to His Majesty, announcing that the Royal message, declaring the Exhibition open had been sent all round the world in 80 seconds. The King thanked the boy for the message and for an accompanying map of the route, which was presented in a large envelope, and the lad then retired imperturbably, unaffected by the tumultuous cheers of the audience. The listeners-in of course also missed the colour, though as the day was cold and the skies dull, women were dressed solely in black or dark browns, and there were few spring hats. What colour there was, was provided by military men, or by Court officials in the full panoply of their State attire, while there were a certain number of Overseas visitors who had donned the costumes of their respective countries. In any case, the opening pageant was a complete triumph, and even impressive in its way, while there was so much broadcasting apparatus scattered about the grounds of the Exhibition itself, that for the whole day there were voices and music coming from unsuspected places. All the Labour Ministers were present in levée dress, with the exception of the Prime Minister, who by Royal permission was having a few days' holiday before the resumption of Parliament.

Financial Prospects.

Now, a few words as to the future. I understand that the promoters of the Exhibition hope for an attendance of 60,000,000 people. This means a very great deal, since the entire population of this country is only 45,000,000. I believe the actual expenses are based on a minimum of 175,000 people a day. Everything turns, therefore, on whether Londoners and Overseas visitors will content themselves with three or four visits only to the Exhibition, or whether on an average they will go once a week. The man who comes up from the country only goes once or twice. An Overseas visitor may go three or four times, and clearly there are a number of these coming, since you cannot now book rooms at any of the chief London hotels for months ahead, and all the shares of transport and catering companies are rising rapidly in value. At present there are no great actual signs of the visitors, whom I can only congratulate on waiting a few weeks more before coming. As to the Londoner I am still under the impression that he will find Wembley too far out for frequent evening attendance. To reach the spot it takes many Londoners two hours, with, including the admission charge of 1/6d. a return fare of about 3/6d. to 4/–, a sum which will be quite prohibitive in the case of middle-class families, several of whose members would like to be present.

At the same time a curious traffic has arisen from the country. Thus from Hastings, which is just 62 miles from London, there is every day, throughout the Exhibition, a regular charabanc service to Wembley and back. The vehicles are beautifully fitted up, just like private saloons, and the return fare is 8/6d. Under these circumstances, such services by road, which exist all over the country, will afford a very severe competition to the facilities offered by the railways. These facilities are roughly about a fare and a quarter for the return journey, and no doubt will attract scores of thousands. As I said before, however, it is not the excursionist who will make the Exhibition pay.

The Stadium an Attraction.

At the same time the Stadium will always be an asset. Many interesting events are to take place in it. Presumably we shall have therein the Empire Pageant in July. The Final of the Football Cup takes place there on Saturday. Mr. Cochran is arranging his Rodeo in the summer, an event which has produced a good deal of acrimonious controversy in the British papers, though I think it is not unconnected with the skilful hand of the advertiser. A Rodeo is simply an exhibition of buck-jumping horses, and the handling of semi-wild steers. Is it cruel or it is not? The Americans, who know most about it, strongly deny the suggestion. Moreover the show will benefit, because public dinners are to be given there on a large scale. It is a great idea. You will be able to eat your dinner, and afterwards instead of listening to boring speeches, you will be able to go and divert yourself among the various entertainments. Certainly on the first day of the Exhibition, there was enormous public patronage of those side-shows which were opened, which is a good augury for future.

A Very Great Idea.

Despite the criticisms I have made, and the truth of which all the papers are now having to admit, I am glad to assure those who have taken a personal or financial interest in this advanture, that, in my opinion, it will be a great success. This Exhibition certainly shows progress on the side of magnitude; it covers 220 acres, and its gardens and pagodas and pavilions are intersected by, as I have said, nine miles of main roads and six miles more of small roads. Its vast ferro-concrete palaces and pavilions, its spires and domes and minarets, its stucco mountains, and its electrical moonbeams shimmering over its lakes, certainly convey an idea of beauty and variety foreign to the London landscape, and do mark distinct progress on the aesthetic side of undertakings of this nature. The Overseas displays are exceptionally good, and it is not altogether their fault that they are compelled to open late. The British press as a whole has been singularly sympathetic. There is an honest effort to lay stress on the fact that this Exhibition rests, or should rest, on worthy inspiration, and is planned solely as a demonstration of peaceful progress and prosperity, with the additional aim of showing the advance of the arts and sciences, and indeed of civilization since the days when we first founded our Overseas possessions.

Finally, it ought to be added that although there was a huge attendance on the opening day the crowd was both orderly and good humoured. The railway facilities were quite adequate and the outlook with any sort of luck generally encouraging. Any Exhibition of this nature must, in this country, gambles very largely on the weather. It is months since we have had, with the exception of Easter, much warmth or sun, so the odds are now rather in our favour that we may have some fairly fine weeks ahead of us.

A French newspaper states that Mr. Sidney Powell, merchant, of Tientsin, while staying in London, on the way to Paris, was robbed of jewels and money to the value of Frs. 15,000 by an hotel thief. News reached Tientsin recently that Mrs. Powell had been relived of most of her jewellery also.

BRITISH COLUMBIA LETTER

Trans-Pacific Opium Smuggling: New Chinese Counsul-General at Ottawa: What Trades Belong to China: A Strange Murder Trial

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Vancouver, B.C., May 1.

The liner Empress of Russia carried only a light passenger list when she sailed for the Orient to-day. Among the passengers was Mr. T. P. Lachlan, head of the tea department of Jardine, Matheson & Co., of Shanghai. Charles F. Turner, of Detroit, an exporter and importer, will visit several parts of the Orient placing orders for the season's requirements. Mr. C. Henriques, prominent business man of Manila, was homeward bound.

Death Follows Voyage

Shortly after the Empress of Russia arrived here from the Orient on Monday, April 22, Mr. Jacob Sloat Fassett, of Elmira, former N.Y. state senator and congressman, died at the Hotel Vancouver here from heart disease. His death was quite unexpected and came as a severe blow to his wife who had accompanied him on a tour of the Orient where he had large interests. He had important mining holdings in Korea and was associated with a Philippine mahogany company. One of the largest sacks of mails received here for an individual was waiting for Mr. Fassett when he arrived here.

Ex-Senator Fassett was a member of the New York senate from 1884 to 1891 and was a member of Congress from 1905 to 1911, representing the 3rd New York district. The body was taken to New York. Mr. Fassett was 71 years of age. The death came as a great shock to the many from China and Japan who had met him on the steamer and who were apprised of the news as they were leaving for different points across the continent.

Drugs Seized on Liner.

Narcotic seizures on an extensive scale continue to be made on liners arriving here from across the Pacific. The Empress of Russia had not long been in dock when Customs officials found 284 tins of opium, valued at $17,000. The opium was found concealed between the walls of a state room and the iron bulkhead of the ship and had evidently been placed there before the passengers who occupied the cabin came aboard at Ho[illegible]

Consul-General Arrives.

Among recent arrivals from the Orient was Mr. Lo Chang, China's new Consul-General in Canada. An interviewer here found him to be an Oxford graduate who revealed the Oxford accent. The son-in-law of Mr. Kang Yu-wei, the famous monarchist, Mr. Lo was formerly Consul-General at London and Singapore. Speaking of his country's necessity of importing commodities which it did not produce, the new Consul-General remarked; "At Buckingham Palace, you know, it was Charles the Second, wasn't it, who tried to grow mulberry bushes. But in the end he found it cheaper to import these things, which were not natural to his country." One of his special studies in Canada, said Mr. Lo, would be scientific agriculture. "We are an agricultural people, always have been, but we import a great deal of rice from Siam and Straits Settlements. When these countries have crop failures we naturally suffer and we think that by introduction of more scientific methods we can increase our output so as at least to diminish the deficiency in our own output."

The new Consul-General stayed in Vancouver several days before proceeding to Ottawa, his future home. Vancouver and Victoria Chinese associations fêted him freely and he was given a really good time. When the liner reached Victoria a large delegation of his countrymen there welcomed him and persuaded him to give them a brief address in Chinatown.

Globe-Trotter Still Moving.

Other interesting passengers on the ship were Mr. J. Hope, famous globe-trotter, who has been 24 times around the world, Miss Katherin Mayo, of Bedford Hills N.Y., well known authoress, and her companion, Miss M. Moyca Newell, who owns a fine herd of 100 pure bred Holstein cows. These two women founded the British Apprentice Club in New York, which has a membership of 1,300 boys of the British merchant marine.

Rev J. Noble, of the Mission to Lepers of the Australian Presbyterian Church in Korea, was also on board. He was making the long trip to the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church to be held in Edinburgh.

Pioneer Chinese Deported.

Chong Tong, after a residence in British Columbia since 1880, must go back to his native land as the result of a decision given by Chief Justice Hunter, upon a habeas corpus application. The decision is important in that it settles definitely a question that has been before the courts on numerous occasions in respect to convictions under the Narcotic Act.

Chong Tong was convicted of having drugs in his possession and sentenced to six months' imprisonment. The deportation order followed in due course.

The chief justice ruled that where a man is being held on a deportation warrant, he could not go behind that warrant except to determine the truth or otherwise of any fact set out in the warrant of deportation. In other words the validity of the conviction could not be attacked. This is pursuant to the statute of George III, which sets out what may be done on a habeas corpus application, where the subject matter of a habeas corpus proceeding is of a civil or quasi criminal nature.

Twice Sentenced Death.

Twice sentenced to be executed, twice reprieved, his scaffold erected and pulled down and his grave dug on two occasions, this is the unique experience surrounding Chong Sam-bow, who shot and killed John Clayton Jones in a downtown street here on July 18 last. By a strange coincidence the date now set for the execution is exactly one year to the day of the murder. In one trial the jury were discharged before the case was concluded, the third disagreed and were dismissed, and at the fourth trial, two days ago, the jury returned a verdict of guilty, Chong Sam-bow having again to stand in the dock and receive the death sentence. The question whether the accused man was sane or insane at the time of the killing is the issue which has spared the Chinese life to date. Alienists have been called by the defence and prosecution, the net result being that the third jury found the prisoner sane at the time of the shooting. His counsel even now has not given up hope of saving Chong Sam-bow's neck, for it is stated that he will endeavour to have the case again re-opened on appeal, taking advantage of a technicality in that his client's life had been placed in jeopardy by court procedure during the trial, which objection he had voiced before the trial judge prior to the passing of the death sentence.

DANCING as an addition to the Church service has often been suggested and has lately been put into practice at the ancient church of St. Mark's-in-the-Bouverie at New York, much to the scandal of the bishop of the diocese, who at last deprived the church of episcopal administration. Presumably this means financial support. The dances were performed by barefooted girls and naturally attracted large congregations. The rector's defence is that the dances are not an innovation, but have the sanction of ecclesiastical tradition.

OUR SCOTTISH LETTER

The Exodus from the Hebrides: The Undue Proportion of Unskilled: Words that Scotland Gives to the World: The Sporting Season Reviewed

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Edinburgh, Apr. 2.

The organized flow of emigrants from the Western Isles to Canada, which commenced last year, will be continued and probably extended this season. The prophecy of the Seer of Brahan, who in vision saw the Long Island depopulated and the home only of seabirds, is being brought a stage nearer. The readiness of the people to leave must not obscure the fact that the going is a painful ordeal. It means more to the outer islesmen to leave their home than it does to most people. It is not only that their associations with the isles are inevitably deeper and closer. The reason has its roots in the Highland psychology. An authority speaks of the Highlanders' "family pride, their love of clan, their sense of the continuity of their history." They are consciously part of an existence which goes back into the past and goes on into the future, but an existence which is bound up with membership of the clan and life on the land of their forefathers. It is this they are leaving. The departure means a real disruption, and not merely a change of scene. A young man, one of the latest party to leave, had the clearest perception of the possibilities of the life ahead, and of the hazardousness of what he was leaving indeed. His neighbour in the Highland way, and with the expressiveness of the Gaelic, said to him: "You are leaving home, and I think I shall not see you any more; and if you should ever come back, I am afraid the croft will no longer be here as it is now." The disappearance of the croft, which had been the family's home for generations, grasped the young man as nothing else had done. With tears in his eyes, he told one of the Canadian Government agents that if he could honourably hold back even then, he would not go.

These people make the distinct impression of ability to work their way and to carry through with success, to make good on the other side. One feels that the description of "ideal settlers" so frequently applied to the race is not a rhetorical phrase, but has the merit of truthfulness. They look the proper stamp. Here were a group of people accustomed to battle with sea and storm, with uncertain soil and uncertain climate, trained to labour and hardships, not expecting too much from life, unessential as the blows as they are grateful for the smiles of fortune, deeply conscious of Providential dealing in all things. They will strike a new root in more favourable conditions: they will plant themselves deep in their new country.

It is a movement which will continue in increasing extent. It is the old story over again. Emigration from the Highlands and Islands is no new thing. The Highland people were among the earliest settlers overseas. They were in at the start in all the Dominions, and the overflow from these parts has been proceeding in the same direction for about the last 200 years. This emigration has generally been of a mass character by groups and families. The same movement is taking place once more. The spirit is in the air. The mood is coming on, the Hebridean is pondering, and he is getting restless, and from his western coast he is sailing into the further away across the Atlantic waves.

Obituary.

Suddenly, at Marseilles, on March 26, of pernicitis, on his way home from Hongkong, Robert, aged 25, third son of the late Robert Hutchison, Glasgow and South Western Railway, and Mrs. Hutchison, 4 Millbrae, Shawlands, late Kenilworth Avenue, Glasgow.

At a nursing home in Eastbourne, on March 26, George Henry Burnett, aged 61, late of the Hongkong & Shanghai Banking Corpn., and Major Road, Forest Hill, London.

The Great Army of Unskilled.

One of the most depressing features of the industrial scene, a chill anxiety to those who have some responsibility for the education of young people, is the dependency of young entrants employment for at least half of those leaving school in search, and, of course, no consolation can be found in the fact that the same problem is to be found in other countries. Suggestions have been made that education should be carried on in the meantime, beyond the school-leaving age, but obviously this is no remedy for the serious state of affairs that exists: merely means deferring the problem a year or so when the result may be disastrous will be more disastrous in the long run. It is the nation's youth that had to pay most heavily in the war. And its price is still paying. Nearly one-half of the unemployed in Scotland are men between the ages of 18 and 28. Many of them, because they fought for their country, have never had a fair chance to follow out a calling, or to get a footing in the labour market. Hence the large proportion of them are classified as unskilled workers. Equally deserving of sympathy are the lads who, because of the war and its industrial consequences, have been denied the opportunity of beginning their apprenticeship to some useful occupation. Like the man who came back, they are at a dead end. Mr. J. M. Cranwood, of the Ministry of Labour, expressed to the members of the Rotary Club in Edinburgh the opinion that very few of the unemployed are what might be called unemployable. They are anxious to get work, but, as matters stand, there is not work for them. The demoralizing effect of this on the country's manhood does not need to be emphasized. It is a position towards which little can be done, even by a Labour Government. This does not mean, however, that nothing can be done. The Trade Unions, if they worked, could render practical assistance. The building trades are crying out for men. The labour available in Scotland to-day for the erection of houses—the nation's greatest need—is little more than a half of what it was in 1920. Here, at least a large number of the unemployed could be usefully absorbed. But thanks to the selfish and short-sighted policy of the Trade Union leaders, they are shut out. How these leaders reconcile this conduct with the ideas of democracy and brotherhood they so freely express, is what no outsider can understand.

Heckling and Thrums.

A number of textile expressions have been embodied in our language, but many Scots, not to mention Southerners, would be unable to explain their origin and meaning. Two of these words, heckling and thrums, are especially intriguing, and it will be interesting to reproduce the explanations given by Mr. George L. Barclay in a lecture to the Dundee Burns Club. Heckling, as most readers will be aware, is the questioning and cross-questioning with which a political meeting in Scotland usually closes. That heckling, Mr. Barclay said, got its name from a process familiar in pre-machinery days. The flax had to be straightened out, the men stood in rows, and, as the operation was somewhat mechanical, they could indulge in conversation. They were ardent politicians; in fact, many of the Chartists were recuited from their class. While they wrought one of their number read the newspapers. A thrum, he explained, was a bit of waste yarn. Barrie in seeking to immortalize his native town used the name as nothing better than a cast-off article, but the despised bit of waste has become synonymous with all that was best and sweetest in life. The thrum went into the waste bag, but it could be used to tie up broken threads on the loom. Did Barrie himself see his characters in a light like that? They were ordinary everyday men and women, and it might be that all they could do was to furnish a thread to tie up a broken bit of life.

Moray Golfers and Premier.

Mr. J. Ramsay MacDonald, to whom an offer of honorary membership of Spey Bay Golf Club was intimated, has intimated his acceptance of the invitation. They invited him "to accept the small recognition from a Morayshire club in the great honour and distinction that you, a Moray man, have attained in becoming the head of His Majesty's Government." The Spey course is in miles from Lossiemouth with the Lossiemouth Club which expelled Mr. Macdonald from its membership for his pacifist conduct during the war.

No Kilt For Him.

In the new Galsworthy play, "The Forest," the leader of the native bearers is the son of a great Baganda chief on the shores of Lake Tanganyika. He talks good English, and tells two stories in that language. While his grandfather was chief, Dr. Livingstone appeared on the scene. "'Do you come in peace or war?' my grandfather asked him. He said in peace—to heal our wounds and heal our sores. And when our wounds were healed ... Dr. Livingstone had annexed us and we belonged to Britain." During the war this stout young Baganda was drafted into the Gordon Highlanders, but refused to wear the kilt. When asked what was wrong with the kilt, he answered fiercely "It is a woman's garment, and I—I am a man!" Steady the Gordons!

Extremely Dull.

A dean, in a neighbourhood near London has caused some stir by a sermon on temperance. I am advised by a London Scot who lives in the district and heard the discourse. Incidentally the dean mentioned that recently he visited a small English village where the inhabitants, noted in the past for convivality, had undergone a "cure" and were now all strict teetotallers. "To tell the truth, dear friends," said the dean in his sermon, "I found them dull—extremely dull."

"Dry" Palace of Holyrood

Edinburgh, Apr. 9.

The interest taken in the appointment of Mr. James Brown, M.P., to be Lord High Commissioner to the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland is quite extraordinary. The foolish talk of a boycott has disappeared, and Scotland will support the Labour miner without reservation. The Duke of Atholl has been giving advice and assistance to Mr. Brown. "I was instructed by their Majesties," said the Duke, "to co-operate with the Office of Works in general improvements of the Palace which are being carried out. The rooms used by the High Commissioner will be ready by the time of the General Assembly next month, and though in no sense lavishly furnished, will be worthy to receive His Majesty's representative. His Majesty, with his accustomed generosity, has given instructions that the Lord High Commissioner will have the benefit of articles such as china, cooking utensils, glass, etc., that the Commissioner formerly had to supply himself, and which was a very heavy burden. Carriages and harness have also been provided by His Majesty." Asked as to Mr. Brown's Prohibitionist views, and whether they would be put into effect at Holyrood, the Duke said, "This is entirely a matter for Mr. Brown himself, but if I believed in a thing I should think very little of myself if I did not support it."

China to Glasgow.

This is Glasgow's year for the World Sunday School Convention, and as the meetings take place in June, delegates from the most remote places are already packing their trunks. The first of them is on his way, the Rev. A. L. Ryan left Manila over a week ago. At any moment it is expected that the Rev. E. C. Tewkesbury, secretary of the China Sunday School Union, with 30 others will leave China by the trans-Siberia railway. Three ships are sailing from North America, the first leaving to-day, making the journey to Glasgow via Palestine and Egypt. Lord Pentland is acting as chairman of the Convention, and the speakers will include General Sir Robert Baden-Powell, Sir George Adam Smith, Lady Frances Balfour, Lord Aberdeen, and Lord Cecil of Chelwood.

The Parsimonious Scot.

How old is the satire against the Scotsman for his parsimoniousness? We have just come across a version in an interesting reprint "Antanda; A Sacrifice to an Unknown Goddesse, or, a Free-Will Offering of a Loving Heart to a Sweet-Heart," by N. H., of Trinity College, in Cambridge. It first appeared in 1653; the reprint is published by Elkin Mathews. The poem is prefaced by five congratulatory poems by ingenious young gentlemen friends of N. H.—Nicholas Hookes—and is a sequence of verses in the fashion of the time on Amanda, singing, feasting, pledging her lover, about to pray, praying, after prayer, and also on more delicate occasions (all with the infinite courtesy and unblushing frankness which were a la mode in the seventeenth century—some of it so quaintly frank as to be humorous). Then come some miscellaneous poems, including a translation from Michael Drayton into Latin verse and one on the "Rout of the disloyal partie of Scots at Dunbarre," beginning—

"Is Jockie routed? Charon, rig the boat," and containing references to "coarse oatmeal bags." "Howlings for losse of Bernes, of gudes and geer!" and dancing "Scottish gigs." But the point of special interest is the warning given to Charon, the "ferry-mon" of the Styx. Foure thousand Scots at least are coming, with kettles hanging at their gurdles. Be on your guard!

"Ah! Charon, launch into the deep, there make Conditions e're they board thee, do not take A mon into thy skiffe till thou art paid." The poem is packed with exulting insults, but it is an interesting comment on Scottish thrift that we have turned the old-time anathema into a modern profitable jest—for which the English pay!

School Badges—And Others.

A few days ago I renewed acquaintance with a distinguished Chinese whom I had not met for a good many years. He was a picturesque figure—not, however, because he sported a pigtail or wore robes of padded silk, but because the garments he displayed to the world were a handsome fur-collared overcoat and a school cap, silver braided, tasselled and crested. Separately, these two items of apparel were commonplace but associated on the person of a Chinese gentleman, head of a Chinese household, they were noteworthy to say the least. The cap, you see, was not one that could be had just for the buying. What the gilt spurs of knighthood meant to the lads of the age of chivalry, that cap signified to the boys of the school at which my Chinese friend was educated. Scholastic honours were despised in comparison, for, of course, it was the cap worn by members of the First Fifteen.

A football cap, with its gaudy braid, its vaunting embroidered dates, and, above all, its swinging tassel, is essentially a helm for the head of youth. It would be out of place on the head of a Bailie or a kirk elder. Very few of us can live up to its tacit challenge; we, growing up and realizing our limitations, and the surprising effectiveness of other people's competition, content ourselves by sporting rosettes or badges on our watch chains, or perhaps on special occasions a rose, a thistle or a leek, or an enamelled clover leaf in our coat lapel. But there was my hero from the Flowery Land facing the cold gaze of the upstart Occident with the gallant oriflamme above his skull. He must have preserved it with care, for its condition was excellent—its veleet lustrous, its silver bright. Pride in it had survived the shock of leaving school and finding that even its First Fifteen was not universally greeted with wreaths and trumpets; survived too the disillusion of growing to manhood, the years of separation from others brought up in the same cult, the return to the atmosphere of the brooding East.

Certain of our agitators would like to abolish the ceremonial of public life, its uniforms and ritual. The wish is a vain hope. Even the medicine man of a cannibal tribe is distinguished by particular paint patterns. The first thing a man does, who wants to smash the organization of the big society called the nation, is to join a society with like ideals, and very likely wear a special button or badge or bomb to show his pride in it. Some of us learned the value of this love of distinguishing badges during the war. Men put up service stripes and wound badges not only because they were proud of having served and having been wounded, but also because they felt the exhilaration of belonging to a big brotherhood of veterans who had lost at the least a little skin for a cause. Man seems to want a label to be proud of. Men of a regiment are sure it is the best in the army; each battalion boasts of its superiority; each company looks down a little on all the others, and in each platoon you find a healthy contempt for all the other platoons—compared with itself.

The Golf Championship.

In the long history of the amateur championship only two players—Mr. Harold Hilton and Mr. Horace Hutchinson have won it two years in succession, with St. Andrews the venue each year. Mr. Roger Wethered, who has found the Old Course his best hunting ground, seems favourably placed to prove himself the third golfer to achieve the noteworthy feat. Admittedly he has a chance but—there are others. Champions from many lands will be there striving to relieve us of the honour. Bobby Jones, America's best, is coming; Australia will be represented, even the Indian champion is going to have a try, and our own Home Scots—who will not be far away at the finish—will be out to do their best to bring glory to the old land. Surely some problem spotting the victor here? Many English critics, however, are already telling us quite frankly that the event is once again going to England. As one leading authority puts it—"Roger Wethered seems likely to start as warm a favourite for the championship as ever St. Andrews has known." Mr. John Caven is one of those who reckons the champion will start first favourite. He thinks Cyril Tolley another formidable opponent, and Ernest Holderness must be carefully watched. With regard to Scotland's chances, Mr. Caven mentions Jack Wilson, W. B. Torrance, W. A. Murray, Robert Scott, jun., and Willis M'Kenzie as our hopes (we will include his own name in the list.)

Seven-A-Side Rugby.

Despite the protests of self-styled purists and others who see no good in what they term a distortion of a great game, the practice of holding Rugby seven-a-sides increases in popularity in Scotland, until now practically every centre holds its own tournament when the more exacting work of the season has been brought to a finish. One need not seek far to find the reason of public interest in this abridged form of the game. No matter how well a Club may be playing, or how successful it has been, the supporter is apt to get wearied even before the competitive part of the Club's activities is completed, hence he welcomes something novel as a relief if it offers a fair amount of enjoyment. The nature of these games, too, appeal to his sporting instincts.—seven-a-sides can and do provide the fast and thrilling play which may be lacking in a match under ordinary conditions.

At Edinburgh, Watsonians came out on top, Heriot's F. P.'s being runners-up. On the Borders Hawick were the victors, Jedforest being second. The Dundee tournament winners were Kirkcaldy, Dundee High School F. P.'s coming next.

Rangers Retain Championship.

Though they have still three matches to play, the Rangers are now certain of the Scottish League championship. The position at the other end of the table is interesting. Clydebank's chance of escaping relegation is very remote, and other clubs which are not safe yet are Third Lanark, Clyde, and Queen's Park. The last-named had a welcome win over Aberdeen, and with two more matches in hand than the other two clubs, should yet make their position secure. It is now certain that Cowdenbeath will step up from the Second to the First Division along with St. Johnstone, and Arthurlie.

Two plans for neutralizing the Philippines in the event of their attaining independence are before the American Congress. One is that the Powers interested should conclude a treaty giving the Islands a guarantee against attack. The other is a proposal to make an agreement with the Filipinos themselves under which they would promise never to give up their independence by treaty to any other nation. All this is purely academic discussion. The Filipinos are not to have independence until they learn to govern themselves as well as Messrs. Fall, Denby, Daugherty, Doheny and others have governed the United States. It is quite useless for them to hope to attain such heights.

OUR AUSTRALIAN LETTER

Imminent Prospects of a Return of Labour to Power: Successes in Three States: Flying over the Flooded Bush: Subsidy for Far Eastern Trade

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Melbourne, Apr. 8.

Parliament is once more in session, though it has temporarily adjourned for about a month in order that members may go over to Sydney and participate in the Special Naval Squadron festivities. There is not much that is now expected from these, but it was noticeable that political Labour did not lodge protests against "wasting the people's time in order to pay tribute to an effete militarism," that being the sort of way the Federal Opposition and its friends mostly talk when they are mounted on the soap-boxes, which are the popular rostrums of liberty. During the fleet's visit to Sydney the battle cruiser, Australia, will be sunk off the Sydney Heads with some ceremony. She cost the best part of a couple of millions, and the agitation which has been going forward against her destruction in accordance with the Washington Treaty is ample evidence of the irresponsible ignorance of Australian pressmen and politicians, who want to defy the world, or at least the great nations of it. But they are learning, and the League of Nations is proving of the highest educative value. Probably the most interesting incidents of the sittings of the Commonwealth Parliament in its present session were the reports of three members—Major-Gen. Sir Neville Howse, V.C., and Col. Cameron, of the House of Representatives—who attended the fourth assemblage of the League.

The Light that Failed.

Labour has made an absurd mistake in Parliament—a mistake which one fears indicates that amongst the astute tacticians of Sovietism our subscribers to the great Red Objective are mere children. The Prime Minister moved the adoption of the Imperial Conference resolutions in globo, and the Labour Opposition was so anxious to get its Pacifist feelings on record that it insisted upon at once moving an amendment that it approved of the foreign policy of the Ramsay MacDonald government, "as approved by the representatives of the people." Having thrown down the gauge the Opposition adopted the policy of masterly inactivity. It refused to talk—why, is not quite clear. An election for the State Assembly of South Australia was pending, and there were those who believed that the silence was due to a belief that it was silvery and that garrulity might produce statements which could be seized upon and used to the detriment of the party. There was probably a good deal of truth in that view, but it also seems likely that an issue, such as that of the foreign relations of the Empire and the Singapore Base, bristles with so many difficulties that the Opposition did not want to talk—South Australian elections or not. Labour in Australia hates the very mention of Empire, because it pre-supposes an outlook beyond the corridors of the trades halls. One member, who appealed for a statement as to whether the Opposition was for or against the Empire, was howled down with derisive cries, of which the chief was the single word "Empire." Later on when the matter of ratifying the Lausanne treaty was brought forward Labour devoted quite a lot of venom in emphasizing the fact that when Britain was at war every Dominion had the right to declare itself neutral. But the Opposition, which is chiefly concerned in winning votes, lost its way. The light of the leader went out. It found itself anxious to support quite a lot of things accomplished by the Imperial Conference, but deprived of the opportunity of doing so. The leader, Mr. Charlton, said there was nothing in the report of the Prime Minister, and consequently it was useless for him to ask the House for the concession of opportunity to discuss what, on second thoughts, his party had decided was in the report. Thus for the first time in its history, probably, Labour has had ammunition to fire, and yet has itself rejected the opportunity of making the pyrotechnic display. Thus the discussion on the Imperial Conference resolutions took the form of propaganda speeches from the ministerial side, to which the Labour Opposition listened with ill-concealed restlessness, and occasional interjections, without so much as filling columns of useful fighting material in convenient "Hansard" form for the use of their friends outside.

League of Nations.

Gen. Howse's report on the fourth assemblage of the League of Nations gave politicians much to think about. They learnt for the first time that English was only included in the language of League officialdom by chance, as America was supposed to speak English and likely to be a member. They also listened to an explanation of the diplomacy of the Council of the League on the famous occasion when Italy almost went to war with Greece, which diplomacy gave Italy all she demanded and put Greece in the position of the toad under the harrow. Gen. Howse admitted that the League had no machinery by which it could coerce either disputant, and his colleague, Col. Cameron, subsequently told the House that several of the smaller nations, whose voices are heard in the Assembly, flatly refused to acknowledge themselves responsible for giving armed assistance in the matter of preserving peace. The interpretation of Article 10 seems to be still in the air, though the Australian delegate is satisfied that the League cannot compel a country to supply armed force to suppress trouble, should its Parliament decide otherwise.

When it came to describing the resolutions passed regarding the international status of Labour, the reduction of working hours, and general improvement of the conditions of the workers, Gen. Howse was plainly accorded a sympathetic hearing from the Labour Opposition, but one must confess that the whole business seemed largely impracticable. It is comparatively a simple matter to pass pious resolutions, and even to report that some of those resolutions have been given effect to by certain nations, but to Australians the most that can be said is that conditions are being slowly created which will put labourers in Japan, India and middle Europe in a position approximating that of labourers in Australia. The process of bringing all workers to the highest standard of living and the lowest standard of heavy labour must be a long one, and the result, when the revolution is accomplished, no man can foresee.

Subsidy for Far Eastern Trade.

Some time ago the Government announced its willingness to subsidize steamers so as to develop Australian trade with China, Japan and the Straits Settlements. The Minister who made the promise was strongly suspected of doing so with a view to gratifying those to whom the dismissal of Mr. E. S. Little did not recommend itself. No sooner was the promise made that it was further announced that the Government was waiting for definite offers of trade and shipping. At last it has been announced that a £40,000 a year subsidy is to be granted upon certain conditions, and it is unnecessary to say that at once objections are being raised by certain shipping companies which claim that they are already supplying an efficient service and are ready to increase it with any increment of trade.

It is pointed out that the trade in wheat and flour with China has greatly increased since June, 1923, and they could also have said much the same of butter and milk, and in a lesser degree of meat, but these facts cut little ice. The increases are not important as compared with the enormous business to be done, and there is a strong feeling that the present responsible minister, Mr. Chapman, does not take the matter of creating the trade in jams, preserved fruits, dried fruits and meats at all seriously. The opposition of those who have already secured some sort of trade is natural; they want no competitors, and until the driving power of the producers in this country is felt little progress can be made.

Doradilla Grapes.

There is quite a curious story attached to this variety of grapes. It is, I believe, a form of fruit which strongly resembles the sort of grapes a bunch of which it took two spies to carry out of Palestine. It is said not to be a table grape—though something like a large muscatel—but especially suited to the manufacture of spirits. It seems that when the Victorian State Government started to settle returned soldiers on the land, it placed them on small irrigated areas, and its officials advised the planting of Doradilla vines, because they would give the quickest and heaviest returns. The soldiers, whose knowledge of vineyards was probably limited to the bayoneting of Germans amongst the grapevines of the French Champagne, accepted the advice and this year found themselves with tons of the fruit, which the distillers declined to buy. The latter said the government must reduce the excise on brandy, or the grapes must rot. The attitude taken up was somewhat similar to that of the jam-makers and canners who, by declaring they did not want the fruit, so worked upon the feelings of the Country representatives in the government that a bounty, both on production and export, was given to the jam manufacturers and canners provided they bought the fruit. It should be added that the government fixed the price to be paid for fruit. In the case of the grapes the distillers worked precisely the same game, and the government has hurried through parliament an increase of 5s. 0d. a gallon on imported brandy, and has not fixed the price the distillers are to pay for grapes. All of this, of course, means that some comparative understrappers of a State Department have, by giving unauthorized advice to soldier-settlers, succeeded in rushing Australia into an amendment of her tariff, and quite possibly an unpleasant argument with the French exporters and the Australian importers of high-class wines.

Another State Election.

In my last letter I mentioned the victory of Labour in Western Australia in the elections for the Legislative Assembly. That victory was largely attributable to the general disgust and confusion caused by the creation of many different parties, each representing some slight shade of difference in its outlook. Labour went boldly to the polls, declaring,—"we are in favour of socialization, and we all think the same, and our party is solid." It naturally won. Now in South Australia the same factors have created the same results. There are 46 members in the Assembly, and given all doubtful seats the Barwell (Liberal) government will have 21 supporters, Labour will have 23, and there will be two members representing the remnant of the Country party. Labour will naturally go into office and any little difficulty about a majority will be overcome by buying a member or two, with one or other of the various remunerative jobs which are at the disposal of the majority. This is not libelling Labour; it is the frank recognition of its common practice. It has only to persuade a Barwell follower to be Speaker and it is safely in office for the next three years. But Labour's recuperative power is not solely due to Labour's merits. Sir Henry Barwell and his friends were busily engaged in December, 1922, in driving out of the Federal parliament those followers of Mr. Hughes, who had once been Labourites, and they were successful. The Nationalist voters, who had followed Hughes, naturally went back to the Labour camp, and at the late election voted Labour once again. It was the obvious and certain thing to happen, and sane and progressive government suffers in consequence. It must be admitted that Labour in South Australia has hitherto been of the modest and moderate variety, but the advent to office of Labour in three States—Tasmania, Western and South Australia—during the last few weeks, and the general feeling that Labour will soon regain power in the Commonwealth parliament is causing the quidnuncs some anxiety.

Flying Developments.

Australia is disposed to take aeronautics with the same casualness that her soldiers displayed in warfare. A seaplane has just got up off the water near Melbourne to fly round Australia, surveying the coast line for flying purposes. The total flight will be 9,000 miles, and the longest non-stop journey about 450 miles between Thursday Island and Elcho Island in the extreme north. Though there is reason to think that the journey will involve considerable risks no one seems particularly interested. Since Mr. Hughes went out of office we have been periodically promised an air mail service between Adelaide and Sydney, and between the latter and Brisbane. The first of these services we are now assured will commence this month. It will have the effect of cutting Melbourne out of the line of communications between the east and west of Australia, shorten the time of delivery of overseas mails in Sydney, and give New South Wales and Queensland extra time to write their outward correspondence. But it will do more. It will bring into close touch with Adelaide and Sydney the long line of little settled country between those two cities, and what that means may well be gathered from the experience of the two air services in Western Australia and Queensland. For the past 18 months the Western Australia service has flown its 1,200 mile journeys twice a week without losing a quarter-of-an-hour. The regularity of a train service is not in the comparison. Passengers are taken, and numerous stretcher cases have been carried to medical aid. In Queensland the country traversed has lately experienced floods, and the aeroplanes flying over the waste of waters—sometimes 100 milles or so across—have effected many rescues, and also allowed business men to carry on, station hands to search for lost stock, and indeed to reduce the proverbial terrors of the bush to a negative quantity. The new services will soon be followed by others, and taxi-cab planes will link up with the main routes, even as they do in the neighbourhood of our towns and cities.

A Timely Rescue.

The Japanese merchant ship, Honolulu Maru, has reason to be thankful that the Special British Naval squadron was in Australian waters, when about 80 miles from the New South Wales coast she encountered a severe storm, her cargo shifted and there appeared an excellent chance of her foundering as many another ship has in that vicinity. Her S O S call reached the light cruiser Dauntless which was on her way northwards from Tasmania, and the warship at once went to the scene, stood by, until relieved by another light cruiser, the Dragon, which had also been sent. The Dauntless then returned to Sydney, whence tugs had been despatched, and in due course the Japanese steamer was brought into Jervis Bay and safety. It is interesting to record that the steamer Canberra, which was steaming 16 miles an hour with the gale, picked up the call and turned to go to help, but against the wind she could only make two miles an hour. It came therefore as a relief to that ship to learn that her efforts were unnecessary as the Dauntless was coming up with the wind at the rate of 23 miles an hour. The Honolulu Maru was a steel screw steamer of 5,751 tons, belonging to the Osaka Shosen Kaisha, and had a cargo of wool, flour, milk etc. She also carried 1,400 tons of slab zinc. It is probable that had the seas been less violent the captain of the Honolulu Maru would have ordered his crew into the boats, and their remaining aboard seems to have been a case of Hobson's Choice.

It was reported on Tuesday in "Shanghai New Times," a Russian journal, that Jews continue to leave Russia in a state of panic. Recently, over 30 families have arrived in Shanghai from Vladivostok, bringing news that trains and steamers arriving from East Russia are crowded with Jewish refugees, hurrying away from the country in consequence of the increasing anti-Jewish feeling.

NEW JOYS FOR THE GOURMET

The lament that a general taste for smoking, the luxury of life, and the new distribution of wealth have destroyed appreciation of the fine art of cookery finds little response among the experts. The epicure may not be so familiar a figure as he was, and he is certainly not so solemnly self-conscious. But at no time, and nowhere in the world, was the poetry of food more appreciated than in London to-day.

This is the testimony of M. Fontaine, the chief of Prince's, who was trained in Paris, and with nearly 30 years' experience of London is in a position to compare present and past.

"Money has, no doubt, changed hands," said M. Fontaine to me today, "but the Londoner has under our guidance gained a first-class knowledge of good cookery.

"There are, moreover, quite a number of real old-fashioned gourmets. For instance, these dishes are in great demand just now—plovers' eggs, 'poussin, a very small chicken. You can have a poussin small enough for one or large enough for two. They are a most obliging species.

Caviare.

"Caviare has all its old popularity now that it can be had in fine quality—not pressed, but with every egg in separation, the test of good caviare.

"But let me whisper this season's secret. Quails have never been so delicious. Perfectly amazing is the demand for them. Followed by an ice 'parfait,' you will feel at peace with the world, especially if you have had a glass of champagne to help things down. A word to Londoners about champagne: do not overdo the ice. Champagne should not frozen!

"Asparagus, young vegetables, and strawberries are in nightly demand. Diners out in London are always on the look-out for strawberries in spring. This is particularly so this season.

"The chief difficulty a chef has in London is to keep up with the varying demands of each season. This season is a complete answer to the old libel that the Englishman does not know how to choose a menu.

"Dainty morsels with supper, garnished with asparagus 'points' are now as popular in London as they are in Paris. Unfortunately it has been difficult to get 'pauillac,' or milk-lamb this season. This delicacy is in great demand. London's taste has, indeed, been educated beyond belief."

A chef at the Savoy Hotel said: "We are putting on no fewer than four hundred new dishes to cope with the torrent of visitors London is expecting. Quite out of the ordinary, but most delicious is the Argentine dish known as 'Puchero.' This is in great favour just now. It consists of beef, bacon, chicken and rice.

"Should you not fancy 'Puchero,' you may quietly be led to like a Brazilian delicacy known as 'Bacalhao-com-Batatas.' This is soft cod, cooked in green oil with tomatoes and potatoes.

"As a sweet a dish known as 'Chinese night' may be commended. This is half a Chinese melon saturated in aromatic Chinese wine. The centre is stuffed with crushed cheetle nut and cream. The whole is then iced."

The Ideal Menu.

M. Eugene, chief chef at the Piccadily Hotel, considers the following an ideal dinner menu:—

Hors d'Œuvres, Printannier Royal, Crême de Laitues, Delice de Sole, Vol-au-Vent, Petits Pois au Beurre, Pgularde de Surrey roti au Cresson, Salade de Chicorée, Coupe Alexandra, Friandises.

As a pick-me-up after the dancing which usually follows dinners nowadays, Pigeon Bordeaux with Pommes Chips is suggested.

At the Florence Restaurant delicacies in great demand are Spring Salmon and Soufflet Surprise, the latter with home-made "petit fours."

A typical supper menu suggested by a man about town is Huitres Natives, Consommé Double, Caile, Ice Pralinée. This expert declares that fish at supper is outrageous. But surely the strangest supper in all London is that made by an old stalwart who says that he cannot sleep until he has eaten a piece of under-cut done "Maître d'Hôtel."

The Australian vanguard has already arrived, and hotels and restaurants are laying in supplies of "Passion Fruit." A doctor strongly commends the American passion for grape fruit. "It is a tonic in itself," is his verdict.

As for private entertaining, the glory of the old-fashioned dinner-party has vanished. The gourmet mostly haunts restaurant land, and though he has his grumble, he also has his joys.

OUR PARIS LETTER

M. Ribot's War Memories
Clemenceau Staff Soldier

A series of 38 letters written by the late M. Ribot to a friend, and [illegible] war. The letters cover the period between August, 1914, and October, [illegible] the financial relations with England and the United States, the critical position in March, 1917, the failure of the offensive in Champagne in the following month, the Russian revolution, affairs in Greece, and the fall of the Cabinet in October, 1917.

It could hardly be expected of such an old Parliamentary hand as M. Ribot, and especially of one who [illegible] should reveal any secrets of importance or tell the world anything sensational. His letters are chiefly remarkable for a series of pen-pictures of individuals. Of the present President of the Republic, whose colleague he was in the Viviani Cabinet at the beginning of the war, M. Ribot writes: "The portfolio of War was in the strong hands of M. Millerand. He showed himself to be a tireless worker, living very much within himself, caring nothing for social relations, seldom asking [illegible] when he had once made up his mind and occasionally obstinate, tenacious and patient in his legitimate ambi[illegible]

Clemenceau the Fencer

[illegible] which always disconcerted his op[illegible] orator than a first-rate fencer. When [illegible] setting forth political ideas and principles, he was not at his best. His speeches on these occasions were badly put together, and it was easy to detect passages that had been inserted by his collaborators. The whole thing was lacking in inspiration; but he was brilliant when he had to improvise, and he had a supply of retorts that stuck like arrows in a wound."

Of M. Briand the silver-tongued orator, five times Premier and now [illegible] "It was M. Briand's custom to bring despatches to the [illegible] thought the Council would help him to make up his mind. While he [illegible] his colleagues' opinions on their faces. He showed extraordinary cleverness and flexibility in meeting the objections which he foresaw, and he graduated his own utter[illegible] and [illegible]."

Foch the Greatest of Them All.

Foch the Greatest of Them all. M. [illegible] gives an [illegible] that of Marshal Foch. "He would have [illegible] who points out that, in spite the [illegible] principle of the con[illegible] [illegible] very few people here," which always disconcerted his op[illegible] private pro[illegible] have spoken to regarded it as [illegible] lity. Even a who listened to him felt that here [illegible] to be fully relied upon. In the course of several journeys I made with him to London, what struck me about him was to see so much knowledge combined with so much good sense, so much personal worth and so little desire to shine, an indescribable mixture of familiarity and dignity that could not fail to inspire confidence. This explains why our allies were so quick to appreciate Gen. Foch and cheerfully admitted his superiority, and why they accepted him as commander-in-chief when, after reverses that [illegible] necessity of unity of command was [illegible] which his military genius had its full scope. When I met him after [illegible] simple, as devoid of vanity and all personal ambition as when he was chief of staff. I do not believe there is any greater or more likeable personality in our time."

Marshal Petain.

Of Marshal Pétain M. Ribot writes: "He has all the highest qualities of a leader. He knew what his men could be asked to do, and he left nothing to chance. Best of all, he had personal authority. He was not quite careful enough in what he said after he rose to positions of great responsibility, but there was never anything of the courtier about him. He is outwardly cold and reserved. I feel sure that in reality he has much keener sensibility than most people credit him with."

In another letter M. Ribot writes: "Gen. Joffre will go down to posterity as the man who won the battle of the Marne, and that is a sufficient title to fame. I often saw Gen. Joffre at the meetings of the War Committee. There was never anything striking in his explanations, but he showed much good sense and solid judgment."

"Football" Now a French Word.

It is almost as difficult for a new word to get into the French [illegible] old reputation to enter the Academy itself. The candidates are put [illegible] with, they have no chance at all unless they happen to satisfy M. Rébellian, formerly librarian of the Institut de France and now a member of the Académie des Inscriptions et Belles Lettres, who is a sort of [illegible] births. He puts them down in alphabetical order and presents them [illegible] Academicians who form the dictionary committee. When this body meets, each of the five has [illegible] sheet of the last edition of the dictionary stuck on the left-hand page and the new words inscribed on the right, under a large query mark. The claims of the candidates are fully discussed and, if admitted, are referred to the next meeting of the whole body of Immortals.

In this way it was decided that "football" had earned its place in the French language but that "basket-ball" was not yet acclimatised; that the war meaning of "as" (ace) as a "first-rater" or "Number 1 man" as the Chinese would say, is puikia, but that the much older word "bécane" (bicycle) is not. The derivation of this word may be worth relating to those who do not know it. During the bicycle craze a quarter of a century ago, [illegible] his visits to his factory, was [illegible] caused him to pronounce the oft-used word "mécanician" as "bécanicien." "Next day, every [illegible] word so as to signify the article they manufactured.

GERMAN PRIVATE PROPERTY IN ENGLAND

The "Frankfurter Zeitung" of March 25 publishes a noteworthy [illegible] who points out that, in spite [illegible] principle of the con[illegible] [illegible] very few people here," [illegible] private pro[illegible] have spoken to [illegible] regarded it as [illegible] lity. Even a [illegible] who listened to him felt that here [illegible] recently told me that he, too, was wholly ignorant of the fact. . . . As things are now a release of private property can only be really effective if all former liquidations [illegible] other hand much still remains to be settled—for example, the whole question of the securities belonging to private persons and confiscated in English banks, making, with interest, a total sum of £10 millions. The question of American securities, of which the certificates are lying here in London, is also an open one. The Court of Arbitration is still dealing with a dispute as to whether the right to [illegible] themselves has been seized with these certificates. It is to be feared that this will be affirmed, for the certificates, so as to be marketable, are not made out in any names. Their total value, without interest, would probably amount to about £15 millions."

The "Frankfurter" adds an editorial comment in which it points out that English public opinion does not seem to realize that the Treaty of Versailles has annulled the principle of the inviolability of private property which used to be internationally valid, and that England is far behind several other countries in removing this injustice.

OLD LONDON

A "Stande of Ale" Presented by Symon the Anker

Yet another City church is in need of funds for the repair of the fabric. Yesterday it was St. Clement's, Eastcheap, or the church where Captain Cuttle was wont to worship; to-day it is Allhallows, London Wall, so called from its position on the wall which the Romans buildt some 1,600 years ago. Important remains of a Roman bastion may still be found beneath the semi-circular vestry.

When and how the first Christian church was built on the site one cannot say. The parish is mentioned in a will of 1285, and the list of rectors begins in 1349. There was a cell, known as the "Anker-hole" in the church for the use of anchorites —one at a time, please, for these pious gentlemen were touchy about their preserves—the most celebrated of whom was "Symon the Anker," who wrote "The fruyte of redempcyon," which Wynkyn de Worde printed in black-letter in 1514—

Of your charyte praye for the Anker of London Wall wretched Symion that to the honour of Jhesu Cryst and of the virgyn his moder mary hath compyled this matter in englysshe for your ghostly comforte that understande no latyn.

Symon received more than enough from visitors who admired his piety or yielded to his importunity, for we find him on one occasion giving to the church a "stande of ale," and on another a "chalys. . . wayenge viij vnces."

Old Allhallows had a tower and bellturret of timber, and a [illegible] against the Holofernes of Spain like Deborah, a Mother in Israel:

> In Court a Saint,
> In Field an Amazon,
> Glorious in life,
> Deplored in her death.

The church escaped the Great Fire, but by 1764 it had become so dangerously dilapidated that an Act of Parliament was obtained for its removal, and the present building, from the designs of George Dance the younger, was erected at the cost of £2,941.

Allhallows has for many years made a special appeal to work-girls whose means compel them to come to town by the early trains, and who desire a place of rest and shelter before their warehouses and offices open. Reading and sewing are permitted.

To show how deeply the kind thought of the Rector is appreciated it should be mentioned that, in the [illegible] of the matter of [illegible], when [illegible] the very [illegible] the attendance [illegible] about 50 per [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] with the [illegible] Company,—the rector is their chaplain—and they [illegible] given £50 towards the fund for repairs.

2,500,000 HOUSES TO BE BUILT

Government Scheme to Extend Over 15 Years: "A Great Revolution"

"We are on the eve of a tremendous proposal by the Government," declared Mr. Coppock, general secretary of the National Federation of Building Trades Operatives, in speaking of the Government's housing proposals at a conference on housing held at Miss Maude Royden's Centre, the Guildhouse, Eccleston-square.

The Government, said Mr. Coppock, had devised ways and means to deal with the housing problem, and these would be submitted to the House in the coming week.

If contented workers were required they must be well housed and fed and given an interest in industry. Men could not be manufactured on the mass production like Ford cars. Despite what had been said about the Addison house, it was the best that was ever built for the working-classes in this country.

"But," he added, "the ones we are going to build will be better."

On the matter of dilution, Mr. Coppock said it was impossible to train a man to any of the craft after he had got beyond a certain age. Any augmentation must come from boys from 18 to 20 years of age. But in return for training these they demanded a guarantee of employment for some years, and he thought he could say that the guarantee would be fulfilled for a period of at least 15 years, provided the Opposition in Parliament agreed.

"The programme we have set out," added Mr. Coppock, "is 2,500,000 houses in a period of 15 years, which is 500,000 less than we anticipate being able to do. The people tackling it are going the right way about it. Industry is prepared to use every effort to do this work. It is possible we are on the eve of one of the greatest revolutions in Great Britain."

At the close of the speech, Mr. William Woodward, an architect, asked Mr. Coppock, who had claimed to be a bricklayer, when he laid his last brick.

Mr. Coppock: In 1911, in the good old days.

Mr. W. Arlidge: How many bricks did you lay in 1911?

Miss Maude Royden (the Chairman), interposing: The question is neither intelligent nor courteous, and I disallow it.

Mr. Woodward and Mr. Arlige then left the meeting.

SOME "OLD WIVES'" REMEDIES

By a Doctor.

Almost every year I add a new "queer remedy" to the list I have collected during my professional life.

The other day, for example, I found a child limping about, and on inquiring the reason was told that it had slices of onion between the soles of its feet and its stockings. The object was "to ward off the whooping cough" which is prevalent just now.

Garlic, of course, is a valuable drug in whooping-cough, but I confess I can't see how the sliced onion can affect anything.

Last summer I met an old man who declared positively that he had cured himself of rheumatism by getting stung by bees. He deliberately invited the insects to attack him. That remedy, of course, is well enough known; but so far as I know no scientific basis for it has ever been discovered. At the same time I do not wish to dogmatise.

Years ago I heard an old woman, with a local reputation as a witch, declare that whooping-cough was a more dangerous disease when it attacked a girl than when it attacked a boy. At the time I thought she was merely talking. But the figures of the Registrar-General of England and Wales confirm her opinion year after year.

The queerest remedy I ever saw was a triple strand of ordinary sewing cotton wound round an old man's naked waist. It had cured him—or so he said—of lumbago. Nor could I induce him to remove it. He told me, too, that a double or a single strand was useless for the purpose.

Quite intelligent people use these queer remedies. I have found, though they take them, as a rule, on the [illegible]ly, to avoid being laugh[illegible] [illegible]ce met a woman docto[illegible] "anti-rheumatic" [illegible] she had [illegible] according to the pres[illegible] country jeweller.

I'm afraid most of us l[illegible] guilty love of magic [illegible] scientific we may believe [illegible] to be.

LONDON'S "EMBRACE"

Sir Ian Hamilton on a "Hopeless Attachment"

"If I were asked why I [illegible] emigrate," said Ge[illegible] Hamilton to the Brit[illegible] Club at Penge "I would l[illegible] to reply, 'I simply can't d[illegible] cause of my hopeless [illegible] to London.' London [illegible] of you as an octopus g[illegible] periwinkle, and, ones you are [illegible] there is nothing that will free you from that embrace—not tax collectors, not midnight cats, not officers playing barrel organs, not even ground rents or strap-hanging."

Sir Ian declared that he should be the one great authority on emigration in the Kingdom, as he had visited every hole and corner of the Empire as Inspector-General of Overseas Forces.

His experience was that the healthiest children, with rosiest cheeks, most resembling Kentish children in the Dominions were to be found in the South Island of New Zealand, and in Vancouver Island, on the Pacific Coast of Canada.

Those were the places he would advise married couples to make for, because perfect energy and perfect health were worth a great deal more than rubies.

PROHIBITIONS

Smoking in America

The young American [illegible]ho has just been expelled [illegible] because she insisted on smoki[illegible] only one instance of the att[illegible] of the great A[illegible] towards this all-in[illegible]. Recently the appoi[illegible] a teacher was held in abeyance for the same reason. Another teacher bought a motor in order to get far enough away from her school to be able to smoke. In the [illegible] clubs the well-known restr[illegible] still holds that women ma[illegible] smoke there. Hotel managers take it upon themselves to interfere if women smoke in public, and at one hotel all smoking is prohibited on the ground that "Vermont does not like it, and what is good enough for Vermont is good enough for everybody else." In the trains the conductor practically refuses to let women sit in the smoking-cars. This is partly, no doubt, to prevent the men from being overcrowded, but it is also considered not quite the [illegible] for ladies to sit in smoki[illegible] cars. Smoking, in short, is still a [illegible] moral question in the [illegible] which first [illegible] Europe with tobacco. A[illegible] a grave moral question, [illegible] plied with greater ri[illegible] women than to men, i[illegible] make it even graver [illegible] more moral.

The result is, of cou[illegible] is still either very d[illegible] smart to smoke, or it [illegible] prehensible. It makes [illegible] deal of exaggeration [illegible] American women insis[illegible] ing in public, where [illegible] probably not smoke ot[illegible] only to register a prot[illegible] male prejudice. And s[illegible] der protest undoubtedly [illegible] attract too much attention, and therefore to become either very smart or very f[illegible]. It is still possible to be fast in America, and there is no doubt that [illegible] either via smoke or [illegible] possesses considerable attractions for the youngest of all generations. In some ways, of course, a country of prohibitions is much more amusing to live in [illegible] which individual [illegible] It remains young for one [illegible] the prohibitionists themselves [illegible] ing up the burden of age, an[illegible] sponsibility. It provides the sense of adventure which used to come from defying nurse in the nursery. And as smoking does not matter very much one way or ano[illegible] is given a zest which the older countries have completely [illegible] ten, and which is only to be [illegible] captured in the land of liberty and prohibition.—"Manchester Guardian."

PAPINI AND HIS BOOK

Notes of a Sermon Preached by the Rev. C. E. Darwent in Union Church, Tientsin, on Saturday evening, March 30

Text: Ezekiel XXVII. 1 & 2. "He set me down in the midst the valley; and it was full of bones; and, behold, there were very many, and, lo, they were very dry."

This chapter refers to the religious condition of the Jewish nation in the time of Ezekiel, and has become the most famous chapter in this most wonderful book, because we in our day have some remnants of conscience left, and we recognize that Ezekiel has hit us all very hard indeed. It has proved the most wonderful mirror ever constructed; it is so well furnished that we can all see our own faces reflected in it. To a large extent we, it is commonly complained, are still in this valley, where there are bones, "and behold they are very many, and, lo, they are very dry." The change of the past to the present tense in the version of the text, that I have given, is according to the popular judgment, true, the bones "are very dry."

I am using these words of Ezekiel, in order to cast light on the popularity of a recently written book, by one, Papini, on the Life of Jesus Christ, our Lord. As I have said, there is a general wail over the want of life in the church of Christ, for that is the complaint. It is complained that Christianity itself is dry, in want of the mysterious thing that we call life, the life of God in it, and in us who profess it. According to much of what one hears, the whole of the church and its institutions and agencies are in the condition of North China at the present time, utterly dry, for we have not had a drop of rain for near six months. Unless my memory deceives me there was a Conference of a certain Church held at Shanghai a little time ago. A paper was read, which made me rather sad, for it seemed to be a general admission of the truth of the charge of dryness, like these bones. It was admitted that men stay away from church. I was reminded of the story of a tourist in Scotland. Passing through a village he met a labourer, and pointing to the British Church and the United Free Church, asked the man, which of the two churches he attended. The answer he got was, "Weel, its the auld kirk I stays away frae." So many are connected with churches, but stay away from them. I gathered from this, as I have gathered from other similar papers, that our church services are considered dry, like these bones.

The Hungry Sheep Look up.

Then there are our sermons. If I remember rightly, this paper had this sentence in it, or one to this effect, "The less said about our sermons the better." Truly a dreadful utterance, if Paul was right, as I believe he was, when he said, that we are not "sent to baptize, but to preach the Gospel." It means, if true, either that we have been sent to preach a thing called the Gospel, which is hopelessly dry in itself, or it means that we have made a hopeless mess in our efforts to commend a thing full of life and interest. The complaint is not that sermons are long. Spurgeon's were long, but yet, as he once said, "no one had ever been able to build a chapel big enough to hold all the people who wanted to hear him at the same time." People do not object to length, if sermons are not dry. You can be short and dry, as this story shows. A newly-ordained clergyman asked Douglas Jerrold to hear his first sermon. Jerrold went and heard it and the preacher said, when the ordeal was over, "I was short, for I didn't want to be tedious." "But you were tedious," said Jerrold. One can be short and dry. That the dryness of sermons has become proverbial is seen in the fact that the producers of them, alas, often attempt witticisms at their expense, as in the story of the meeting called at the students of a theological college to send a resolution to the authorities on the damp state of the walls of the studies. One solution of the difficulty was suggested, that the senior student should paper the walls with his sermons. Then one need hardly spend much time in showing that the common idea of theology and theological studies and of theological books is that they are all hopelessly dry. Public libraries hardly purchase any, nor are any asked for. The reason commonly given for the absence of the working classes from churches of all kinds at home is that the masses have the idea that the services in the churches are tedious and dry. If they thought them interesting, they would surely attend, as they do the picture palaces.

Pot and Kettle.

Now, in regard to all this general accusation of dryness in the religious world, the first thing to be said is this. Other things can be a valley of dry bones as well as religion. We may as well notice that first of all. That seems to be forgotten. Man, indeed, has a remarkable faculty for making the finest works of God and man dry and uninteresting. Man can be so dull and incapable of feeling the vital force of a great thing, that he pronounces it dry. Music is a grand thing, but I have been to some dry bone concerts in my time. So have we all. There is no science, if it is a science, more crucially important than economics; yet Thomas Carlyle, who knew what is what, called it "The dismal science." Not only theological professors can be dry, but all professors. I have known a professor of astronomy, who had the whole of the marvels of the heavens to discourse on, do it so badly as to be as dry as a chip. And the purport of these illustrations that I am giving is to show that if mighty and glorious subjects are said to be dry, it is not their fault but the fault of the human medium by whom they are expounded and the fault of the people who listen or read. And often enough the bones that are very dry to one man are clothed with living flesh to another.

The Great Attraction.

And now, we will come to the book, that I have named. Not so long ago, all the people who had so much to say about the dryness of the Christian faith and life and church had a shock. A "Life of Christ" appeared in Italy that became the sensation of the day. Edition after edition appeared. They were snapped up at once. It was soon translated into other languages, English among them. It has been eagerly read everywhere. Some of us remember the sensation caused by the story called "The Mystery of a Hansom Cab," and "Mr. Brown of New York," and "Helen's Babies." It has had a similar great run. Publishers and author and readers have all been happy. It seems incredible that a new Life of Christ should have such a run. There are so many and such excellent ones; Canon Farrar's, Geikie's, David Smith's and others. Then there are the original and incomparable Lives, which we call Gospels, and which are sold by the million by the Bible Societies. Yet there it is; Papini's "Life" vies with popular novels in circulation.

What then is the conclusion to be drawn from the success of Papini's "Life of Christ"? This, that it is all nonsense to talk of the dryness of the Gospel. If the world thinks there is no interest and life in it, then it must be our fault. Here is a book that tells a story that must be familiar to us all; a story that has been told and preached and written about and made the subject of great paintings that are familiar to all, yet it is read in this new book, as if the hero of it were a great man, who died only yesterday. Here is Papini on Judas; "Only two creatures in the world knew the secret of Judas, Christ and the traitor himself. Sixty generations of Christians have racked their brains over Judas, yet he remains incomprehensible. And this of Capernaum; Men of finance had settled there for gain, like flies on rotten pears." And this on the disciples; "A great man creates great men: David his "mighty men;" Arthur his knights; Napoleon his marshals, and Jesus His disciples."

The Fool Hath Said in His Heart.

Now, as to the church, and as to the Gospel and all that we mean by Christianity being a "valley of dry bones." It shows almost incredible shallowness and want of observation to say such a thing. Begin with the day in which we live. If there is anything that stares one in the face, it is that in one way or other the Gospel is the one live thing of the day. It is at the root of the great part of our "problems;" it is quoted in support of theories of economics and politics and against them. The point is that no one thinks it can be left out. For that is the remarkable thing about Jesus Christ. No one can leave Him entirely out of consideration for any considerable time. There are the people who have no faith in Him at all, who have "given up Christianity." You would think, that as ours are free countries, these people would let those who want to be Christians alone; that they would say, "Well, let them worship Christ if they like, they can do no harm." But it is not so. They show a bitterness to Christ and Christianity that they do not show to Buddhism or any other faith. They rather boom these others as picturesque. And the reason is this; that you cannot treat Christianity as a matter of mere antiquarian interest as you can other religions and philosophies. That is a remarkable fact, but it is one. You can study the beliefs of Socrates, Plato, Confucius and all these worthies, and you can praise them, and write them up, and write a poem about one of them and call it "The Light of Asia," without ever feeling under the lightest obligation to be Buddhist, a Platonist or anything else.

The Hound of Heaven.

But not so with Jesus Christ. He is a living problem, not a dead one. "You can study all the others," as Dr. Simon, my old theological tutor, used to say, "as you can study old boots, or any old antiquarian subject." Not so with Christ. If you praise Him, or admit He lived and did and said the things accredited to Him or even a tenth of them, then the question bobs up at once, "What are you going to do about Him? If He is that, why don't you obey Him? Why not follow Him? Jesus Christ always somehow gets some hold of the conscience. He is never a mere curiosity. No. I often think of the story of an American traveller in Rome on this matter of the grip Christ has on the conscience. His companions noticed that this traveller once took off his hat, as the party passed a bust of the old god Jupiter lying on the ground. One of them said, "Whatever made you take off your hat to that old thing?" "Oh!" he said, "One never knows but what there may be something in those old religions, and it is best to be on the safe side." A man like Huxley, good man as he was, was always harking back to Christianity; giving reasons why he had given it up. Why couldn't he be done with it once for all? But men cannot. They make one think that they fear "there is something in it" after all. Christ is so great, so commanding a figure, so permanent a figure in the life of every age since He lived, that He cannot be summarily dismissed. No. They can say what they like, but it is still true, that the Gospel is "a savour of life unto life or of death unto death." It is so. He is not dead like Plato. He "ever liveth," and we know it. When a man gives up Christ, he knows that he has done a thing, fateful, final, decisive for his destiny. It is not like changing his Chinese teacher. O dear, No.

Not Peace but a Sword.

Look round to-day, and you find, that Christianity is the crux in several countries. There is Ireland. It is not race that divides the north from the south. It is that north and south take different views of many elements in the Gospel. What is the use of saying that a religion is dry, when it can divide a country as it does Ireland? There is Russia. If all or a half of the tales one reads are true, the present rulers of Russia hate the Gospel. One might have thought that they would have said, "You peasants and bishops, can stick to your faith if you like, as long as you obey our law." But it is not so. There seems to have been a bitter persecution, and hundreds have died for their faith in Christ, as readily as the first Christians did. Christ is so great, that, if people think about Him at all, they are either for Him or against Him, as He said they would be. There are the United States of America. The Americans are a busy and shrewd people. They pride themselves on not wasting time. Yet here is their country split almost in two over the Fundamentalist and Modernist controversy. Able editors, who have a fine nose for what will take the public, give it front page position. Clearly in the States the Gospel is not a "valley of dry bones." No one can say of the doctrines of the Virgin Birth, of Bibical Inspiration, of the Lord's death for sin, and His rising physically from the dead, "The States are full of bones, and, behold they are very many, and; lo, they are very dry." Indeed not. Here is, indeed, a remarkable thing, a great nation of 110,000,000 of educated people being compelled to answer the old, old, and eternally vital question, "What think ye of Christ?"

The Only True Rest.

We might pass in review the history of the Christian Church, and ask any candid mind whether that has been a "valley of dry bones." There is the story in the "Acts of Apostles." That was hardly dry for the apostles. As it has been wittily said, the finest tribute ever given to two unknown men is that given to Aristarchus and Gaius, that "they were PAUL'S companions in travel." You had to be a man to go through it preaching Christ with PAUL; they had far from a dry time, "in perils oft," and no press to take up their case. There was the conversion of the Germanic tribes by Boniface and other heroes of Christ. They did not have a dry time. Christianity has kept the world alive and compelled it to think of the greatest things, as at the time of the Reformation. No one who took part in that gigantic debate, on one side or the other, found himself bored by the DRYNESS of it. No. One thing there is, that cannot be said of the Gospel, that it is a dry bone. Indeed not. It has always been like its divine Lord. They said, "Who is this?" And there is something about Him and His message, and His personality, and His claims, and in the prodigious place He occupies in the world to-day, that will let the world have no rest until it finds its true, rest in Him.

IMPRESSIONS OF CHINA

Strong Men

By George E. Sokolsky.

Every once in a while some foreign authority on Chinese politics talks about a strong man. All of China's woes would cease were there but a man of nerve and muscle, of character and force, of despotic disposition and popular approval, who would take the helm and steer the ship. So say these authorities. Yet no such man appears on the horizon. Wu Pei-fu, Chang Tso-lin, Chi Hsieh-yuan, Feng Yu-hsiang, Sun Yat-sen, Tuan Chi-jui—where are the strong men of China? The answer perhaps is that China needs not a strong men but a virile generation of men, that China requires not a despotism in government but an articulate public interest, that the loyalty to family be—changed into a loyalty to nation. And when these things come, shall we not criticise those who are to the fore as too aggressive, as wanting in civility and as misunderstanding our motives? When there is progress, there is always dissatisfaction. The Hottentots are probably the most satisfied people on earth.

History Repeats.

"The commercial solvency of the country however is one thing and the financial solvency of the government another."—Customs Returns, 1882.

"It may be confidently asserted that China meets the whole of her obligations without any depletion of her currency, and that the Chinese buy no imports except such as can be obtained in exchange for exports. No doubt the government is hard pressed for funds, but the country grows wealthier every year.—Customs Returns, 1898.

Boxer Indemnities.

Everyone seems to have a plan for spending the Boxer Indemnity money which the United States Congress has agreed to return to China. Some would spend it for Huai River Conservancy so that 10,000,000 people may not starve. They say that they can get enough rice out of the valley to feed every Chinese in the country two months' rations of rice. They also say that ricsha coolies, bandits, beggars and other wretches come from the Kiangpei district, impoverished by the uncontrolled activities of the Huai and its affluents. Another would spend it to develop Tsing Hua College into a great research university. Still another would establish schools in China taught by Americans. Some would use it to pay China's unpaid bills to American merchants and firms. None seem to advocate using it to continue educating experts in jazz and the use of the choice phraseology of American slang.

Sun Hung-yi.

For years he withstood the call of Peking. He sat in his coolie house in Shanghai an outcast seeking for a way to unite the antagonists of Peking into a working political party. Sometimes he wandered southward to help the Great Sun in keeping China disunited. Other times he, the Small Sun, was disunited from the greater. He knew the inner workings of every provincial yamen. Often he arranged the inner workings. He knew long before Hsu Hsih-chang did, that the writer of odes would cease to be President, because he had laboured to bring that day about. His words went further than those of many of the great Tuchuns, for people will listen to the words of one who although he might have wallowed in the trough of Peking corruption, chooses voluntarily poverty, at times starvation. He has travelled to every Yangtze capital. He has talked to every Yangtze Tuchun. He has spent a fortmight of so with the Warlord at Loyang, where his most intimate friend has long been chief political adviser. They say in Peking that were he desirous, he could be Premier. But perhaps he will return to his native village to read the classics and collect coins.

Logic.

Chauffeur.—Why do you dismiss me?

Foreigner.—Your services are worthless. You cannot drive a car. You will surely kill someone if you continue driving. You know nothing about a car. You are stupid.

Chauffeur.—The foreigner is hard-hearted.

Foreigner.—But don't you understand? If you drive a car, you will surely kill a man, probably a fellow-country man. Also you will ruin the car. They should never have given you a licence.

Chauffeur.—If I knew as much as you want me to know, I would be a mandarin, not a chauffeur.

Foreigner.—But I pay you to drive and take care of a car.

Chauffeur.—The foreigner are hard-hearted. They have no mercy. Rice is dear.

THE International Women's Suffrage Alliance reports that the Governments of Norway, Sweden and Denmark are bringing before their respective Parliaments, Bills to give certain rights to women to retain their nationality on marriage to a foreigner. It is suggested that in order to avoid the difficulties caused by discrepancies in the laws of various countries, it is necessary that an International Conference should be called for the purpose of adopting an international convention on the subject.

IN opposition to the Ku Klux Klan, for which, until recently, he was "emperor," Mr. William Joseph Simmons has now incorporated at Atlanta, Georgia, the Order of the Hidden Hosts of Knights of the Flaming Sword. He announces that the new order will be "The largest detective agency in the world" whose members will bind themselves by the most solemn oath to supply to the police and President all knowledge they gather "of unlawful acts or un-American policies." Unlike the Ku Klux Klan Hidden Hosts will not wear masks, but their work will be "secret, and they will be ubiquitous" in their devotion "to pure American Protestant Gentile principles.

SHANGHAI—THE WONDER CITY OF ALL ASIA

II.—80's of Shanghai—An Inspiration to the Present Generation: The English Settlement and the French Concession: Personal Comment on Everyday Matters: Sound Advice for Upbuilding of the Port

Other Things that Strike One.

Now, let me see. I have "covered" Shanghai's cosmopolitanism, the "English" Settlement, the French Concession, the H. C. L. and H. R., and street pavements (the reader may smile, and tell me that this is merely my own mind and not in your columns). So let me say something about hotels and hotel rates, that I omitted to mention. Hotels, no doubt, are not what they were decidedly cheap. But there, again, improvement has been at work, and very few hotels are better than they were then, though the rates are also. But you are recommending the old days, because in the old days you could live cheaply in dollar and currency. It seems to me that in those days I was also in dollar and currency. It is true that in those days I was also in dollar and currency, but I was also in dollar and currency. I was also in dollar and currency. I was also in dollar and currency.

Shanghai's Principal Purchases.

It would be a fascinating study ... condense the figures of the port's ... and print percentages of cer... lines of trade in relation to the ...al. But it would be a herculean ...k, and when I had done it the Editor would not publish it, for probably the readers wouldn't read it. So I will improve the shining hour in other ways. At the same time I would like to pat the piece goods men on the back. Piece goods is the clinical thermometer, and piece goods men are—well, the abstract principle of Shanghai's commerce. Cotton piece goods of all sorts represent roughly 30 per cent. of the total import trade. Raw cotton and cotton yarn generally run to about a million and three quarters (haikwan taels)—in 1922, Hk. Tls. 1,632,000—to feed the 2...0 spindles that are being operated in China (while China, as ... readers will of course know, ranks third among cotton-producing countries in the world). Metals —... cobbles and shorts, plate ..., old iron, galvanized sheets ...r all sorts of other metal sundries —...erally run into the 20 million ... in Customs value. British and American metals men have for some time been faced with strong German and Continental competition, of course.

The remarkable growth of machinery coming into this market is naturally indicative of great industrial expansion. In 1921 machinery imported—very largely textile machinery, and this applies also to 192...—was valued at roughly 33 million taels, which was nearly maintained in 1922. In that year (to repeat the latest year for which I have figures) Great Britain beat all comers with 45 per cent.; then followed U.S.A. (25), Germany (16), and other supplying countries shared the rest.

Other important branches of the import trade of Shanghai include electrical materials and fittings, motor cars (with America in undisputed lead), analine dyes (which trade has reverted to the Germans), ker... oil, timber, paper, wines and spirits, cereals and flour, cigarettes, while an absolutely formidable list of sundries includes practically everything that Western factories produce.

Comment—Wise or Otherwise.

The above may be enlightening, or it may not be. I repeat that it is not easy to give a true bird's-eye view of a great port's general import trade in the space of a single article.

But before I close I would like to remark on the changed trading character of Shanghai during the past decade or so. On the foreign side: Many more firms have come into existence, being balanced some ... say by those who have gone ou... whose collapse in many inst... is directly traceable to a lack of appreciation of the natural difficulties of trading in China among the Chinese. Successfully to build up a constructive import trade in China, the foreigner should be possessed of capital, experienced knowledge and a temporamental fitness to deal with the people, an infinite ... of patience, great natural in... ...m to caution, and a genial ... ...sibility to meet conditions that ... never reckoned upon meeting. Many commercial funerals, mostly among American firms, have been witnessed, the cause of death being due to one or more of the causes I quote. The foreign trader was "shy" of one or more of the essential factors making for prosperous and abiding connexion with the Chinese. Therefore, I think it should be said, and it cannot be said too strongly or too often, that it does not by any means follow that a man who has been successful in any line of business at Home—maskee what country he comes from—must automatically succeed here.

Then on the Chinese side: I have no space to go into details here, but I will some day write up the differences that I notice in a period of 20 years. Let me say, however, that old customs are fast dying. There is a great deal of awful rot talked round the world regarding the Chinese as a whole. Thank God there are a few of the old type left, than whom there are none better, but for the essentially "new" type of Chinese businessmen who has dropped from the sky or risen up out of the earth like mushrooms during the last decade or so, one cannot write with enthusism. They are a menace to their country's commerce.

The Chinese have changed, and none of them more than those who are engaged in the business of the port, with whom foreigners are largely brought into touch. Shanghai is a great commercial city where old customs are fast giving way to new and less attractive customs, an inevitability in the march of competition which is an inherent economic factor in the world to-day.

It cannot, therefore, be said that the Shanghai importer's lot is always a serene and happy one.

THE LATE BISHOP POZZONI

Life Story of a Great Roman Catholic Ecclesiastic in China

A full and interesting account of the career of the Right Rev. D. Pozzoni, Bishop of Tavia and Vicar-Apostolic of Hongkong, who passed away at Hongkong on February 20, appears in the current number of "The Rock," the Hongkong Roman Catholic monthly journal, and reveals a singularly fine character and a most devoted and successful worker in the mission field.

Dr. Pozzoni, says this account, was born at Padermo d'Adda, in the province of Como, Milan Diocese, on December 22, 1861. He studied for the priesthood in the celebrated Foreign Missions Seminary of Milan, where he had a brilliant scholastic career, distinguishing himself especially in mathematics. The present Holy Father, Pope Pius XI, was one of his professors and never forgot his old pupil. Ordained in Milan on March 1, 1885, Dr. Pozzoni arrived in Hongkong on December 19 of the same year. During the following 20 years he laboured as a missionary in the interior. almost entirely among the Hakkas. In those days there were very few priests in this Vicarate and Father Pozzoni had to care for the three large districts of Nam Tau (now known as Po On), Kuai Shin (now, Wei Yung), and Hoifung.

Disguised as Chinese.

Anti-foreign feeling was then strong and Father Pozzoni was obliged to go about disguised as a Chinese, queue and all. Even in such a disguise he was unable to enter Waichow city except under the cover of night. He was known throughout the Mission as a a very zealous missionary, who never considered either pain or fatigue when duty or charity called him to action. It is remembered, for instance, that on one occasion he did not hesitate to go from Saikung right across Mirs Bay at night in a small sampan in order that no time should be lost in reaching one of his Chinese catechists who had been suddenly taken ill. Times without number he undertook long perilous journeys of three or four days just to succour some poor Christian in his sickness and to give him the last Sacraments of the Church: journeys, by night as well as by day, on which, on many occasions, it was with difficulty that he succeeded in persuading a Chinese servant to accompany him. He was fearless in all dangers of the Mission field. Once at Tsiung Yen Ha, in the Po On district, a dying Christian was awaiting his coming, but as all his relatives were strongly opposed to Christianity they refused to allow Father Pozzoni to visit him. They even took the sick man into the village common house and mounted a guard over him, declaring that they would kill the priest if he dared to approach. Father Pozzoni concealed himself in the vicinity until he was informed that the guardsmen were at their common meal. He then stole alone and unobserved into the house and succeeded in reaching the bedside of the dying man, administering to him the last Sacraments and escaping unhurt.

Brave Deed in Boxer Days.

On another occasion, during the Boxer troubles, although warned by Mgr. Chausse, Vicar-Apostolic of Canton, not to venture on the East River (whence all the Missionaries had been forced to retire after the Mission residence at Shek Lung had been burned down and the local missionary, Father Montanar, had escaped death only by hiding in a sugar-cane field) Father Pozzoni was unable to resist the desire to visit his Christians in Waichow city. Taking all responsibility on himself he went alone up the river to Waichow, where, on his arrival, he was immediately surrounded by a hostile crowd who asked how he dared to come there, many shouting "kill the foreign devil!" Father Pozzoni asked to be allowed to speak. "I am Father Su," he said (that was his Chinese name), "and I am well known among you. I have always tried to do good to everybody and you know it. Now who wants to kill me? Do you want to kill me?" (turning to one of the crowd). "Not I, surely," this one answered. "And you (turning to another) do you want to kill me?" "Not I, surely." "Then I am safe among my good people, am I not?" All laughed and praised him for his courage, and he remained in the city.

Father Pozzoni always lived the simple life of the very poor: indeed it frequently happened that European travellers calling at his station in the interior expressed surprise at his way of living, which was that of the poorest Chinese peasant. Whatever funds were placed at his disposal were expended in promoting missionary work, in chapels and schools, in catechists and teachers. The extension of God's Kingdom was the one end which he always kept in view: it was for that he had left home and country and all the rich prospects which had awaited him there. The extent of the success of his missionary labours can be gauged by the fact that, whereas when he first went on the Mission the Christians were but a few thousands, with four priests, the numbers had increased to 14,000 when he was consecrated Bishop: now the total is over 27,000, under the spiritual care of about 20 priests.

On the death of Mgr. Piazzoli in 1905, Father Pozzoni was elected Bishop, and was consecrated in the Cathedral of the Immaculate Conception, Hongkong, on Sunday. October 1, 1905. During the 18 years of his Episcopate Dr. Pozzoni never for a moment ceased to live up to that grand ideal of humble and faithful service which he had set for himself in the early days of his missionary labours. He was a man of remarkable piety, and inspired others with his devotion.

COMMANDERS IN THE MAKING

Or the Cruise of the Hwah Jah

From the "China Illustrated Review"

I.

It was the good ship Hwah Jah and she sailed the Eastern seas,
As a training ship for China's young cadets.
Who each thought himself a Rajah, as he sniffed the salty breeze
With the appetite that ocean soon begets.
There was Wong and there was Liu, Chang and Zee and Sun and Chiu:
There were Li's and Lo's and Ling's and sev'ral Fats.
And they sang in happy vein, as they scanned the placid main,
(With a glance at their immaculate grey spats).

Oh, we'll sail the world around: we shall camp on foreign ground.
We'll see London, Berlin, Madrid and Paree.
We may even glimpse the Turk: but we'll never, never work,
Since, in future, all commanders we're to be.

II.

They had passed a stormy week. My word, how that ship could leak!
The instructors were the ones to patch it up.
Who besought, without avail, some assistance. All the pale Future Nelsons were too ill even to sup.
There was Wong and there was Liu, Chang and Zee and Sun and Chiu:
There were Li's and Lo's and Ling's and sev'ral Fats.
Sang in accents quite forlorn as they heard the drear fog-horn.
(And adjusted life-preservers to their spats).

Though the sky be black as ink and the ship about to sink,
We shall do naught that would lower dignity.
To avoid dangers that lurk, we're not called upon to work,
Since, in future, all commanders we're to be.

III.

When the bunker coal gave out, they preserved a courage stout
As they watched the captain split up kindling wood.
When besought that they'd assist, each appeal they would resist:
But encouraged their instructors with "That's good!"
There was Wong and there was Liu, Chang and Zee and Sun and Chiu:
There was Li's and Lo's and Ling's and sev'ral Fats.
Raised once more a happy song with the boilers strong,
(And they'd found they still possessed their precious spats).

Oh, we'll sail the world around, if we do not run aground.
Guatemala and the Argentine we'll see.
Still we'll regularly burk any tendency to work,
Since, in future, all commanders we're to be.

VI.

When at length they got ashore after thirty days or more
Of disaster and of mishap on the deep,
Scarce their feet had touched the land, they proceeded, as a band,
To the army without losing any sleep.
There was Wonfi and there was Liu, Chang and Zee and Sun and Chiu:
There were Li's and Lo's and Ling's and sev'ral Fats:
And they sang, as they salaamed to the General (who was charmed
As he gazed on their immaculate gray spats).

Hai yah! Here, upon the ground, we shall henceforth each be found.
Let the foreign devils dominate the sea.
Here we'll never need to toil: yet receive our share of spoil.
Since, in future, all commanders we're to be.

BOOK NOTES AND NEWS

When Lord Darling's volume entitled "On the Oxford Circuit and other Verses" appeared in July, 1909, a second edition was called for in the same month. Hitherto his busy life has prevented the appearance of a new edition, but in the leisure of his retirement he has been persuaded to prepare a third edition, and this will shortly be published by Mr. Murray. The book will contain all the old poems, and a nearly equal number of new ones—grave and gay, as becomes the author of "Seria Ludo."

The boom in Herman Melville is not so lively as it was a year ago, when an enterprising English critic discovered that there was a story called "Moby Dick." It still holds a certain sway, however, and it may get a little impetus from the fact that a hitherto unpublished novel by Melville is appearing with Constable, "Billy Budd." He was an ordinary seaman of about the time of Nelson, and we get a very complete portrait of him as a sailor, as a man, and as a fellow to whom the life adventurous came in full measure.

Floods of tears have flowed in all countries over the pathetic death of Dumas fils' heroine, "the Lady of the Camelias." Who could refuse his tears when Sarah Bernhardt was calling for them with her golden voice? And those who wept for her were, whether they knew it or not, weeping for a real woman, who once had Paris at her feet. Marguerite Gautier, as Dumas tells us in his preface to the play, was Alphonsine Plessis, who took the liberty of calling herself Marie Duplessis because that name had a more aristocratic ring. That sale of her effects, with which the novel opens, was a real Parisian event. Copies of the catalogue still exist; and there is a monument to her memory in a Montmartre cemetery. Men and women of sentiment laid flowers on it only a few weeks ago, on the occasion of the one hundredth anniversary of her birth.

Count Leon L. Tolstoi, the son who sympathized with his father to the extent of accepting his doctrines and endeavouring to work them out in practice, has written a work called "The Truth About my Father" which promises to throw much light upon, and to clear up several doubts as to the purposes and character of one of the world's greatest men. The book, which is to come from Mr. Murray, will contain many intimate revelations as to Tolstoi's aspirations and achievements, his relations with his wife, his family life, friends, studies, his discussions and his disagreements.

We have been thinking of Singapore in terms of the great naval establishment which it has been proposed to create there. A Chinese, who is a graduate and LL.D. of Cambridge, Mr. Song Ong-siang, thinks of it differently in a book that John Murray has published, "One Hundred Years' History of the Chinese in Singapore, 1819-1919." It is a chronological history, beginning with the foundation of the Chinese Settlement and coming down to our own day. It gives sketches of the lives, pursuits, activities and fortunes of the Chinese residents in Singapore, and generally has a human and interesting story to tell.

Last month witnessed the celebrations of the centenary of the death of Byron and, very appropriately, Mr. Murray announced the immediate publication of Mr. Harold Spender's book on "Byron and Greece." This will contain a large amount of new material relating to Byron's life-long attachment to Greece, and will present for the first time a complete collection of the poet's writings on the subject of Greece, including all the racy letters he wrote from the Near East. It will also tell the full story of the burning of Byron's memoirs and there will be a special chapter dealing with the incident—which has not been fully described before—of the taking of the Greek Marbles from Athens by the Earl of Elgin which elicited the famous "Curse of Minerva."

"THE KING'S TREASURIES"

A hundred and fifteen volumes have now been issued in the compact and attractive "King's Treasuries" series, published by J. M. Dent and Sons. Under the editorship of Sir A. T. Quiller-Couch, the selections have been made with unimpeachable taste and discretion, and the latest volumes again go well beyond the stereotyped range of anthology. Who would not desire to add to his bookshelves such desirable "bedside books" as Mr. N. G. Brett-James's collection of "Modern Essays" (Birrell, Gosse, Belloc, Chesterton, etc.); or Mr. Belloc's brilliant essay in constructive imagination, "The Eye-Witness" (which deals with historical events from the point of view of a contemporary)? A volume of special interest is the set of "Plays Before Shakespeare," compiled by Mr. Evelyn Smith, which includes "The Pageant of Noah's Flood" and other moralities, and Lyly's "Campaspe" and Marlowe's "Dr. Faustus" as representing Shakespeare's immediate predecessors in comedy and tragedy. A collection of Norwegian tales from Hans Aanrud and half-a-dozen plays (suitable for school acting) by Constance d'Arcy Mackay, under the title of "The Beau of Bath" help to keep up the reputation of "The King's Treasuries" for getting off the beaten track.

Old friends are also to be found—"Bacon's Essays and Other Writings," "Some English Diarists," "Pages from the Latin Authors," and anthologies of Keats and Shelley and "Lighter Verse"—all very pleasant to handle and competently edited and annotated. The price is now reduced to 1s. 6d. a volume.

THE INDEFATIGABLE FARINGTON

Intimate Glimpses of Famous People.

The third volume of the Farington Diary (1804-1806), by Joseph Farington, R.A. (published by Messrs. Hutchinson, £1 1s.), gives us, among a great deal of matter of no great public interest, a number of more or less intimate glimpses of some of the people of the period: Nelson and Pitt, Sheridan and the Young Roscius, and Daniel Lambert, the Fat Man.

Farington tells us little new about Nelson's death at Trafalgar; but those who are interested not only in what comes out of the mouths of great men, but extend their curiosity to what goes in will no doubt be thrilled to know that while Nelson did not appear to be in very good health just before the action,

"He eat and drank with seeming appetite, but eat chiefly at dinner Macaroni, which showed that his appetite required some artificial stimulus."

There is here a fine contempt for foreign kickshaws, fit only to tempt the appetite that quailed before British beef and beer.

A still more spicy bit of gossip of the same sort reached Farington through Heath, the engraver, who, after dining with Sheridan, reported that:

> Sheridan drinks port wine out of large glasses, that he never tastes malt liquor, and drinks very little water, but at dinner drinks wine profusely, and afterwards continues to do the same all the time he sits in company. He fills his glass to the top, and does not sip it, but throws it down his throat at once. He drinks from three to six bottles a day.

After this, it is really not surprising to hear that Sheridan's appetite, too, needed tempting: that "he only picks bits or takes a grill," or that "his face is much disfigured by this mode of life, and his legs swell."

Nor is it surprising that Daniel Lambert, the big man, whom Farington saw at a house in Piccadilly, had a "heavy look" in his countenance—though, not, the diarist adds, an unhealthy one.

Lambert at that time was 36 years old and weighed more than 50st. He declared to Farington that his appetite was only a common one; but "on the whole his appearance gave me pain," which, as his legs and thighs were without form, being "rolls of flesh indented," and his feet hardly to be seen, is scarcely to be wondered at.

The Cost of Living.

We grumble to-day at the cost of living, and ruefully compare the butcher's book and the restaurant bill with those of 1914. They were doing the same thing in 1806.

Farington noted, on August 20 of that year, that when Nixon, R.A., came to visit him they talked, not of art, but of "the difference of Coffee House expences now compared with what they were in the year 1770." Then a meal at Slaughter's Coffee House, St. Martin's-lane, which included three mutton chops, potatoes and butter, bread and a pint of porter, cost only 1s. 2½d. Those good old days!

In 1806 a mere cut from the joint (lamb), a pint of porter, and a slice of bread, taken at the Percy Coffee House, Rathbone-place, Oxford-street, cost three and sevenpence!

There is, naturally, much talk of artists of the period; and Farington records his opinion that Turner's picture of The Battle of Trafalgar was "a very crude, unfinished performance, the figures miserably bad."

Such scraps are amusing when found, but they take a lot of finding; and one questions whether interest in the diary will survive the publication of the five more volumes projected.

LORD DARLING'S VERSES

"On the Oxford Circuit, and Other Verses." By Charles Darling (Lord Darling, of Langham). (Murray. 6s.)

Lord Darling's verses have had a vogue of their own for 30 (or is it 40?) years. They have always had the special attraction of the writer who knows his own metier to a nicety, never strays from it, and spares no effort to attain its highest qualities, (says the "Observer"). In the present volume we have a collection of vers de societe first published 15 years ago, and now replenished with some additions in a graver mood. These years have not been propitious to the lighter lyre. The careless rapture of the Edwardian prime has not returned, and our poets must be serious or nothing. The later numbers of Lord Darling touch the chords of strife and bereavement, but in Stoic mood. He is a Jack Point who can sting. The lines beginning, "Oh, spare our happy German homes!" are as finished in mordancy as anything in the "Anti-Jacobin," and those on the Hindenburg Line have the true genius of classic epigram.

There is no better criterion of taste than the power to parody without profanation. Lord Darling challenges it without scathe in such a piece as "The Flowers of New Forest":—

> Near Lyndhurst they spied thee—
> they cut thee, they dried thee—
> The flowers of the Forest are all > stolen away.

"On the Oxford Circuit" is worth the attention of all who have ever considered the intractability of the English hexameter: its slow beat just allows time for the fatal smile to break in, and Lord Darling's use of it convinces one more than ever of its function as the predestined servant of whimsicality. "Little endures—Have a cigarette?" is good modernity for aeyuan servare mentem. And when the book closes on a personal note, it is pithy, clear, and quaverless:—

> Mantle and stole laid by, and cap > of doom;
> Bereft, alone, I wear no ermine
> more;
> Nor judge—yet one Assize
> I, fearful, must attend.

THIS SAD OLD WORLD

"The Dream." By H. G. Wells. (Cape, 7s. 6d.)

Mr. Wells is once again giving the world a dressing-down — this "frowsy old germ-saturated world." He is once more scarifying its religion, its education, its tenacity of tradition, its disregard of science and its reluctance to organize itself. Once more does he attempt to demonstrate how cramping our code of sex is to choice spirits. It is a world of "muddle and wretchedness," and his story is "a story of love crossed, imaginations like flies that have fallen into gum, things withheld and things forbidden. And all for nothing. All for pride and spite."

All very sad, and yet a nice, bright book, illustrating Dr. Bain's remark that "Art is Nature freed from the painful." This evasion of depression is possibly aided by the author's new device for getting perspective. In a very recent romance he portrayed our frail humanity from the spy-hole of a fourth dimension. This time he takes us to a world two thousand years ahead, where someone dreams in an hour a whole twentieth-century existence and retells it to his companions. They are not deftly manoeuvred, these heirs of futurity, with their "bare, strong bodies," their freedom from sex-jealousy and their intellectual emancipation. So poorly are they dramatised that it is difficult, in following their dialogue, to "tell t'other from which." But they do help passively to dramatise Mr. Wells as a critic of existence and also to give the anodyne of detachement to his picture of squalor and entanglement.

It is the grim, lower middle-class under-world of "Tono-Bungay" and "Mr. Polly," traversed once more, with a heightening of selective vision, a better sense of character and a more subtle balance of narrative. It is a common objection to Mr. Wells's later novels that nearly all their figures elude the memory, and that more of the books themselves fade into leaflets of free-love propaganda. But one seems to discern a better expectation of life here in some of Henry Mortimer Smith's family circle. Not so much in his beautiful sister Fanny, who goes away to be a newspaper magnate's mistress and lives happily ever after, as in her overwrought mother, whose sense of the fitness of things is sincerely outraged when she finds that Fanny has not "reaped as she has sown." This poor mother, in whom Mr. Wells diagnoses a strong touch of vindictive trade unionism in morals, is a masterly portrait of human goodness warped by constriction, squeezed dry of imagination and generosity, and reduced to tough unlovely fibre. Nothing is spared in restraint or finish, and if she has not the sublimation of Mr. Hardy's women, there is the same effect of pity enhanced by detachment. The father, too, a struggling greengrocer, with his voluble interest in Providence and its "lessons," and his insecure commercial morality, stands well out in the round, as does Uncle John Julip, the dishonest head gardener, and Matilda Good, graduate in all the lore of London landladies.

Such part of the plot as hinges upon passion will have no surprises for the habitual reader of Mr. Wells, but all will enjoy the raciness of an iconoclasm that shows no staleness in what must be something like its twentieth innings. It is all but free from the blemishes of exaggeration, and rich in the varied resources of intellectual caricature. — The "Observer."

MR. BRETT YOUNG

"Woodsmoke." By F. Brett Young. (Collins. 7s. 6d.)

It is less by breaking new ground than by working over again familiar materials to which his hand is disciplined, that Mr. Brett Young has achieved this entertaining story. Entertainment is distinctly its impulse: there is no sense of creation as in those other African studies of "The Crescent Moon" and "Pilgrim's Rest." One of the figures—the neurotic Rawley—is repulsive enough and in a sense tragic, but since we know from the outset that the tragedy is to fall mainly upon his own head, that does not disturb the reader's serenity. And, talking of what is known from the outset, one would like to protest against a publisher's jacket whose picture takes the edge off the story's crisis by showing how that crisis is to be approached.

The attractive, but self-disciplined woman, the pitiful and half-demented husband, and the chilvalrous soldier—it is only the accomplished novelist who would venture to build his theme upon such a very conventional "triangle." But the treatment never becomes otiose, nor is interest slackened by recollection of the very similar situation in Mr. Masefield's "Captain Margaret." Mrs. Rawley, as the "tragic bride," is invested with poetry as well as charm: Captain Antrim, moving unconsciously under the stimulus of sex attraction, is true to the naivete of his type; and Rawley drees his weird with all dramatic propriety. The ghost business at the end is rather gratuitously sprung upon the reader—and ghosts that are not seen but smelt are a variety which ought to be sternly discouraged.

M. POINCARE'S PERSONALITY

M. POINCARE. A Biographical Portrait. By Sisley Huddleston. Fisher Unwin. 7s. 6d. net.

Mr. Huddleston's appreciation of M. Poincaré is judicious and well-informed. He has had exceptional opportunities for forming a judgment concerning the French statesman, for he has been [illegible] practically since the Armistice, and as a keen journalist, has [illegible] and often reported many of the conferences which have been held in a vain attempt to reach some understanding concerning reparations and inter-Allied indebtedness. And this book will be cordially welcomed by the friends of France in Great Britain, for it removes many misconceptions, the principal of which is that M. Poincaré, in his foreign policy, does not represent France, and also places in a sympathetic light a statesman who is not regarded very sympathetically in Great Britain. For M. Poincaré, unlike M. Clemenceau, lacks those qualities which have made "the Tiger" a popular and lovable figure in England. He is essentially a Puritan; and Englishmen, who have so many Puritans in their own country, prefer to find in a Frenchman panache and something akin to romance. There is something just a little forbidding in the austere, methodical, industrious Lorrainer. M. Poincaré is at the Quai d'Orsay by eight in the morning, and often stays there until eight in the evening. He regulates his day so precisely that his chauffeur gets his time-table written in M. Poincaré's own hand, from which there is never any deviation. He writes nearly all his own documents and has almost a schoolmaster's passion for the right word and the proper punctuation. When he goes to his Lorraine country house at Sampigny, he goes by train rather than by motor-car, for he says he can work better in the train. He is incorruptible and loaths nepotism. His speeches are in a way models of their kind, but he secures his main effects by what Mr. Huddleston calls his "damnable iteration." His memory is prodigious, and, having prepared a speech, he never departs from it. These are admirable qualities, but they do not turn him into a popular idol. However, M. Poincaré is probably at heart a very emotional man. Mr. Huddleston gives more than one instance, and we also remember the very touching itinerary he made in his beloved Lorraine when that which had been lost was again found.

Englishmen, particularly those who have come into touch with him officially, have two things to say about him—one a compliment, the other a criticism. They all admire his honesty—even those who detest him the most fiercely. M. Poincaré's honesty is one of the assets of Europe, and in the City of London to-day it is remarkable how those most opposed to his Ruhr policy are anxious for him to remain in power, until the reports of the Committees appointed by the Reparations Commission have been published and considered by the respective Governments. "We know where we are with him, at any rate," is official England's verdict concerning the French statesman. The criticism is that M. Poincaré, like so many lawyers, lacks that dramatic sense, that instinctive use of a gesture, that subtle appeal to the imagination, that gift of the unexpected touch, which differentiates the statesman from the official. There, again, leaps forth the Puritan's instinctive distrust of the heart and of an appeal to its emotions. Mr. Huddleston gives one instance. When the Germans ceased passive resistance, then there was the opportunity for a magnificent gesture. M. Clemenceau and M. Briand would have made it. But nothing happened. Again we might mention the issue of the famous Baldwin communique. If M. Poincaré had followed it up by determined negotiations and kept Mr. Boldwin a willing prisoner in Paris, we might have had a settlement last year. We have heard that a defect of the French lawyer is a tendency to temporise. Contrary to the general belief that M. Poincaré is a man of precipitate action, we seem to detect this failing in much of his policy. But, taking him as a whole, M. Poincaré is a man of whom France has every reason to be proud. He is a patriot first and a Puritan afterwards, and behind all his preciseness there burns the passion which has made his country great.—The "Morning Post."

presented "Modern Facts About Alcohol" pointing out the change in the world's attitude, as evidenced by the fact that prohibition exists already in Persia, Arabia, Turkey, and parts of Canada as well as in the U.S.A. Dr. Huntley stated that physicians no longer regarded alcohol valuable as a stimulant, as a sustaining factor or as a means of nourishment, since it simply afforded temporary relief by diminishing the sensibility of the brain and nervous system. The speaker said in part: "Sir Frederick Treves, for example, when with the British troops at the relief of Ladysmith, found that the alcohol drinkers were the first to drop. In expeditions to the North or South Poles the use of alchool is not permitted.

"Baron von Liebig, the German chemist, says that to get as much food value as five pounds of bread contain, one must drink 73 gallons of beer, moreover, vitamines are destroyed by fermentation. Wounds heal more slowly in a patient who takes alcohol and pneumonia patients who have been habitual drinkers have smaller chances of recovery.

"As a matter of revenue, the returns from liquor licenses are more than used up in supporting criminals who have become such through drink, inmates of insane asylums or other dependents. Employers recognize the extra efficiency of total abstainers. Out of 1,000 serious accidents 57 per cent. happen to habitual drinkers and 19 per cent. to the average worker. Prohibition is no more an enfringement of personal liberty than legislation against the use of drugs."

MUSIC AND HEALTH

Views of an Erstwhile Glasgow Student

Many Glasgow people are talking with interest of Dr. Agnes Savill's views concerning the effects of music on health and character.

Readers will be interested to know that Dr. Savill (who was before her marriage Dr. Agnes Blackadder) was a medical student in Glasgow over 20 years ago.

Glasgow is eminently a musical centre, and the consensus of opinion with regard to Dr. Savill's work is that music has undoubtedly a very real physical and psychical effect on health.

A Convert

Dr. Savill is a convert in that she started life with a distaste for music and what was almost a dislike of musicians. Reared in a typical Scottish and therefore austere environment where scales and musical exercises were a compulsory part of education, Dr. Savill, in common with many boys and girls, missed the spirit and meaning and message of music. Rhythm, expression, and even melody meant nothing to her except a confused medley of sound or "noise," so that, as doctor and musical expert, her present conclusions are irrefutable.

This is what she says:—"All music is a healing agency. The lighter forms uplift the mind from despondency; the greater music gives a message similar to what philosophy or religion imparts.

Music is comparable, she says, to the philosophical teaching of the late Sir Henry Jones, whose ... contained in many ... Caird Hall, which ... Glasgow, ...

Speaking recently in Moscow of the assault by a Chinese soldier on Mr. Campbell on the city wall of Peking, M. Trotzky, the eminent Bolshevist, declared that he "could not refrain from saying loudly, on behalf of all of us to this Peking soldier, 'Moscow's proletariat are with you heart and soul.'"

THE CABAL AGAINST WU PEI-FU

All the Profiteers of Republicanism United in Resisting the Strong Man: Only President Tsao Firmly on His Side

FROM RODNEY GILBERT.

Peking, May 23.

There has been much talk here lately of an organization among the militarists and the Tientsin politicians to eliminate Wu Pei-fu. The local press, both Chinese and foreign, has been making much of this as though it were news. Anyone who has followed Chinese affairs for the past five years knows that there is no leader in the Chihli party who has not been praying for Wu Pei-fu's downfall from the time that he first emerged from Hunan and obscurity. The Loyang chief has his shortcomings, as everyone knows, but he does have qualities which lift him above the vast majority of his official contemporaries in this country and which sometimes threaten to carry him into a position of supreme centralized authority. The establishment of any man in a position of supreme centralized authority in China would ill suit the purpose of the vast horde of persons who wear titles and medals in the name of the unhappy Republic. When Dr. Sun Yat-sen's death was rumoured throughout the North, the first idea that popped into every official mind was that Wu Pei-fu was master of China; and so it happens that the strenuous anti-Wu prapaganda which has been filling the papers came immediately on the heels of the report of Dr. Sun's demise.

The reported movement against Wu Pei-fu is not so much an anti-Wu movement as it is an anti-master movement. The politicians do not want a boss. The militarists do not want a commander-in-chief. None of them wants reunification if reunification means anything like Government. There is only one high political figure in all China who is willing to see Wu Pei-fu in supreme command, and this is because he is absolutely sure that no matter how high Wu rises he will always be one grade higher. This person is President Tsao Kun. It is for this same good reason that, while the President allows his relatives and subordinates to play about and amuse themselves and make great profit out of the maladministration of public affairs, when Wu Pei-fu awakes and takes an interest in some particular situation and says "No!", President Tsao Kun ignores the relatives and servants who farm him and echoes a most decided "No!"

Nanhing Tuchun's Misgivings.

It is said here that Ching Hsieh-yuan, Wang Cheng-ping and Feng Yu-hsiang have entered into an alliance to do away with Wu Pei-fu politically. There is probably much truth in the statement that this league is now particularly active. Their activity, however, is not prompted by a new thought but is inspired by panic. All of these worthies have reached a position in which they are entitled to cherish ambitions. If Wu Pei-fu, who appears to have a good many years to live, is going to be dictator of China and put all of them in their places, these gentlemen are going to enjoy none of the fruits of Li Yuan-hung's eviction and Tsao Kun's election, which have already cost them much in both cash and contumely.

In Chi Hsieh-yuan's domain Wu Pei-fu supports Tsai Cheng-hsun, Tuchun of Kiangsi (which is not to his credit) and runs the province to suit himself, although Chi is supposed to be Inspector General of Kiangsu, Anhui and Kiangsi. Wu also negotiates with Lu Yung-hsiang and other dangerous neighbours without consulting Chi. In Shantung, Wu has invaded the territory of Tsao Kun's former chief of staff, Hsiung Ping-chi, and has incommoded every Tientsin and Paoting man who is close to the President by putting his own agents over the returned German properties in which these worthies were interested through Chang Chih-tan, Chin Yun-peng and Pan Fu. In Fukien he still controls the situation in spite of Chih Hsieh-yuan and Tu Shih-kuei. And finally in Chihli party against Wu coincided commissioner in Tientsin under Wang Ch'eng-pin's nose and has very nearly succeeded in taking the latter's 23rd Division away from him. In spite of the fact that the cordially denounced Wang Yu-chih and Li An-ching, who are the closest of all persons to the President, are the pledged patrons of these various provincial chiefs who would like to do away with Wu Pei-fu, they are forced to observe that when Wu really wants something (as in the Tsingtao case) he gets it.

It must also be remarked, if the general public has not noticed it, that in China proper there are only two counties palatine in which Wu Pei-fu's writ does not run, namely Kuangtung and Yunnan. The revived activity of the combine in the Chihli partyt against Wu coincided with the report of Sun Yat-sen's death. If this had been verified China would have been united under Wu Pei-fu in less than a year and Manchuria would have come to a working understanding, not with Peking as dominated by the Tientsin and Paoting cliques, but with Tsao Kun as dominated by Wu Pei-fu. This same report of Dr. Sun's death accounts also, therefore, for the revived interest which both the Tientsin conspirators and Chang Tso-lin are showing in a peace agreement

The Party's Main Prop.

It is doubtful whether Chi Hsieh-yuan, Wang Cheng-ping and Feng Yu-hsiang really want to do away with Wu Pei-fu altogether. They know as well as the President does that Wu is the mainstay of the whole Chihli organization, that he commands respect because of his personal honesty, and that he can always be trusted to fight as none of them can fight when fighting is required. They know as well as Tsao Kun that if Wu Pei-fu were really eliminated they and the President would have either Tuan Chi-jui or Chang Tso-lin down upon them in a trice and that the Chihli party would be crushed like a persimmon under a cart wheel. They do not really want to lose Wu, but they are sincerely devoted to the task of dragging him down to their level. They want him in the position where he too will have to deal with Tsao Kun through Wang Yu-chih and Li An-ching.

PEKING'S SUPREME COURT

Complications with Regard the Appointment of a Chief Justice

JUDGE YU UNPOPULAR

Peking, May 25.

The demand of the Senate for the nomination of the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court to be submitted to that House for confirmation appears to be leading to further complications as the question develops. There is reason to believe that the Senate does not care very much who is appointed as long as its demand is granted. Official circles, believe, however, that Judge Yu is not popular in Parliamentary circles and there is no doubt that the Cabinet fears that if his name were put forward he would be rejected. The consequence is that the Government has not taken the natural step of submitting to Parliament the name of the present Taili Chief Justice, Mr. Yu Chong-chi.

The Senate's interpretation of the Constitution on this matter, that although Judge Yu was appointed prior to the promulgation of the Constitution his position as Chief Justice required the endorsement of Parliament when the Constitution came into force, is not being seriously contested by the Cabinet. It, therefore, has to choose between nominating Judge Yu or someone else for the substantive post.

According to unofficial Chinese reports the course decided upon shirks the issue, for it is said that the Cabinet will submit the name of Dr. Wang Chung-huai, and if his nomination is passed Judge Yu will carry on the duties of Chief Justice in an acting capacity. If this plan is adopted, Parliamentary circles expect that the Senate will reject Dr. Wang, not on personal grounds but because he is still nominally Minister of Justice and Chinese Judge at the Hague Arbitration Court.—Reuter's Facific Service.

THE AUTONOMY OF HUNAN

Peking, May 22.

General Ma Chi has been sent to Changsha in a further effort to keep General Chao Heng-ti to his promise to cancel the autonomy of Hunan. According to Chinese reports General Chao, while not willing to cancel the provincial constitution of Hunan, has made known his readiness to contribute to the maintenance of the Northern troops pending a final agreement with Peking.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

THE CHINESE TRADE MARKS LAW

Shanghai British Chamber of Commerce Supported by Manchester: Members Urged to Refrain from Registering Pending Satisfactory Arrangement

A meeting of the China Section of the Manchester Chamber of Commerce was held on April 14 to receive a report from the Executive regarding the Chinese Trade Marks Law.

Mr. J. Rankine Finlayson, Chairman of the Section, presided, and in his report to the meeting explained that the Executive had been meeting constantly during the past three months, to deal with this important matter. The present position was that the Chinese Government had made a most unsatisfactory reply to a note submitted by the Diplomatic Body in Peking on behalf of all the foreign interests involved. The note had requested the Chinese Government to give certain assurances, particularly as regards the employment of foreigners in the Registration Bureau. In their reply the Chinese Government merely said that foreign assistance may be engaged with due regard to circumstances, whenever the necessity arose, and none of the suggestions made have been fully adopted. In these circumstances the law was not being recognized by the British Government, with whom the Manchester Chamber had been in close touch throughout, and it was understood that further representations were not to be made to the Chinese Government in view of their refusal to adopt the suggestions already made. The Chairman said that it was the intention of the British Minister and the Government to watch carefully the administration of the law, and to take action whenever British interests were involved, with a view to maintaining the rights which British subjects enjoyed under the Treaties with China. In Article 7 of the Mackay Treaty, the Chinese Government undertakes to afford protection to British Trade Marks against infringement, imitation, or colourable imitation, by Chinese subjects.

The Chairman said that, in view of these facts, the Executive had decided to recommend the members not to register their marks under the Chinese law. If anybody sought to register marks belonging to British firms, notice would appear in the Chinese Trade Mark Journal which is to be published in China, and the British firms would, under Article 26, be able to protest through diplomatic channels within six months. The rights and privileges attached to "prior user" were admitted in the Chinese law (see Article 30), and it was felt that in these circumstances, diplomatic action would be able to protect owners of British marks. Amongst the reasons which the Chairman advanced against registration, the following may be mentioned:—

Some Objections.

It was generally recognized that trade marks were a very complicated and difficult matter with which only those who had a long study of the subject were competent to deal. No confidence could therefore be placed at present in the Bureau of Trade Marks under purely Chinese administration since the Chinese had not the necessary experience. Similarly, tribunals to try and judge trade marks cases both criminal and civil, which are also composed purely of Chinese, would be open to serious criticism. Moreover, it is important to remember that under Article 15 of the Treaty of Tientsin, all questions in regard to the rights, whether of property or person, arising between British subjects shall be subject to the jurisdiction of the British authorities, a provision as needful as ever in view of China's present chaotic condition. Property in trade marks is not the least valuable form of foreign property in China.

Then again, according to Press reports to hand from China there was a danger that local Chinese lawyers would be given a monopoly of the right to act as registration agents, in which case British firms might justifiably conclude that they would be mulcted in excessive charges by those persons in possession of a monopoly. This view has unfortunately already been supported by reports that Chinese lawyers are offering large payments in return for monopolies. This and other reports give grounds for the fear that the administration of the law may possibly be exposed to the gravest evils and corruption.

Shanghai's Action.

Mr. Finlayson reminded the meeting of the fact that the British Chamber of Commerce in Shanghai Branch of the China Association, both of whom, being on the spot with full knowledge of all the circumstances, were able to reach decisions which commanded the confidence of those at home, had unanimously maintained the view they had originally expressed, namely, that registration on the part of British subjects, would be highly detrimental to British interests.

The Vice-Chairman, Mr. W. Maxwell Reekie, supported Mr. Finlayson's remarks, and Mr. K. D. Stewart, the Hon. Secretary, expressed the view that the weakness of the Peking Government meant that they would be powerless to enforce this or any other law in the districts outside Peking, where, as was generally known, their influence and power was of small effect in China at the present time. He felt that the proper course at the moment was for British firmms to decline to register their marks so that the Chinese law would either become a dead letter or lose the Chinese Government would be persuaded to alter their attitude and make the law a sound and workable proposition.

The Chairman further pointed out that British firms might deem it useful to prepare for registration by making lists of their marks and sending them out to China, so that if an improvement in the situation came about no time need be lost in affecting registration if desired.

Finally, the meeting unanimously adopted aa resolution associating the Manchester Chamber of Commerce very clearly with the attitude of the British Chamber of Commerce in Shanghai, and urging all the members of the Manchester Chamber who are interested in trade with China to refrain from actually registering their marks in China until the British Government received reasuring and satisfactory information, and this rendering it possible to take the matter into further consideration.

Diplomatic Body's Note

Peking, May 26.

The Diplomatic Body sent a Note to the Waichiaopu on Wednesday last pointing out that the Chinese Government had not yet replied to their Note of April 5 with regard to the Trade Marks Law.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

PEKING'S POLICE TAX

Strongly Opposed by Residents of Metropolitan Area

Peking, May 24.

Residents of the Metropolitan Area made a demonstration yesterday before the Senate of opposition against the Police Tax. This matter was brought to the attention of the Minister of the Interior yesterday by the Senate.

A meeting, which assumed the character of a demonstration, took place yesterday at the residence of Mr. Tien, whose daughter and servant were recently murdered by men from Heilungkiang. Resolutions condemning the Premier and the Minister of the Interior were passed. Many Chinese suggest that these demonstrations were directed against the Cabinet.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

PEKING, May 24.—The Chinese press reports that the Government has approved the suggestion of the Chinese Minister at Tokio for the appointment of an Educational Commissioner in Japan to attend to affairs connected with Chinese students. The Chinese papers believe that Mr. Huang Fu will be offered the post.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

PEKING'S EMPTY POCKETS

Shadow of Approaching Dragon Festival Gives Food for Uneasy Thoughts

Peking, May 22.

Premier Sun Pao-ch. had recovered from his illness sufficiently this morning to attend the meeting of the Cabinet. The official report says that no important business was transacted. It was resolved to appoint Mr. Sun Wei-tsun Tangin as Financia, and Mr. Kao Yi-wen Chief of the Commercial Bureau of Langkow.

Unofficially it is reported that the Vice Minister of Finance furnished a report on the financial situation which put forward various difficulties in the way of tiding over the Dragon Festival.

Premier Sun did not attend the meeting of the Senate yesterday afternoon, but the Cabinet Office sent a written reply to the Senate, explaining that the Premier was too ill to attend and stating that there had been no change in the relations of China and Russia since April 1. The Soviet Mission had sent no reply to Dr. Wellington Koo's Note.

The Cabinet, replying to the Senate's demand for submission to it of the nomination of the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, said that the present Chief Justice had been appointed prior to promulgation of the constitution, and the Cabinet, therefore, did not think that this case came under the Constitution.

A meeting will be held by the Senate on Friday next at which this question will be further discussed. —Reuter's Pacific Service.

THE ATTACK ON DR. KOO

Communist Students Arrested

Peking, May 23.

Some Communist students have been arrested in connexion with the bomb attack on Dr. Welington Koo but it is understood that they will not be directly charged with the attack but with complicity in Communist activities.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Peking, May 26.

The British Legation has transmitted to the Waichiaopu a telegram from Mr. Ramsay MacDonald in his capacity as Foreign Minister congratulating Dr. Wellington Koo on his escape from the bomb outrage and expressing sympathy for the victims.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

BRITAIN AND THE BOXER INDEMNITY

London, May 26.

The House of Commons to-day passed the first reading of the China Indemnity Application Bill, introduced by Mr. Arthur Ponsonby, Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, making further provision for the application of money paid on account of the China indemnity.

Later.

The China Indemnity Application Bill, mentioned earlier, provides that any sums received after December 1, 1922, on account of China Indemnity be paid into a fund called the China Indemnity Fund and applied for purposes which, in the opinion of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, are beneficial to mutual interests of His Majesty's Government and the Republic of China. And expenses in the administration of the fund will be defrayed out of the fund.—Reuter.

MR. Sun Hung-yi has again been mentioned for the Peking Premiership in succession to Mr. Sun Pao-chi. Mr. Pien Shou-tseng, a strong "wire-puller of President Tsao Kun," will be given a ministry, states the vernacular press.

"THE bearded figure seen in the centre of the group is the new President, Sun Pao-chi," runs the title to a picture in the London "Sphere." The caption also states that in a recent issue this journal "dealt fully with personalities within the Chinese Republic." We were not privileged to read the article. If the writer did not deal more accurately with his personalities than this it must have been really enlightening.

THE MIXED COURT RENDITION

Chinese Convinced of Failure of Demand for Unconditional Surrender

Much comment, a great deal of it rather wild propaganda, has lately appeared in the Chinese newspapers on the subjects of the "return" of the Mixed Court to China and extension of the International Settlement. The following review, however, which appeared in Wednesday "Morning Post," possibly is (so far as it goes) a fairly accurate presentation of the Chinese view: —

In the negotiations which have been conducted by the Diplomatic Body, the question of the improvement of Shanghai harbour is considered to be not vital and therefore has been shelved for the time being. The Diplomatic Body is, however, firmly determined to obtain an extension of the Settlement. During the past few years the Municipal Council has constructed several new roads outside the original boundary—Jessfield Road, Edinburgh Road and Yu-yuen Road—and under the present Mixed Court system there cannot be any question about the Court's jurisdiction over matters occurring in these roads. It is important that the boundary should be properly demarcated in order to avoid disputes. It is feared that Peking's demand for unconditional rendition of the Mixed Court will fail, but it will strongly oppose the harbour improvement proposals on the ground that the work should be undertaken by the Chinese Government. The authorities have intimated that funds are being raised for the work and when the time for carrying out necessary improvements arrives foreigners will be asked for advice and co-operation.

The Government's position in regard to extension of the Settlement has been rendered very difficult in that what formerly was merely a wish expressed by foreigners has now become a demand into which other questions have been drawn. The situation is further aggravated by the fact that unauthorized extensions have taken place and no satisfactory adjustment of limits has been secured by negotiations which followed.

A Shanghai Delegation in Peking

Peking, May 25.

A delegation representing Shanghai public bodies has arrived in Peking to put before the Government their views in favour of early rendition of the Shanghai Mixed Court. It is expected that the members of the delegation will be entertained by the Vice-Minister of Justice at a reception which representatives of the Waichiaopu and other Ministries will be invited to attend in order to hear a statement from the delegates.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

THE LINCHENG TERMS

Discussion by Diplomatic Body But No Result Disclosed

Peking, May 22.

The meeting of the Diplomatic Body yesterday was called to discuss one question only, namely, the Lincheng demands. Before the meeting terminated, however, the subject of the preliminary conference on the increase of the Customs tariff was briefly mentioned but led to no action. The decision regarding the Lincheng demands has not yet been communicated to the Chinese Government and no statement will be made by the Diplomatic Body until its decision has been forwarded to the Waichiaopu.—Reuter.

Peking, May 26.

The Diplomatic Body have not yet sent to the Waichiaopu their reply to the Chinese Government's request for discussions regarding the Lincheng claims as the details have not yet been sent to the Doyen by some of the Legations. —Reuter's Pacific Service.

THE Doyen of the Diplomatic Body has sent a Note to Dr. Wellington Koo urging China to employ foreigners, when drawing up the trade marks laws.

ALIVE OR DEAD?

May 26.

ABOUT the year 60 of our era there was a celebrated trial in the city of Cæsarea in Palestine. On that occasion the prosecuting attorney said to Herod Agrippa, the judge, that the case did not hang on any of the usual legal charges but was a dispute between the Jewish rulers, who said that a certain famous teacher of their nation was dead, whereas the prisoner, Paul, asserted that he was alive. It was a peculiar point to occupy the attention of a Roman court. A detailed and very interesting account of the trial is given in a book too well known to require to be named, and the position is yet so far unsettled that a very serious division has arisen in some of the larger denominational churches in America over this very question; one party, the Modernists, maintaining the views of the Jewish leaders of 2,000 years ago, that the person referred to is really dead, and the other, the Fundamentalists, insisting that he is alive. Lawyers could quote many causes célèbres in which the question whether a certain party to the suit was alive or not was debated by some of the brightest lights of the legal profession. There was the Tichbourne case which came for trial in 1868. The eldest son of Sir James Francis Tichbourne was lost at sea in a vessel called the Bella which sailed from Rio de Janeiro in 1854. His mother, as mothers will, refused to believe the report of her son's death. She advertised for him in many papers and ultimately received a reply from a butcher in the town of Wagga-wagga in Australia. The claimant was as unlike the lost son as could possibly be imagined. The son was a slim youth with straight black hair and could speak English only with a French accent. The claimant was a stout man with fair wavy hair, knew no French and spoke very rude English. In spite of these, and many other proofs to the contrary, Lady Tichbourne believed that this was her prodigal; she took him to her heart and loved and trusted him till the day of her death. More astonishing still, scores of people identified the claimant as the heir and huge sums of money were subscribed to enable him to substantiate his claim. It was a case of the Englishman's love of justice for the under dog running to seed, but a hard-hearted judge and jury convicted the claimant of perjury and sent him to prison for fourteen years. Then, on the other side, there is the tale of Enoch Arden, who was really alive but returned to his home to find that he was legally dead and, finding that there was no niche for him in a world that was dead to him, decided to remain dead to the world but, by a whimsical turn of fate, was immortalized by Tennyson.

These instances show that it is not an easy problem to decide whether a man is alive or dead. We have the case of Dr. Sun occupying the attention of the world and, at the present moment, he would be a bold man who would predicate the truth or falsity of the rumours that have reached us of his decease. It may be said that Dr. Sun has merely to saunter out of his office, if he be really alive, and show himself to any one of a dozen reporters who are desperately anxious to get authentic copy and utterly indifferent whether he is "to be or not be" as long as they can be certain whether they ought to use a negative or affirmative in making their report. But what would story-tellers and writers of fiction do for a living if every good plot were to be settled in this off-hand, matter-of-fact fashion? Reuter's correspondent at Canton, Mr. Hin Wong, ventured to report that it was rumoured Dr. Sun was dead and he is now in prison, doubtless meditating on the blessing of living under a constitutional Republican government. Later Mr. C. M. McDonald went as a special correspondent to Canton and said, in effect, to Mr. Eugene Chen, Dr. Sun's secretary, "Bring out your lion and let him roar for me and I'll soon put an end to all this pother." Mr. Chen was indignant to the point of discourtesy and pointed out that it is open to any man at any time to assert that any other man is dead. And if we are all liable to be called on, every now and then, to prove that we are not dead—and we have shown at the beginning of this article what a difficult task that is—why! what is to become of us? We have some sympathy with Mr. Chen.

Editors, as well as politicians, find it necessary to be "not at home" to callers sometimes and we are at all times too busy to take time to demonstrate our aliveness to those who presume to doubt it. At the same time Dr. Sun—presuming he is alive—and Mr. Eugene Chen are reviving the methods of the tyrants of barbarous days when they throw a man into prison and threaten his life for presuming to whisper that the King is dead. A drastic action of this kind makes what may be an idle rumour look very much as though it might be true. And true or false it is a wrong thing to do anyway. It is recorded that in the battle of Hastings a rumour spread that Duke William was dead. The Norman leader at once removed his helmet, rode out in front of the ranks and so reassured his men. Later it was said that King Harold was slain and as the rumour was true the English King could not imitate his opponent; therefore the battle was lost and Duke William became King of England. We commend the story to Dr. Sun's attention.

CHINA FULL OF OPIUM

May 27.

READERS of our up-country correspondence are sufficiently familiar with the evidence it affords of opium growing and smoking in practically all provinces of China. Impressive as are these reports, however, they are only the personal observations of each writer as he goes about his business and we may, therefore, add to them effectively by some quotations from the results of a systematic investigation made by the International Anti-Opium Association of Peking. The inquiry began last October, when poppy was planted in the southern provinces, and was continued month by month until the last poppies were sown in Jehol and Manchuria in April, 1924. It may particularly be noted that foreign reports are corroborated by Chinese.

Beginning in Hunan—a province which prides itself on independence, self-government and enlightenment—we read: "Opium rampant everywhere under military orders." In some places the civil officials tried to stop it, but failed "because of militarists." In districts where it is not grown it is freely imported. Kuangtung grows very little opium, except round Swatow, chiefly because its neighbours grow so much that "it is easier to buy than cultivate." Last January a Government Opium Monopoly was established by the Canton Government "aiming at control and ultimate prohibition?" The question mark sounds rather dubious. Meanwhile in Kuangsi the trade in opium is now regularly organized and shop licences to deal in opium are a steady source of revenue to the authorities. "The International Anti-Opium Association possesses copies of the opium monopoly stamps of this province, which after payment of taxes render all transport and sale immune from restrictions." We read that,

"Before the Revolution the opium trade was practically dead here. Now it has been estimated that 80 per cent. of the men smoke.

Worse even than Kuangsi is Fukien which "shows an absolute and general retrogression. The whole province is virtually under military compulsory poppy cultivation. About 70,000 troops under five principal Generals as well as the navy and marines are all being supported by opium taxation." It we remember rightly, Fukien showed other provinces the way in the evil device of compelling farmers to buy a licence to grow opium in order to pay later on for the privilege of selling it. Many earnest petitions have been sent to Peking by residents but quite without avail. Turning to Yunnan we read that

The whole province is almost one extensive poppy field. North, south, east and west sections of the province report two acres out of every three planted with opium. Official proclamations state that the tax on land this year, 1924, will be the same as formerly whether opium is planted or not. Food stuffs are very dear, owing to limited cultivation. The states under hereditary rulers along the Burma border show extensive cultivation. . . . Yunnan opium is the cheapest in China, being as low as 40 cents an ounce. As all the neighbouring provinces extensively produced opium, and the French Government has prohibited export through Tonkin, a glut is expected in the market in 1924.

Sixty per cent. of the male population in the province use opium.

Kueichow, always a great place for opium growing, where, however, the Empire did succeed in practically stamping it out, is now again reported as one vast field of cultivation. Of Szechuan we are told "At least two-thirds of province cultivated with opium."

Szechuan opium is renowned as of the highest grade, hence the enormous traffic down the river to central and eastern provinces. "Ton after ton is being shipped from this city" writes a Missionary. Local military and civil monopolies exist in all large towns, especially those on the river. $200,000 was received from transport receipts during 1923 at one port, writes a correspondent who sent a sample of the monopoly receipt. The export by river has been mildly estimated at over 400 tons during the past season. Local price of opium varies from 40 to 70 cents an ounce.

With so much obtainable from up river, Hupeh does not cultivate opium to any extent but deals in it extensively.

There are no reports of any extensive opium cultivation in this province, the reason being that imported opium is so cheap and abundant. The opium traffic on the river from Szechuan, and by road, rail and river from Yunnan and Kueichow, has increased tenfold. Opium monopolies under combined military and civil administrations have been formed at Ichang, Shasi and Hankow, and provided the taxes are paid opium sale is free and open. Two of these organizations bear the name of "The Army Joint Office for General Control of Investigation" and "The Transport Company for the Succour of Ichang."

Kiangsi "has surrendered during the last two years to the prevailing wave of poppy cultivation and opium traffic. Cultivation is encouraged and since the establishment of a monopoly $4 poppy tax is imposed on every space of land capable of growing a tan of rice." Anhui, "the province claiming allegiance to the Central Government, has given during 1923 the most flagrant evidence of opium recrudescence." Opium is sold as openly as eggs or vegetables.

Opium land taxation has been the main object. We have the details of opium land taxes in Fuyanghsien in N. W. Anhui. The Hsien is divided into eighteen districts and taxes have varied from $3,000 to $60,000 a district. Pochow with a uniform tax of $5 a mow will realize $200,000, and Yingchowfu, $400,000. An estimate for the province may be inferred from these three counties.

Of Shensi it is reported

There is no evidence of improvement in this province which for years has been noted as one of the most delinquent provinces in China. Foreign evidence is absolutely contradictory to that supplied by the recent Government Investigating Commissioner who declared "not a poppy root could be found in the province." The explanation of this latter statement is that it was made after the opium harvest had been gathered. Kansu supplies a similar example of bland effrontery:—

A correspondent writing from Lanchow, January, 1924, says: "We are greatly amused at the report of the Government Opium Investigating Commissioner in which he states that Kansu and Shensi had done well in their prohibition of poppy planting this year. The Government recommended that the Commissioner be thanked for his hard work. To tell the truth the Commissioner was not allowed to enter the province until after the opium harvest had been reaped. Wheat is three times the normal price, and the cost of all foods and commodities is doubled. The poor are in great distress and the prospects bad unless more wheat is grown this year.

Chihli does not grow but smuggles. Shantung has retrograded sadly, especially at Tsingtao since the Japanese, who had introduced effective suppression, gave it back to China. Honan, Manchuria and outlying regions grow and traffic in opium extensively.

Shansi, Kiangsu and Chêkiang afford honourable exceptions. The two latter have to contend heavily with smuggling and opium is undoubtedly very largely smoked in them. Shansi is an example of what really can be done where there is a will.

The province of Shansi has 105 hsiens or districts and in 85 the Governor has established Anti-Opium Societies, and the magistrate of the district is nearly always the President. During the last two years, 51,000 persons have been treated in the "Opium Curing Houses," 8,000 persons have been arrested as smugglers, and 15,000 arrested as smokers. During 1922 nearly 40,000 ounces of opium and morphia, and 18,000 opium lamps and pipes were seized and burnt.

By extensive circulation of Anti-Opium literature all over the province, and by public lectures the people are being educated on the evils of the habit. Opium smokers and pill eaters when arrested are compulsorily sent to "Curing Houses." On discharge they have to pay $30 which is returned at the end of one year if they are still abstainers. But for the menace of the neighbouring provinces, and the morphia traffic along the Peking-Hankow Railway, narcotics would be unknown in this province.

Possibly the most serious side of the traffic in drugs is the use of morphia, heroin and the like, which grew up in the hands of smugglers when opium suppression was a real thing and continues to flourish. Of opium-smoking itself, one is tempted to say from experience of Chinese who practised it regularly, that in moderation it is not more harmful than tobacco. Unfortunately the bounds of moderation would appear to be more quickly passed in respect of opium than of any other practice. And above all there is the great stain on the reputation of republican China that whereas the derided Empire put down opium, its successors have reintroduced it. On the other hand, there is a strong sentiment among respectable Chinese against opium, which will probably take effect when they nerve themselves to make an end of their military barons and wasting armies.

THE TRADE OUTLOOK

May 27.

WHATEVER faults, real or imaginary, may be laid at its doors, the present British Government cannot be saddled with the one of undue lack of optimism, a virtue extremely advantageous, if not absolutely necessary, in a party which, coming into power for the first time, was and is faced with problems as varied and diverse as those which have ever confronted any British Parliament. Mr. Sidney Webb, President of the Board of Trade, speaking a month ago to his constituents in the Seaham Division of Durham, in a speech mainly of a party character, made an interesting reference to the trade position, a reference to which many people at Home apparently cannot subscribe. Mr. Webb is convinced that there is now visible an upward turn in trade, instancing as evidence in support that Bradford and Sheffield, Northampton and Leicester "reported to-day less lugubriously than they had for a couple of years." After expressing his gratification at the shipbuilding position (a gratification that is by no means justified after a careful study of the quarterly shipbuilding returns for the period ended March 31 last) he remarked that it was pleasant to see the production of coal, week by week, up to the record year of 1913. Quoting from our London contemporary, "Lloyd's List," than which there is no better-informed journal on general trade matters in the world, "the speech savours of an easy-going optimism which appears to arise from hasty generalization," an opinion with which most people directly concerned with the economic position regretfully will agree. The lack of foreign orders in British shipbuilding yards, as compared with pre-war times, and the great number of idle berths and thousands of unemployed shipyard workers, is in itself sufficient reply to his observations on shipbuilding; while as to coal, the mere fact that "the production is up to the record year 1913" needs to be considered with the equally obvious fact that British exports have been shrinking for some months past. It follows as the night the day that before there can be cheaper coal (and at present the comparatively high price of this commodity is having, directly and indirectly, a marked deterrent effect on British industrial revival) the output must be considerably in excess of that for 1913.

We are with our London contemporary in wishing that Mr. Webb had been more explicit and less complacent in treating a subject so vitally important. Where Mr. Webb was relevant and apposite, however, was in his laying stress on the need of peace throughout Europe. His Government is, admittedly, working in every way for that peace. But what has and more influence on the European situation than any Government action has been the report of the Experts' Committee, and the prospect which it offers of a business-like settlement of the reparations problem. That was not the work of the Government, though the Government can now do much by helping to translate the report into effective action. "At the moment the future of international trade depends primarily upon the successful handling of German reparation payments, and there is much to be done before that can be accomplished."

CHINA INDUSTRIES CONFERENCE

May 28.

One of the most hopeful news items emanating from Peking for some time past is that contained in Reuter's telegrams yesterday that a central industrial conference is to be held at the capital in the autumn. The Ministry of Commerce, under whose auspices the event is to take place, is to be congratulated upon the idea, and, if it materializes, much might come of it for the development of China's native industries throughout the country. The development of these industries undoubtedly lies in the future. The time must come when the thousand and one crafts for which the Chinese have for centuries been famous will provide great national wealth and tend to the improved well-being of China's millions. From a remote epoch the Chinese have enjoyed high reputation for their manual skill and industrial habits. There can be no doubt also that they can hold their own when they take their part in large-scale industrial work. Their artistic talents are by no means meagre, and they have a happy knack of combining a rather crude art with industry which can be fostered to considerable degree. But, as most of our readers will know, there have been factors which have retarded the development of manufacturing in the country, except by the old crude processes that have remained for many centuries. It may indeed be said that, with the exception of the comparatively few new-style factories in China which have been modelled after foreign factories for the manufacture of essentially foreign commodities, there does not exist any industry whose plant has received any material change since the contrivance was first introduced—and that goes back to the remote past. Some of the adverse factors may have disappeared, or ceased to have much effect, but it will take time to convince the provincial governments that it is the essence of stupidity in statecraft to discourage any industry that shows promise by putting upon it the maximum of taxation that it will bear.

An authority, writing on this subject, said that the official tendency to overtax everything that prospers is one of the greatest and most formidable obstacles in the path of industrial development. The writer is conversant with many native industries, particularly in the southern provinces, where it was necessary for the plants to be closed entirely, as no profit was possible after the extortionate taxation and "squeeze" to those in authority had been met. A large number of Chinese magistrates, both great and small, against whom no one could bring a charge of extortion, made a systematic practice of throttling everything in the nature of an industry, as they believed, in the interest of the State. "The goose that lays the golden eggs," as a writer in an industrial publication on China has remarked, "used to be served up to the Central Government with much éclat as evidence of the small magistrate's interest in the national welfare and diligence in the performance of his duties." In these Republican days, the same practice is even more ruthlessly pursued, but with the difference that none of the returns find their way into the coffers of the Central Government. According to a recent report of the Ministry of Commerce, there are now about 30,000 factories scattered throughout China. We suppose that among this number at least seven-eighths of them are one and two-room workshops which would not be classified as factories in Europe and America, and there are probably not more than a thousand to fifteen hundred that would compare favourably with similar plants in the Occident. But the number of the latter is increasing, and there is, however, a greater readiness on the part of wealthy Chinese to invest their money in native industries, so that evidence leads one to believe that industrialism in the interior on improved lines may be looked for. This is where the Ministry of Commerce can justify its existence, and we hope that it will.

The proposed conference, we notice, is to be divided into two sections. One will be known as the Industrial Delegates Section (to be organized by the representatives of officially recognized industrial institutes and leading enterprises), and the second known as the Industrial Administration Section (to be organized by the administrative authorities of industrial organizations in the provinces). The aim is, of course, to improve industries generally. The conference is to last from fifteen days to a month. Members will be chosen from the Chinese Chambers of Commerce throughout the country, with officials from the various government departments. "while business concerns of Shanghai, Hankow, Tientsin and Canton may each send one delegate." That is good, and if the Ministry of Commerce were wise it would extend invitations to some of the larger foreign industrial interests in the country, for from them much might be learned, and we feel sure that their advice would be willingly given. The Industrial Administrative Section will specially study the views and suggestions of the provincial authorities with the particular view of decision of common policies. Delegates will be selected from the Industrial Commissioners in the provinces, representatives of gold and other mining, forestry and kindred institutions. It seems to us, therefore, that in this conference the opportunity is presented for doing something well worth the doing. China needs to do all that lies within her power for the fostering of her industrial progress. The more large factories she has, the greater will be the contribution of those factories to her national wealth, if the foolish policy of killing the goose that lays the golden egg is stopped. Taxation must be equitable and low enough to enable capitalists who are prepared to risk their money in inland undertakings to make a good return on their investments. Can the conference exercise enough influence throughout the provinces by means of guilds, chambers of commerce and even the new labour organizations, to keep the rapacity of local officials and militarists within bounds? That is the great question on which the success of industrial China depends.

THE VALUE OF CO-OPERATION

May 29.

If the monetary losses alone (to say nothing of the general public inconvenience and economic chaos) of labour disputes in Great Britain and the United States during the last decade were totalled up, the result would be a sum so colossal as to be staggering. The ideal is, and has been for many years, mutual co-operation and understanding between employer and worker, and in those few cases where this has been brought into effect the result has proved beyond doubt or cavil that the ideal is by no means an illusory one. While trades unions, on the whole, are a boon and a necessity to the general worker, the fact that they are practically above the law is not always beneficial, even to the unions; while financial immunity from the results of any actions they take often has resulted in a sense of irresponsibility which has communicated itself to individual workers. An illuminating example of what co-operation between employer and man may mean was shown a few weeks ago, at Home, in the case of a vessel called Londoner. The vessel was damaged in collision in the Thames in January and was sent to the works of Messrs. Fletcher, of Limehouse, to be patched up temporarily before going to Holland for thorough repairs. (It may be mentioned that at the time, owing to shipyard troubles in England, of fifty-two vessels which were at Rotterdam, undergoing repairs or waiting for repairs, forty-eight were British). Messrs. Fletcher, knowing that they had little work in hand and realizing that if the job were thrown open to public tender it certainly would go across the Channel, decided to purchase her outright. They laid the matter before their men and offered to allow them to subscribe up to 50 per cent. of the price of the ship. No one was asked personally, still less compelled, to subscribe, but the firm pointed out that there was a reasonable likelihood of making a satisfactory profit, and that the main thing was that work should be provided. The response from the men—all classes, and even from apprentices—was such that the subscription per man had to be limited. They bought the vessel, carried out all repairs, and then sold her to a Norwegian company at a price which gave a very satisfactory return on the original outlay. This is, of course, an isolated example, but the principle involved is one which might well be embraced by others. It possesses the cardinal advantage of enlisting the sympathy, interest and co-operation of the workers concerned, and of making them realize and understand that they were working for their own benefit, besides that of their employers. Let us hope that the case we have cited is but a precursor of a wider feeling of sympathy and interest between employer and employed, and the harbinger of a new order of things, in which master and man realize that their interests are parallel and not divergent.

To travel from Khiva to Bokhara in central Asia till now has involved a horse ride of about a week. The Russian Government has now inaugurated an air service covering the distance in about three and a half hours. Flights are to be made twice a week.

Peking, May 23.—Gen. Yuan Tsuming, Tupan of the Szechuen-Kueichow Border, has recommended the appointment of Gen. Wang Tien-pei as Assistant Director of Military Affairs in Szechuan, according to semi-official information. It is suggested in explanation of the report that Gen. Yuan wants the position of Inspector-General of Szechuan and Kueichow.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

INTERNATIONAL LABOUR WORKERS

May 30.

The mail bags from Home of the past few months have been bringing us leaflets from the International Federation of Trade Unions, which has headquarters at Amsterdam. Whether other people in Shanghai have been equally favoured, we do not know; nor we must confess, do we know much about the I. F. T. U. beyond what it tells us. It certainly does not appear to be a Red organization; it has branches in every capital of Europe, and even in Johannesburg and Jerusalem, but none in Russia; and in recording that the Norwegian trade unions held a referendum to decide whether they would affiliate with the Red International of Labour Unions (which the Norwegians decided not to do by a large majority), one of the leaflets before us is at some pains to point out that the Red organization's claims to support in other unions are demonstrably false. There are some interesting paragraphs on the efforts in different countries to get paid holidays for workers, which read rather pitifully: most people will sympathize with the I. F. T. U. in this undertaking. Among other entries we note one to the effect that Samuel Gompers and John Quinn, the American Labour leaders, "have united to oppose unlimited immigration." The I. F. T. U. comments on this that

The large industrialists are of course opposed to the restriction, as they realize that it means that wages will be maintained on a high level.

As, however, it will mean also that European labour markets will be glutted with unemployed for whom there is not now and has not been for many years any outlet except in the new worlds, we do not see that the I. F. T. U. have much cause for rejoicing. Incidentally Mr. Gompers has very little to do with internationalized labour.

But the great aim of the Amsterdam organization is to abolish war and surely no one will cavil at so laudable an ambition. The methods of attaining it are more open to question. Here is a quotation from one very elaborately got-up leaflet:—

We are drawing near the tenth anniversary of the day which saw the outbreak of the world war—that fatal August day which let loose Armageddon upon the world, and opened the way to a slaughter and havoc which has been unexampled in the annals of the world.

For four long years the world suffered untold agonies: for four long years the peoples fought each other like wild beasts: for four long years the flower of the world's youth was sacrificed on the battlefields: for four long years civilization was forgotten, and its most elementary lessons were thrown to the winds.

During these four terrible years, thousands of young men went forth to battle in the confident hope that they were fighting to end war, and to make the world safe for democracy.

They did not know that they were merely the dupes of the lies and insinuations of small groups of capitalists, who were seeking to strengthen and extend their domination of the world.

Then came the sham peace that shattered the illusion of so many, and destroyed the dream that this was the war to end war.

And now the countries of the world are again making ready for fresh war.

. . . On the third Sunday in September of this year, the International Federation of Trade Unions is organizing an Anti-War Day in all the affiliated countries. It is supported by the Socialist and Labour International, the International Co-operative Alliance, and the International of Socialist Youth. Let this day be the first day of the mobilization of the International Peace Army.

And in another leaflet, circularized with a special eye to the proper celebration of May Day:—

The two great reforms which must first of all be carried and extended are the eight hours day and social insurance. They must be followed up by the introduction of workers' control, and great changes in the organization of industry, which are indispensable if labour is to combat capitalist influences and to prepare for the advent of a social system in which the fruits of the labour of all will be for all, and not for a few only. When they have achieved success in these directions, the working classes will have shown that they are ripe for the accomplishment of their great historic mission—the emancipation of Labour through social justice which can only be established in a world at peace.

Comrades demonstrate.

For Social Justice!

For Freedom!

For the Peace of Humanity!

Does any sober-minded man seriously believe that Capital deliberately makes wars, the destruction of everything by which it lives? Sometimes it acquiesces in them, no doubt, as it did in Germany's war. But then the German Socialists also shouted for that war, much to the chagrin of pacifist doctrinaires abroad. In times of strong emotion, patriotism is the natural instinct of the vast majority and always will be; internationalism is an anæmic intellectual invention, potent only in the very sphere of that organization which the I. F. T. U. pretends is most hostile to it—Capital! Where does all the windy talk, of the kind we have quoted above, bring us? For thirty-two years, our Labour correspondent told us the other day, the Independent Labour Party have been indulging in it, and now, when their theories are put to the test of the actual exercise of power, their recent conference was chiefly concerned to cover up the proved unworkability of all the wild theories of the past. When we come down to actual fact, it is not the professional Labour leader that has done most for the manual workers, but men from the ranks and associations of Capital — Robert Owen, Lord Shaftsbury, Sir Robert Peel, Wilberforce, Gladstone, the Rowntrees, Cadburys, Colmans, and Lord Leverhulme. We have waded through a number of the I. F. T. U. leaflets and they appear to be well intentioned. But they are none the less sorry stuff. More and more it is recognized by serious-minded men that the interests of Capital and Labour are identical and in many directions the former is giving increasing proof of its perception of the fact. To seek to keep the two classes apart, to inculcate hatred and organize disunion, as the I. F. T. U. is trying to do, will injure most of all those whom it affects to serve.

Three members of the Shanghai Chinese Bar Association returned to Shanghai on Wednesday from Peking. They have been "fighting for the return of the International Mixed Court." Mr. Tung Kang, former Minister of Justice and Finance, who was the fourth member of the party is remaining in the Capital for the present.

An agreement has been reached between the General Post Office and the Canadian Pacific Ocean Services for the fortnightly carriage of mails from the United Kingdom to Japan, China and Hongkong. The regular through service was to commence with the sailing of the R.M.S. Empress of Scotland from Southampton on Saturday last. The liner's mails are expected to be transferred from the Atlantic port to the Empress of Asia, due at Hongkong from Vancouver on June 23.

THE MISSIONARY OUTLOOK

May 31.

WE may not always agree with the opinions and methods of individual missionaries, but there must be few in the community who do not approve, at least to some extent, the philanthropic efforts of the missionary body as a whole to bring to China all that is good in our Western civilization. Even merchants and traders who are indifferent to religious propaganda cannot but acknowledge the advantages they have derived from the pioneering of the early missionaries, and it must be a relief to them to know that when travelling in the interior of China they are generally within easy reach of a fully qualified missionary physician. On the whole, life in China would be vastly poorer if the missionaries were not here, or if their number seriously declined. It is a question, therefore, of general interest whether the stream of Protestant missionaries coming to this country will continue in the future to be as strong and steady as heretofore, despite the various influences, favourable and unfavourable, which are now changing the whole life of the Chinese, and the effect of the Great War on religion in the West.

To answer this question it is perhaps best to turn to the United States where the great financial prosperity enables the churches to send out more missionaries than any other country. Formerly, Great Britain was in the lead, but the classes there which support foreign missions have been very hard hit by the war, heavy taxation, and the high cost of living, so that the income of the missionary societies has been reduced and missionary recruits are fewer. But wealth alone is not the impelling power in missions. What has been the influence of recent world events upon missionary ideals? A few months ago at Indianapolis, U.S.A., there was a convention of six thousand college students belonging to the "Student Volunteer Movement," an organization consisting of individuals who have purposed to give their lives to foreign missionary service. The official report of the Convention must cause misgivings in the minds of old-time missionaries who expect missionary candidates to have glowing faith and zeal. Perhaps in Shanghai there are people who can remember how the whole of England in the 'eighties was stirred by the "Cambridge Seven," who later came to China as missionaries. But at Indianapolis there was little enthusiasm and much searching of heart. To quote from the report, "a conviction that America was not 98 per cent. all right grew upon the delegates." It was felt that "the old order of things is unsatisfactory." "We could scarcely blame the girl from China who asked why we sent missionaries to her people when our own needed Christianizing so badly." The gloom was deepened by another Chinese who deplored the students' "lack of knowledge of things Oriental, and of the need for harmonic vibrations of purer tones." There was no discussion of theological issues, although the churches in America are gravely disturbed by the controversies between the Fundamentalists and Modernists. Indeed the word "church" was seldom mentioned. This seeming indifference to doctrinal and ecclesiastical convictions is not evidence that the students had soared to serene spiritual altitudes where controversy has no place. On the contrary, more than one writer present at the Conference deplores their lack of spirituality. "Vital personal religion is not strong to-day among the college and university students of America." Discussion was mainly concerned with such topics as racial equality; the proper attitude towards war and the means of securing world peace; and—strange to say—"how far Americans had any right to adopt any methods of missions or of colonization which would tend to impose our Western civilization or our Western Christianity upon the peoples of the world." It is evident that the whole movement is changing; it is passing out of the control of its founders and the old mission cries have more or less lost their appealing power. "The present student generation is thinking not so much of evangelization in the ordinary sense of the word, as of reconstruction of society as well as individuals." Moreover, there is the suspicion that "it does not regard the challenge of foreign missions as of paramount importance in the Christian programme."

To the friends of foreign missions all this, at first sight, is not very encouraging. These students do not seem to feel they have a great and inspiring message to deliver to distant peoples; they are more concerned with social reforms, yet their missionary ardour even in this direction is dampened by their dissatisfaction with the social conditions of their own country. But they are young, very young, and we should remember that organized Christianity was grievously wounded by the Great War, and that the young are in revolt against the old ways and wish to find something new and better. In religion the old forms in which spiritual truths are expressed are being questioned and the students must be given time to think things out for themselves. Periods of spiritual unsettlement, change, sometimes actual declension, have not been infrequent in the history of Christianity; but true religion has always shown a wonderful power of recovery. The knowledge of Christianity that is now being spread rapidly over the whole world must surely be preparing the way for a great religious movement which will not be quite the same as any in the past. This will revive the churches in the homelands and greatly strengthen "indigenous" Christian churches in non-Christian lands. To return to the main point. Whether foreign missionaries to China in the future will be very numerous is doubtful, and those who do come, earnest and confident, will probably be very conservative in their theological views. But more and more the work now done by missionaries will be carried on by Chinese Christians and on lines marked out by themselves.

SCENTS

There's the gorse scent in April, like apricots sun-warm;
The pear-like scent of walnut leaves between the fingers pressed;
The sallow scent like almonds; the scent of fresh-turned earth,
And the scent of the limbs of a baby new-bathed and put to rest.

There's the vagrant scent of a camp-fire; the scent of a cow's sweet breath;
The scent of tweeds and of mushrooms and of bean-flowers set arow;
Of apple-lofts and of birch-bark—but the dearest scent to me
Is the salt clean smell of seaweed on the rocks when the tide is low.

NOTES AND COMMENTS

Man-Power

It is something of a paradox that, in connexion with industry in all of its branches, the mind of man continually is working to eliminate, or at least to reduce the necessity of man-power. The commencement of this never-ceasing endeavour to make man independent of himself, so far as the production and use of energy are concerned, may be reckoned at the latter part of the eighteenth century, when the early development of the steam engine took place. It is very little more than a century ago that man-power was the predominant source of energy. Man utilized the power of horses and oxen, and he used, to some extent, the power of streams and waterfalls; but in the aggregate, man's own energy output was the measure of the power available. If any industry employed fifty men, then that industry enjoyed the amount of energy those fifty men could exert, and no more. A century ago iron and steel were produced with but little more than one-tenth horse power per man employed in the industry; to-day forty-two horse-power is developed for every man so employed—420 times as much. Flour mills have been grinding grain since the early days of industry; to-day, every employee in such a mill has two-hundred times his own energy output to work with. And so for every industry. Wherever we turn in a "modern" country, the key-note is power, and more and more is "labour" coming to mean attendance upon some machine which actually performs the labour. Despite what fanatical agitators may say, the more cheaply we can produce power to do the work of man, the more far-reaching will be its benefits, for cheap power is the final and ultimate solution not only of industrial ills but also, to a great extent, of the social and political ills of the world.

The Hwah Jah Once More

The following particulars supplementing the accounts of the happenings in connexion with the str. Hwah Jah, and referring to the time the vessel has been at Hongkong, were received from that port last Friday:—".....The present captain wanted a European mate and a European engineer. He has been given a mate but.....no engineer. Apparently he has had trouble with the cadets as they wanted to run around the same as they did.....One of the cadets told.....that they would get this captain out of it as he was too harsh with them. The Hwah Jah had the Blue Peter up for three days before she eventually got away. She sailed on May 16 for Saigon to load rice for Japan. On the morning of sailing she let go from buoy and shortly after dropped anchor. The rumour came ashore that it was due to engine trouble but the real cause was this: the cadets refused to leave the bridge when asked to do so by the captain. He ordered them three times to get off the bridge till he was finished manoeuvring and as they would not do so he told the mate to drop anchor. He then came ashore and saw Mr.....who was staying at the King Edward Hotel ....Whatever agreement was reached the ship left shortly after mid-day.....The previous second mate who was made mate is now purser or something similar..... put an inspired article in the local papers saying that all the reports about trouble on board were untrue and that she is going to Australia, South America, etc., etc. The ship is chartered to Y.K.K. for six months from March 1....." And so the interesting cruise continues.

The China Pony Problem

Racing people in the North for long will talk of the Tientsin meeting just concluded, for much history was made there. The China pony question has not been solved yet by a long way and possibly it will be argued for many years, but the Tientsin meeting may do a great deal towards a settlement. Many argued that Tientsin did the wrong thing in separating the so-called true China ponies from half-breds and arranging separate classes for the latter, but there is this much to be said for it—the issue now has become so complicated that a settlement may be forced earlier than otherwise would be the case. A pony who is allowed to race at Kiangwan as a China pony, at Tientsin has been put amongst the half-breds and has done well. In Shanghai we have ponies who can race on one of our courses but not on the other. Another pony classed at Tientsin as a half-bred now has been sent down to Shanghai and, having previously raced at Kiangwan, presumably he will run there again. Mr. Hill ventured the opinion recently that if two or more half-breds came together in the Champions under favourable conditions and the race were run all out, the record for the distance would be beaten by at least 5 sec. and the running at Tientsin suggests that he was not far out. If so, what will be said should a pony who already has raced here as a China pony, but has gone to Tientsin and been pronounced a half-bred, and who has run with half-breds and broken records, come to Shanghai again and, being still eligible, canter away from our genuine China ponies? So far there are no two racing clubs with unanimity as to the proper way out of the difficulty—not even Shanghai and Kiangwan—and one cannot foresee any lasting solution until delegates are appointed from all the recognized clubs to form a China Jockey Club, with an agreement to abide by its decisions, whatever they may be. A gathering of Shanghai jockeys not a fortnight ago raised their glasses to "the Future Jockey Club of China" and it ought not to be very long before they delete the "future."

Trotsky's Diplomacy

Once again has Mr. Trotsky given evidence of his exquisite sense of diplomacy by making a speech of deliberate offensiveness to Great Britain at a time when his colleagues in London are using all their persuasiveness to induce the British Government to give them money. The British delegates' steady refusal to be entrapped may, of course, explain Trotsky's behaviour: like the ill-mannered urchin, found out and detected in his naughtiness, who spits and calls bad names. However, the conference in London is not absolutely over yet, so it seems silly to go on in this manner. According to Rosta (the official Bolshevist news agency), Trotsky, speaking in the Moscow opera house, referred more or less apropos of nothing to the assault by a Chinese soldier on Mr. Campbell on the city wall in Peking. He does not, however, appear to have said anything about the assault, but informed his audience that the Chinese soldier was given 40 strokes with the bamboo for walking on the part of the city wall reserved for foreigners. Was he indeed? We do not remember any such punishment being reported from Peking. If it even took place, it was not for walking on the wall, but for a peculiarly brutal and quite unprovoked assault. Trotsky then went on to say that he did not wish to complicate the course of Soviet diplomacy, nor give "the British reactionary press further excuse for saying that he wished to compromise the negotiations in London;" but he could not refrain from "saying loudly, on behalf of all of us, to this Peking soldier 'Moscow's proletariat are with you heart and soul.'" And now let us get on with the job of inventing some charm which will cause British gold to flow into the pockets of the leaders of Moscow's proletariat, without their being troubled to restore what they have stolen, repay what they owe or fulfil any promise they make.

Avenue Road

A valued correspondent returns to the charge on the subject of our recent note on Avenue Road which, he says, is "used in other places besides Shanghai and is not a redundancy as you make out." About the phrase being used elsewhere we accept his word. As regards redundancy, the farthest meaning for avenue from the ordinary one of a road flanked with trees that we can find is the figurative sense of a means of access or attainment. Possibly Avenue Road was so named allegorically, to indicate the steps by which social climbers arrived at the august heights of Bubbling Well. In any other sense we are not convinced that the name is not redundant. Our correspondent then says that he finds "a more flagrant example of tautology in the largest city in the world: what about Mansion House?" Well, mansion must once have meant something distinct from a dwelling house, for we have, in the New Testament, "in my Father's house are many mansions." But apart from this "mansion" as meaning a house by itself is apparently modern. The dictionary given "mansion-house" as a hyphenated noun and quotes Bacon on "Use of the Law":

> This party purposing in this place to make a dwelling, or, as the old word is, his mansion-house, or his manor-house, did devise how he might make his land a complete habitation to supply him with all manner of necessaries

Evidently the word was not new in Bacon's day. It might also be mentioned that the word mansion bears a special significance in ancient astronomy and in astrology. We do not suppose the Lord Mayor of London ever had much to do with these. But there is evidently plenty of support for Mansion-house.

The Siberian Railway

In a recent article "Engineering" gave an account of the movement in the United States tending towards improving the mileage of locomotives by working them through for longer distances than formerly, changing the crews two or three times en route. The "Railway Review" of Chicago gives an account of what is believed to be, up till the present, the record of operation of this kind. The service is on the Southern Pacific Company's system, and a special class of 4-8-2 type locomotive has been designed and built. Oil is used for fuel, and the engines in this service are reported to be doing 12,000 miles per month. The distance covered by the regular run is no less than 815 miles without changing locomotives. The schedule speed works out to between 24 and 26 miles per hour with trains of from 12 to 14 passenger, baggage and mail cars. One is forced to wonderment why the Soviet Government, in such urgent need of money, and having to hand such a fine source of revenue as the Trans-Siberian Railway, does not copy some of the initiative referred to above. Even with the Russian Government at its best, really very little was made of the line. The writer was in Tientsin in just 14 days after leaving Liverpool Street Station, this including the sea trip, and stops of many hours at The Hook, Berlin, Alexandrova, Warsaw, Moscow, Harbin and Changchun, and a breakdown in the middle of Siberia which caused a delay of several hours. Much of the line then was single-track, the engines used wood fuel and the train continually was held up for military and other Government trains. Yet the journey only took 14 days. Mr. H. E. Morriss has just arrived Home, travelling by approximately the same route, in about three weeks and it seems obvious that if a directorate such as that of the old Great Western, or one of the big American railways, had the management of the line, the journey would occupy well under a fortnight. If that were so, every berth on every train running out and Home would be occupied and the revenue would be worth having.

A People's Songs

In one of the numerous histories of the Franco-Prussian War a writer ventures the opinion that the success of Bismarck's legions practically from the first day in the field was due as much as anything to the fact that they were concentrated for some while along the border waiting for the declaration of war that everyone knew would come and that during the interval they were encouraged to sing in chorus what unromantic people of the present day term "Jingo" songs, but which could more honourably be styled patriotic ballads. Outstanding amongst those German ballads was the essentially patriotic, even though somewhat boastful, "Watch on the Rhine," a sonorous and powerful song that must stir others as well as Germans, just as "The Marseillaise," "Rule Britannia" and "The Standard on the Braes o' Mar" appeal to others besides Frenchmen, Englishmen and Scottish Highlanders. There can be no doubt that songs of this sort, with a good, swinging, defiant tune that can be roared out by voices beyond all hope of reaching concert pitch, do exert an immense influence on any man who has a country to be proud of and who has the spirit to be proud of his country. Really there was no particular reason why this year's Empire Day celebrations should excel in enthusiasm those of several other years which could be mentioned. At the same time, certainly there never has been a more enthusiastic gathering at the Shanghai Club. It was but natural that sporting Britons should shout themselves hoarse in recognition of the gallant Capt. d'Oisy, it was but fitting that they should be stirred by the fine speech of their Consul-General and proud of the kindly testimony of Mr. Fessenden to the worth of their Empire, and they sang the "National Anthem" with the usual spirit. Yet the first few notes of Mr. Heughan's "Land of Hope and Glory" made a tremendous difference and staid old gentlemen could be seen joining in the refrain more lustily probably than they had done for a quarter of a century. Good songs exert a wonderful influence.

Highway Robbery

Destiny again, equally capricious and inexplicable in the case of animals and of men, as we moralized at great length a week or two ago. On Tuesday morning a lady and gentleman were driving along Avenue Haig, close by Nanyang College, when the lady's eye was caught by the sight of a Chinese girl dragging something along the road by a string. The "something" was a cat, cruelly bound about with twine, which, as subsequent investigation showed, had cut deeply into the poor beast's body, and generally bearing marks of brutal usage. Thereupon the brakes were jammed on and the lady sprang from the car in pursuit of the girl, who incontinently fled, conscious of her own abominableness. The cat was so tightly tied that it took some time to loose it. The usual crowd collected and presently a virago, who realizing the lady's evident intention to carry off the cat from its tormentors, poured forth a torrent of abuse and as this was unavailing tried to regain the cat by force armes. It was explained to her that she and her ilk of a girl had proved themselves unworthy of owning any animal let alone a cat, that she would be prosecuted (steps to this end are being taken) for that have the cat back she should not. Whereupon the lady leisurely mounted the car, gears were shipped in, and the cat was saved. It may be mentioned that the crowd were obviously and wholly upon the lady's side. One would say that the ex-owner of the cat was known. This is the true story of a flagrant piece of highway robbery in an excellent cause.

The Love of Zion

A pamphlet appealing to local Jews to subscribe to the Palestine Foundation Fund affords striking evidence of the success, both moral and material, attending the efforts of Jewry all over the world to stem for ever Israel's wanderings through the ages. Every Jew, from the financier to the San Francisco clothes-presser and colonist in Palestine, is eagerly doing his bit for the cause. The devotion of the colonists appears worthy of the Pilgrim Fathers themselves. Sir Alfred Mond, in an article reprinted in the pamphlet, says:

> You can go down the streets of Jerusalem as I did. You will meet men who have walked 800 miles from the interior of Persia to Bombay and taken the ship to Palestine. You will meet some one who came all the way from Shanghai, you will meet some one who came from Boston, some one who came from Winnipeg, who came from Roumania, who came from Italy. They come from all over—from the East and West. They cannot yet understand each other. They cannot yet speak the same language, but they all have the same feeling, the same thought: to do something to help Palestine.

Yet it was only yesterday, one might say, that the movement to unite Jewry was purely philanthropic and sentimental in aim, while as comparatively recently as in 1894 the position of Jews on the Continent of Europe was almost mediæval. Now, happily, by the Balfour Declaration, their emancipation in future ages is assured. That they will, in the words of the Palestine Mandate, "prove successful in placing the country under such political administration and economic conditions as will secure the establishment of the Jewish National Home," is also assured, if the heartening messages of eminent Jews to their Shanghai brethren are to be believed. "The Jews in China (Dr. B. Feiwel writes) though few in number, are deeply conscious of their fellowship." That they are as eager as those in other parts of the world to colonize successfully the Jewish Homeland is demonstrated by the opening of a fund in Shanghai to establish a garden city in Palestine. To this fund Mr. F. S. Eadoorie, President of the Zionist Organization in China, has undertaken to give a monthly subscription of $500 until a considerable sum has been accumulated, while nine other local Jews have each donated the same handsome sum.

The Death Ray

Even without the statement issued by the Air Department, one had suspected that there was a good deal more in the story of Mr. Grindell Matthews and the "death ray" than had yet transpired. In the Far East it is only a fortnight or so since the cables first told us of his invention and the claims made for it. But by newspapers now arriving it was being boomed at Home very much farther back than that. The story too of his hurry to get away to France and of the injunction which arrived at Croydon just an hour too late is curious. Why did he have to go by aeroplane instead of the ordinary train? Finally the statement by an official of the Air Department that there are inventors claiming to control similar rays is not devoid of probablity. With electrical knowledge what it has become in the past few years, and with the new problem of aerial invasion to set all wits at work, it would be strange if Mr. Grindell Matthews were the only inventor of a "death ray," assuming that his invention is what it is said to be. And all we know is that, after one trial in the laboratory, the Government's experts wanted a simpler and more conclusive test: by to-day's telegrams their wish seems to have been fully justified. Far be it from us to defend any Government official, least of all those of the British Government, who, almost traditionally, are supposed to take a delight in discouraging native talent and allowing it to be snapped up by more enlightened competitors abroad. But one has heard of these inventors before, on whom the pejuntry and narrowness of Government departments has declined to spend the national money despite all the warnings of the sensational Press, and the ways of the latter do not leave one without misgiving that perhaps after all the departments know a thing or two.

Wheelbarrows

The latest number of "Punch" to hand contains a humourous reference to the naming of various commodities in the British Army. An extract from Army Orders is given in which it is stated that "the War Stock of 'Soap, scouring' will be accounted for in bars instead of by weight, and will be designated 'Soap, scouring, bars (reputed 1 lb)'". There is no doubt that the British Army has adopted, or inherited, a most fearsome nomenclature for the description of the most commonplace, every-day items, and the mere tyro on Army matters, on encountering such a nomenclature for the first time, is apt to ponder, to marvel, and then to give it up as hopeless. For instance, the ordinary scrubbing brush is not called a scrubbing brush, but "brushes, scrubbing, hand, one" to distinguish it from the long-handled variety, it is to be supposed. And so with each and every item which claims official recognition by the War Office; the name invariably being many times more lengthy than the one it is commonly known by. This reminds us of the perfectly true incident that happened to an Infantry subaltern (now in Shanghai) who, immediately after the armistice, was sent in charge of an advance party to Catterick Camp to take over barracks and barrack stores preparatory to his regiment entering into occupation. Having been forced to check, to the minutest detail, the barrack (A.S.C.) stores, he proceeded to take over what are known as Engineer stores. He previously had noticed a very dilapidated wheelbarrow near the pioneer store, obviously impossible of being used. It was in such a condition that any normal person would have deemed it a useless task to apply a correct description to it. The Army had solved the problem, however, for on checking the list on the "boards, inventory (Engineer stores), one" he came across the following priceless description:—

"Barrows, wheel (without wheel), one."

NEWS FROM THE OUTPORTS

THE BANDIT OUTRAGE IN FUKIEN

Scene of the Attack on Mr. Dinsmore and Mr. MacKay One of the Worst Districts in China: Foreigners Hitherto Untouched: Suggested Result of the Failure to Avenge Lincheng

Reuter last Friday devoted eight lines to the news of the capture of one British subject and the death of another at the hands of brigands at Shahsien (Fukien). This is but one more outrage to add to a long list of similar incidents, and so common are they becoming that we are apt to forget their significance.

The victims in this case were Mr. Jay Dinsmore and Mr. MacKay, both of whom were employed with the China Import & Export Co., whose head offices are at Shanghai. Mr. Dinsmore escaped from the bandits, but died of his wounds. Mr. MacKay was captured and held, and the state of his health is unknown.

The party, consisting of the two Europeans and a Chinese interpreter (also captured), were travelling up and down the Min River and its tributary, the Shachiho, engaged in the work of felling trees and superintending the despatch of the lumber to its destination. Their work was of a highly dangerous character, for the country around is one of the worst bandit-infested areas in China, and has been so for many years past. The Chinese people there are terrified and cowed, but until this present incident no foreigner had been molested. It is a well-known fact that the majority of the timber companies working in this district have been in the habi. of paying the bandit chiefs some regular indemnity as a guarantee for the safety of their employees. Now, apparently, the immunity enjoyed by foreigners in this province is at an end, and it has been suggested to us by a well-known Shanghai authority on Chinese affairs that news of the Lincheng outrage, glorified and embellished to the discredit of the foreigners concerned, was the means of encouraging this last incident.

Troops Afraid to Act.

Many districts in this part of the country have been completely ruined by the activities of the bandits and soldiers, coupled with the wicked misgovernment of the Chinese officials. In the Yuki district, which lies to the east of the Shachiho the bandits are so bad, and their reign of terror so complete, that for the last two years troops have not dared to enter the country. When some time back two companies of soldiers were sent to the scene, they were ambushed and the soldiers massacred.

The authorities, as already stated, are largely responsible for this state of affairs. Negotiations are continually in progress between them and the bandit chiefs, in which the latter have invariably been promised protection provided they cease their depredations. Weak though such action was, it might yet have been successful had the officials kept their words. Instead, however, they broke faith with the bandits and executed their leaders, making matters even worse than before.

The Making of Outlaws.

An interesting story attaches to one of the most famous of these bandit chiefs—a man who is one of the most feared in the province. Originally he was a peaceful and respected merchant in the city of Yenpingfu. For some reason or other—principally his wealth—he incurred the displeasure of the military authorities. He was subjected to every kind of persecution, false charges were trumped up against him, and his life was made generally miserable. Weary and disgusted, he left his city to settle elsewhere and no sooner had he done so than the military seized his family and put them to death. Enraged and grief-stricken he took to banditry to revenge himself, and incidentally has been extraordinarily successful. His headquarters are now in Yuki Valley, and his stronghold is practically impregnable.

We understand that Mr. Dinsmore leaves a widowed mother, who was entirely dependent upon him. Mr. Dinsmore had been with the lumber company for many years, and was one of their most trusted members. Aged somewhere between 35 and 40 years, he was of a kindly disposition and well liked by all with whom he came in contact. Danger never made him swerve from the path of duty. We have been able to obtain no further news of Mr. MacKay.

Mr. Dinsmore's Funeral

Foochow, May 24.

The funeral of Mr. Dinsmore, who died as the result of a pistol wound inflicted by bandits, took place yesterday. The ceremony was an impressive one. The Civil Governor escorted the remains from the Bund to the grave.

Mr. Mackay and the Chinese are still in captivity in spite of the pressure brought to bear by the British and American Consulates.

The Yenping military have apparently not yet been instructed by the Tuli to act in the matter.

May 25.

The whereabouts and welfare of the captives are unknown. Mr. Carroll, of the China Import & Export Lumber Co., left Yenping to-day with a military escort for Shahsien. A representative of the Tuli also left Foochow to-day for Shahsien. —Reuter's Pacific Service.

May 27.

There is no news of Mr. Mackay and the three Chinese who were captured by bandits. The representative of the Tuli has joined Mr. Carroll's party at Yenping and will proceed to Shahsien.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

American Legation's Note to Waichiaopu Requesting Full Inquiry

Peking, May 26.

The American Legation sent a Note to the Waichiaopu on Saturday calling attention to the report of the murder of Mr. Dinsmore and expressing hope that a full inquiry would be held and that if the circumstances proved as reported, the murderers would be suitably punished. The Note added that the Legation hoped that Americans in future would be properly protected.

The British Legation has sent a Note to the Waichiaopu concerning the captivity of Mr. Mackay and asking the Chinese Government to take immediate steps for his release.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Mr. Mackay's Cruel Plight

Foochow, May 29.

Mr. Carroll, at Shashien, received a letter from Mr. Mackay dated May 26 in which he said that he was weak and that he hoped that early relief would be forthcoming. —Reuter's Pacific Service.

CHINESE CHARGE AGAINST MR. WEATHERBE

Peking, May 20.

The Waichiaopu has sent to the British Legation the deposition of the Octroi official, in connexion with the Weatherbe case, with a request that the matter be brought to the attention of the British Consul and that the Waichiaopu be notified of the date on which the case will be heard, so that a Chinese official observer can attend.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

BOMB OUTRAGE AT FOOCHOW

Foochow, May 27.

Two bombs were thrown at the Military Governor last evening. He was unhurt, but the Chief of Staff and also Gen. Lu Hsian-ting were wounded, and his chauffeur, two soldiers and a non-commissioned officer killed.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

An Association has been formed in Paris to urge the remission of the French share of the Boxer Indemnity.

FIVE MISSIONARIES CAPTURED

Fresh Outrage in Kuangsi: Party Sent to Relieve Colleagues in Kueilin

Peking, May 21.

The British missionaries, Mr. R. A. Jaffray and Mr. E. H. Caine, and the American missionaries, Messrs. Rex and Ray and Dr. Miller, travelling from Wuchow to Pinglo on board the American hospital-ship Roanoke, were captured by bandits at Taiwan, ten miles from Pienlo. The whole party were carried off into the hills.

This is the party, that was mentioned as proceeding to Kueilin with the object of succouring the missionaries in that beleaguered city with the approval of the local Chinese authorities, reports having reached Wuchow that two missionaries had been killed at Kueilin.

The American Vice-Consul, Mr. Chamberlain, has been sent to Wuchow from Canton to try to effect the release of the captured missionaries and to see what can be done for the missionaries at Kueilin.

The British and American Legations have drawn the attention of the Chinese Government to this latest outrage, requesting immediate steps towards the release of the captives.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

THE WUSIH SILK HARVEST

Averaging One Third of Normal Year: Farmers Holding out for Big Prices

From Our Own Correspondent

Wusih, May 28.

Mr. Carpenter, the well-known American writer of books of travel, spent a day in Wusih last week, where he was much interested in his observations of the silk industry.

The silk worm harvest this year averages only 30 per cent. Last Saturday the Cocoon Merchants Guild held a meeting and agreed to open 125 hongs. It was also agreed that no buying could be done from the farmers until a certain day fixed by the Guild. This is with a view to stabilizing the price. The first price to be offered the farmers will be $45 a picul. There is no likelihood, however, that the farmers will accept this price, in view of the scarcity of cocoons, and the price is likely to reach between $60 and $70.

Execution of Robbers.

Four robbers were executed on Sunday on the execution grounds just inside the South Gate. Twenty-four robberies have taken place within a mile of Wusih in the last three weeks, and it is believed that these four men were involved in all the robberies. The robberies had been commited among small shops of the poorer class, but emboldened by success the robbers were planning an attempt on the silk hongs. A unique feature which contributed to the success of the robberies was the judicious use of large fire-crackers, which were set off singly, in order to give the effect of pistol shots.

Rounding up the Beggars.

As is probably well-known to all old residents in China, there is a custom among beggars, which is actually upheld by the law, of levying a tax on all shops. This is collected by companies of beggars, and if the shopkeeper shows any reluctance about paying it, the beggars have a right to overturn or throw into the street all property in his shop. The Wusih Chief of Police is formulating a plan for collecting this tax and using it to establish a home for beggars, including industrial work, for those physically and mentally fit. If this plan receives the support of the gentry, as it doubtless will in so progressive a city as Wusih, it will almost certainly succeed, and will result in the removal of beggars from the streets. The proposed situation of the refuge is an unused rice store-house just outside the West Gate.

The Chinese Press announces with some flourish, that the Ministry of Interior in view of the influx of Russians is framing laws to prevent unemployed refugees from entering China. An excellent move, only rather late in the day.

THE CIVIL WAR IN KUANGTUNG

Fighting Prevented by Heavy Rainfall: Dispositions of Rival Forces

Canton, May 24.

Putting together the general trend of the situation in the region of the East River, the two contending forces under the command of Dr. Sun Yat-sen and Gen. Chen Chiung-ming, repectively, are not in a position to take the offensive against each other for the reason that because of the rainy season, every river in that district is swollen, although sectional skirmishes are taking place here and there. The combined troops under Dr. Sun Yat-sen, with the Hunan troops on the left wing and the Yunnan and Kuangsi troops on the right wing, are now holding their own against Gen. Chen Chiung-ming's troops with the troops under Gen. Lin Hu on the right wing and those under Gen. Yeh Chu on the left wing.

In the meantime, in the district of the West River, the troops under the command of Gen. Shen Hung-ying are still besieging Kueilin. Though rumour has it that Gen. Shen's troops have been defeated and retreated it appears to be groundless. The troops under Lu Fu-hsing belonging to Gen. Lu Yung-ting, reinforced by friendly troops in Matsuhsien, have already reached Kueilin. It seems probable, therefore, that the attack on Kueilin by Gen. Shen Hung-ying's troops will hardly bear fruit.

In the southern part of the West River, it has been repeatedly reported that Gen. Lin Chung-ting has pledged allegiance to Dr. Sun Yat-sen, but this report appears to be untrue, for the attitude of Gen. Lin Chung-ting is still uncertain, and a portion of his troops is being stationed in the region of Chinchow. Accordingly, it is reported, Dr. Sun contemplates making the Kuangsi troops in Wuchow confront Gen. Lin's troops. It is said that the troops under Gen. Li, belonging to Gen. Lu Yung-ting, which are stationed in Yulin, have communicated with Gen. Lin Chun-ting's troops stationed in the district of Chinchow. Rumour is rife that a portion of Gen. Shu Tsung-chi's troops stationed in the region of the East River has surrendered to Gen. Chen Chiung-ming.

Marshal Wu's Programme.

Of late, Marshal Wu Pei-fu has caused the Peking Government to announce the appointments of General Lin Hu as Tuli of Military Affairs of Kuangtung and of other officials of the same province. Marshal Wu is, at the same time, alleged to have formulated the following items as a counter-measure against Canton:—

(1) To station Gen. Sun Chuan-fang on the border of Fukien and to make him communicate with General Chen Chiung-ming's troops;

(2) To station Gen. Hung Chao-lin's troops in Chaochow and Swatow with their headquartes at Hweichow;

(3) To appoint Gen. Yang Ken-ju and Gen. Yeh Chu Commanders-in-Chief of the Northern Army and Southern Army, respectively, with a view to making a general attack upon Dr. Sun's troops.

(4) To compromise the discord between Chang Yi and Yang Shu-chuang at Swatow, thereby strengthening the union of the forces belonging to the North and to despatch the Northern Fleet to the South.

By the foregoing plan, Marshal Wu Pei-fu is reported to have resolved to solve the whole Canton question within the next three months. Upon receipt of the above news, Dr. Sun's headquarters are now discussing what steps should be taken against the probable general attack by the troops from the North. In case Marshal Wu's plan is realized and if the time of opening hostilities on such a large scale should really come, it is inferred that Dr. Sun's troops will adopt strategy on the basis of the presumption that the Northern troops will appear in the district of Shekung, advancing along the Canton-Kowloon line.—Eastern News Agency.

THE BESSELL OUTRAGE

Colonel Chen to Be Retried: British Legation Chinese Secretary Watching

Peking, May 28.

The Waichiaopu has informed the British Legation that the re-trial of Colonel Chen will be held at the Ministry of War on June 30.

Mr. Eric Teichman, Chinese Secretary to the Legation, will attend as official observer.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

ICHANG OLD RESIDENT

Ichang, May 19.

A garden-party was held to-day in the grounds of the British Consulate to bid farewell to the Rev. T. R. Kearney of the Church of Scotland Mission, who is about to return to Scotland after 30 years spent in Ichang. Mr. Kearney was presented by Mr. Eastes, the Consul, with a printed testimonial mounted on silk and a leather suit case as a parting gift from the foreign community.

The river above Ichang is likely to create a record for low water this year. The large ships which went up to Chungking on a temporary rise over five weeks ago are still perforce anchored there.

The Alice Dollar was reported to have touched rock on the way down, but cannot have been much damaged as she is now on her way up again.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

MANCHU EX-EMPEROR AT SUMMER PALACE

His First Appearance Outside Peking City

Peking, May 24.

The Manchu Emperor and Empress paid a visit to the Summer Palace to-day. The Emperor left the Forbidden City in a motor-car soon after 11 a.m., accompanied by Mr. R. F. Johnston. The Empress and three daughters of Prince Ch'un (the ex-Regent) followed in another car, and in the remaining cars (about seven in number) were seated Mr. Chang Hsiao-hsu (Comptroller of the Household), Messrs. Shao-Ying and Ch'i Ling (Ministers of the Household) and other Palace officials and officers of the Guard.

This was not only the first time the Manchu Emperor had visited the Summer Palace, but the first time he had ever left the city of Peking.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

OSAKA LABOUR UNREST

Gasworks, Trams, Iron and Coal All Affected

Osaka, May 27.

There have recently been many labour troubles here. For instance, a strike of over 300 gas-workers has seriously interfered with the supply of fuel to households and works. Over 100 conductors and motormen of the Suburban Tramway have struck, while the operatives of a large spinning mill have also ceased work. Other strikes included over a thousand workers at the Osaka Ironworks and 1,500 workers at the Miike Coal Mine. These strikes are regarded as a counter-offensive by labour against possible reduction of wages and other unfavourable measures.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Mr. W. C. Woodfield, Rear-Commodore of the Shanghai Yacht Club, has received full proof of the necessity of giving precise details when ordering goods from Chinese. He designed a racing burgee for his new sailing sampan, the Wraith—a striking figure of a ghost on a black ground—and gave the sketch to a sailmaker with the verbal order for a silk burgee, "twelve by twelve." His surprise may be imagined when a few days later he untied a parcel and found a beautiful silk burgee 12 feet square! Mr. Woodfield now is thinking of buying one of the old Shamrocks on which to mount the burgee.

TIBETAN CRUELTY

Priest's Torture in a Lamasery in 1910 Recalled by Death of Fr. Davenas

From Our Own Correspondent.

Tachienlu, Sze., Apr. 29.

Père Davenas, one of the local French fathers, died this afternoon at two o'clock. His death, after a long illness, is the direct result of ill-treatment received many years ago during his residence in the interior when he was a martyr to Tibetan cruelty. During the year of Revolution he was stationed at Dawo, six days beyond Tachienlu and on the main north road to Lhasa. The change of government left the border in a very chaotic condition. Chinese troops were hurried from the frontier to defend the old dynasty. The sudden exodus of Chinese soldiers gave the Tibetans an opportunity to rebel and retaliate on the undermanned garrisons. This they were not slow to do and many a bloody deed enacted in Eastern Tibet at that time has passed on unrecorded in history. However, a day of reckoning came and the Tibetans paid dearly for the advantage they took of the depleted garrisons. Dawo was one of the places which suffered very severely. At that time it had a large lamasery with nearly 2,000 resident lamas. As soon as the Chinese soldiers had retired, Pére Davenas and the local Chinese magistrate were seized and hurried into the lamasery. For ten long weary days they suffered the most cruel and ignominious treatment—death, if lamaism had permitted it, would have been a kindness. In the temple courtyard they were stripped naked and securely fastened to two stakes. They suffered extremely from the sun by day and severely from the cold by night. The poor French father was insulted and suffered bodily injuries daily. Tied thus to a stake in the open temple courtyard, magistrate and Catholic priest were jeered at by the lamas. During 1910, the year before the Revolution, I remember seeing Père Davenas in Tachienlu. He was then a young man of about 26 with a long, full brown beard. He looked the very picture of health.

While tied to the wooden stake in the temple courtyard, the lamas, as they passed in and out of the temple, pulled one hair out of the French father's beard and slapped him on the face. After every hair had been pulled out, he and the Chinese official were dragged about the courtyard and finally to edge of the Yalong, presumably to be thrown into the river. For some reason they were dragged back again.

A Terrible Retribution.

A few days later several hundred Chinese soldiers came suddenly down on Dawo. The priest and magistrate were immediately released and the Chinese soldiers gave the lamas three days to think about their behaviour. About midnight a light appeared in the lamasery; the cause was unknown. Fearing the lamas should try to escape the soldiers surrounded the temple buildings and to them a quite justifiable carnage commenced. Hundreds of lamas were killed; the lamasery was looted and destroyed. Père Valentin and another Frenchman went up to Dawo and brought Père Davenas down to Tachienlu.

Since that dreadful experience the priest's health has never been the same. The awful uncertainty as to his final fate must have told severely on his nerves. Ever since, he has walked about a broken man, mentally and physically. And now the end has come and Père Davenas has gone to his rest. The Sisters in the French Hospital here have done all that nursing skill could do. Some weeks ago there was very little hope of the priest's recovery; the illness was too protracted and the nervous shock too severe to hold out any hope.

Never Desert Their Flocks.

The life lived by the French priests along the frontier here must be exceedingly lonely; apparently they don't adopt the policy of putting two in one place, simply for companionship. In eight different centres along the border here there are eight French priests located. Many of those centres are away among the mountains and in sometimes very isolated places. They all exert a good influence ever the people and by constantly living among them are able to see their work come to fruition. Along the Tibetan frontier here their work is specially well and widely known.

NORTHERN CHINA SUFFERING FROM DROUGHT

Serious Shortage of Wheat: How the Evil Might Have Been Averted if Advice of Famine Relief Association Had Been Taken

From Our Own Correspondent.

Kaifeng, Ho., May 20.

For many months prior to the beginning of May the whole of northern China, and especially was it so in Honan, suffered from an alarming drought. It began to look very serious for the wheat crop in this and the neighbouring provinces for the wheat straw was but six or seven inches long, and was rapidly yellowing, with a head not quite half the length of a head in the ordinary year. Early in the month very good rains fell in this district, but other districts have still to record the absence of rain, and word comes from Shansi that no rain has fallen there. From those who have travelled extensively it is inferred that the wheat will be from four-tenths to a half crop in Honan; about one-fifth of a crop in Northern Kiangsu; a half crop in Shantung; six-tenths crop in Chihli; and but four-tenths in Shansi. With the rains that have fallen over a considerable stretch of the north the ripening has been arrested and the heads will fill, so that generally speaking there will be half of a wheat crop in the north country. This will mean distress, but as the seeding for the later crops had been speeded by the rains there is a feeling of satisfaction that there will not be the dread threat of famine.

A Lost Opportunity.

Apropos of this whole problem of recurring crop failure and famine distress, it is interesting to note what an opportunity Honan has at the very present time of grappling with the question of prevention. The Honan International Famine Relief Association has been reorganized on lines approved by the Peking Commission. It has engaged permanent executive secretaries, both Chinese and foreign, and is pitiful to hear concurrent reports difficulties connoted in the words "Famine prevention."

The present opportunity arises from the willingness of the Commission to fully co-operate with the local forces both in the allocation of expert men and the appropriation of money to carry through an adequate survey of the Yellow River and to project plans for a comprehensive conservancy scheme.

From the reports one gets of the Association work, rather of their proposals for work, the public cannot but approve their schemes, which are wholly calculated to insure crops and to lessen or prevent the chances of future famines and their consequent distress. It is very pitiful to hear concurrent reports that the Honan authorities are not giving any active support to the schemes proposed by the Commission. Not only has no support been given but there seems to be a spirit of opposition manifested by Marshal Wu Pei-fu to this work that on the very face of it should commend itself to his better judgment.

The Yellow River.

When Mr. O. J. Todd was in Honan he made a report to the Association containing some most interesting features. His proposal was that the Yellow River control is at present the most important engineering problem in Honan. Properly to recommend any schemes for the solution of this problem, most careful studies should be made extending over a period of several months. Undoubtedly the schemes that would be approved on the basis of this field work would call for improvement along the river for a distance of about 250 miles, from the loes hills northwest of Loyang to the Chihli boundary. If these schemes could be carried through they would add approximately $50,000,000 to the wealth of the province in newly reclaimed farm lands besides preparing the way for extensive irrigation and refertilization works along the river.

In some parts that came under the chief engineer's notice the river is from five to 10 li wide, and in these parts the stream is but from one to two feet deep. It could be narrowed down to one and a half li and the stream deepened to 30 feet. If this were done there would be a million mow of land reclaimed undoubtedly, and the river banks so under such a scheme would be so built that there would not be the constant threat of overflow of the river waters in the time of heavy rainfall.

American Boxer Indemnity.

Just now it is interesting to speculate what might have been the possibilities of getting some of the refund of the American Boxer indemnity if Marshal Wu had given a sympathetic hearing to the representations that were made to him several months ago. The Association is still waiting for an answer to several letters asking for official sanction for the start of this engineering field work along the river. In the meantime the Association is sending a telegram to Washington asking that President Coolidge will consider this great work of Yellow River conservancy, when deciding what China should do with the refunded money.

PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE

Attempt to Rush it Through American Senate

Washington, May 28.

An attempt may be made this Session to secure affirmative action, either in the Senate or the House of Representatives, on a Bill providing for the future Independence of the Philippines. Two such Bills are now pending—one introduced by Senator Hiram W. Johnson, granting independence within 25 years, and the other, drafted by Representative L. W. Fairfield, fixing the period at 20 years. The Filipino Independence Mission, which is now here, told Mr. John W. Weeks, Secretary of War, that either Bill would be satisfactory.—Reuter's American Service.

According to the Chinese press the Ministry of Foreign Affairs has lodged a strong protest with the Soviet Delegation in Peking, and presented a bill for heavy indemnities, in connexion with several raids made by Russians in Siberia across the Chinese border where they are said to have shot a number of Chinese and looted their homes.

CAPT. DOLLAR'S TRIBUTE TO SHANGHAI

New York, May 3.

Shanghai, in arrivals and clearances, has become the second greatest port of the world, Captain Robert Dollar, veteran steamship owner and President of the Dollar Steamship Company, told a large group of business men at a luncheon given in his honour yesterday at India House. New York, said the Captain, held first place. Captain Dollar gave his observations everywhere on his recent trip round the world, but emphasized particularly the vast growth of China.—Reuter's American Service.

AEROPLANE FATALITY AT FOOCHOW

Foochow, May 27.

The airman, M. Savanoff, fell this morning and was drowned in Pagoda Anchorage.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

The Dragon Festival has once again given rise to much anxiety and worry in official circles, says a Northern paper. Within the next two weeks there will be pressing demands for pay on all sides. It is generally estimated that the total amount required for the Festival is somewhere around $8,000,000.

CHINA'S NATIONAL DISGRACE AGAIN

Nationalism-cum-Bolshevism: Anti-foreign Fostered in Schools

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Wuchang, May 16.

Although the anti-Japanese boycott has practically died out, a good deal of anti-Japanese, and in general anti-foreign, propaganda is still being carried on. A very poisonous type of so-called socialist (though really anti-social) views are being spread by some society or societies whose name is not revealed. The evidence lies in certain anonymous pamphlets, which arrive by post from time to time. These pamphlets are sent to schools, in envelopes addressed to the whole body of students. In missionary institutions, they probably find their way into the fire or the waste-paper basket before they ever reach the eyes of schoolboys; but there is no doubt that in government schools they are being widely circulated, and they possibly have a good deal of influence over some of the more ignorant and headstrong.

The kind of ideas which are thus circulating in some sections of the student-world are illustrated by a pamphlet which recently came into the hands of the writer. It is called Tract No. 57, "Kao Ch'ing Nien," or "Call to Youth;" and the only clue to its origin are some characters stamped in red, and meaning "Youth's Section's of the Socialist Club." It was issued specially in connexion with the recent celebration of May 7, and a full translation is as follows:—

Japan Not the Only Oppressor.

"Beloved Young Citizens of China! We all know that ten years ago from to-day the twenty-one demands were granted by Yuan Shih-kai, whose infamy has lasted after his death. The oppressors who forced China to grant the twenty-one demands were the barbarous Japanese. But, we must recognize clearly that the usurpers of China's rights are not only the Japanese; the betrayers of China's rights are more than Yuan Shih-kai; China's national disgrace is not limited to the seventh day of the fifth month.

"The humiliation of the seventh day of the fifth month was the first step in the betrayal which China has suffered at the hands of the militarists. The oppression of the twenty-one demands was the commencement of a system of usurpation on the part of imperialist nations. At the present time, the great powers abroad and the militarist party at home, are plotting together against China's government. We Chinese people are the victims of this double oppression. The powers which are usurping China's sovereign rights are England, France, America, Italy and others. Not one of them is innocent. Why stop at Japan? Those who are betraying China's sovereign rights are the whole party of northern militarists. Not one is innocent. Why stop at Yuan Shih-kai? China's national disgrace consists in the following facts: our Customs are controlled by England; foreign warship sail up our rivers; extraterritoriality is extended to all ports. Not one of these things is not an encroachment. Why stop at the twenty-one demands?

"Beloved youth of China! To-day we loathe the betrayal of Yuan Shih-kai; do not forget the betrayal of all the northern militarists! We hate the oppression of Japanese imperialism; let us not be unmindful of the oppression of all the imperialistic nations! We are determined to avenge the twenty-one demands; let us not forget to avenge all the other national disgraces!

The Call to Youth.

"Beloved young fellow-countrymen! To begin with, we must clearly recognize that to-day we are founding a great republican club, of which the terrible watchward is, "Down with All Imperialism." It is not the abortive movement against Japan! We hate, and swear to destroy all the northern militarist traitors. It is not the dead Yuan Shih-kai!

"Beloved group of young men! We want to sift to the bottom, and to search out a patriotic policy, with the object of avenging our national disgrace. We must choose the artifice of a people's revolution. Abroad, we must oppose all imperialism; at home we must overthrow the northern militarists. We send you greetings. Long live the revolution!"

A notice to mariners issued by the Coast Inspector states that a light-beacon has been established on the mud flats adjacent to Tatungkow, entrance to the Yalu River, and is situated 1.75 miles S. ¶ deg. E., magnetic, from Tatungkow Custom House. This light, which was first exhibited on May 20, is unwatched, and shows a flashing white light every three seconds, thus:—

Light	0.3 sec.
Eclipse	2.7 sec.

and should be visible in clear weather for a distance of ten miles. The light is not exhibited during the winter when the Yalu River is closed by ice.

THE JADE WATER TEMPLE

A Famous Shrine and the Deities Who Rule The Ways of Life

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Mienchow, Sze., May 1.

The Jade Water Temple stands by the River Fuh on the north bank not far from where the city of Mienchow stood in days before the river washed it away: but that is another story.

It is a pretty spot. The temple stands amongst the trees, rising three storeys high in the usual style of Chinese architecture. It stands some distance from the present city, and was chosen by a party of attacking generals last year as a place suitable for a conference. They ensconced themselves in the middle storey along with Chen Chiang Wang Ie (the god who controls the waters) and his two friends, the god of wealth and a gentleman with three eyes. While they were in the midst of their deliberations a shell fell so close to the temple that they fled precipitately.

This temple is an interesting example of a Chinese pantheon. Facing one as one enters is the Song-tsi niang-niang, or Tao'st equivalent of the Buddhist son-giving goddess of mercy. To her left is another shrine containing a large image of the god who delivers mothers from the blood-pool; the blood-pool is one of the darkest creeds in Chinese mythology. A man was worshipping here, doubtless on behalf of his wife. On this god's left and right were the sun-god and moon-goddess, the Yang and Yin, or male and female principles of nature: the three together indicating what a hash Chinese religious thought has made of the sacredness of sex.

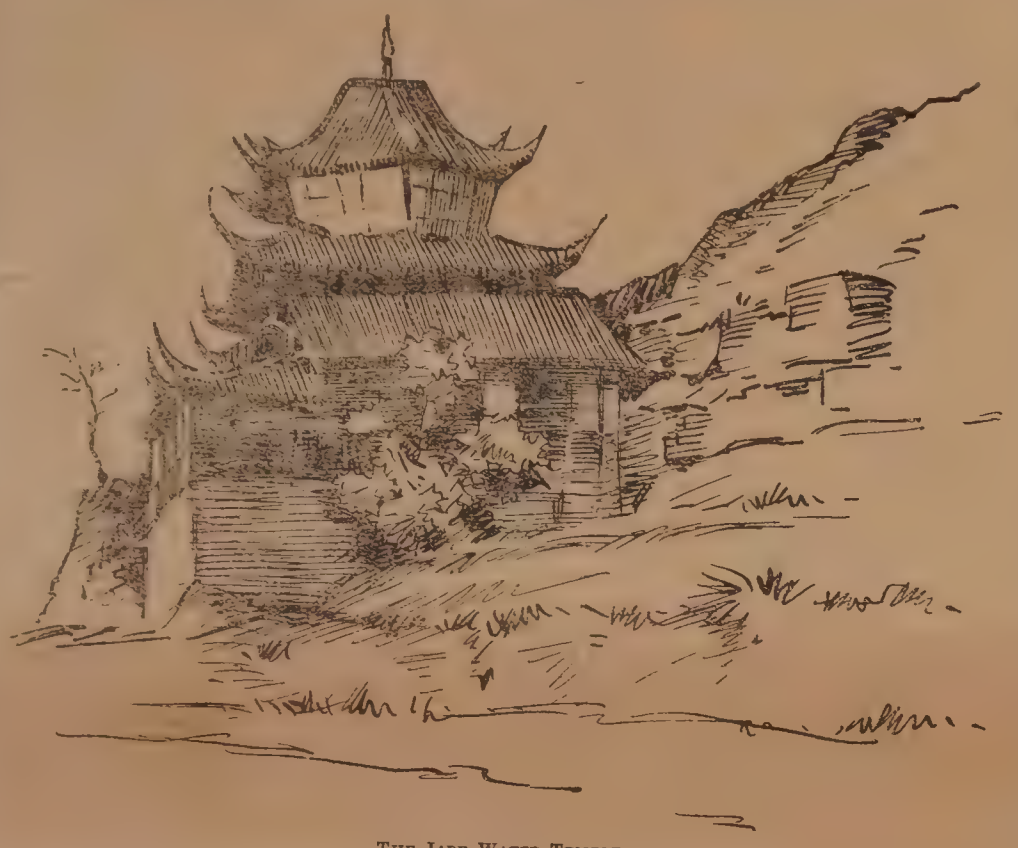
Potents of Marriage.

Within the temple to the right of the son-giver are the horse and cow-gods, both riding their respective animals. Some writers say that the horse and the cow are mutually antipathetic: e.g., a boy born under the horse must not marry a girl born under the cow. This would seem to be only partly true, for a necromancer seems to be able to decide that there may be exceptions to that rule, as also with the other antipathetic animals of the cycle.

Above the horse and cow gods are two shrines, the lower containing a Buddha, and the upper contains the thunder god, and his wife —Mrs. Lightning. On the ground floor to the extreme left of the temple is a spring where the Jade Water flows. In front of it is a large shrine containing the gods of war and literature. Kuan-yü, the god of war, was a famous general of the Three Kingdom period, a man as virtuous as he was brave and one to whom we need not deny hero-worship even though we begrudge him divine honours. Wen-chang, the god of literature, is said by Dr. Du Bose to be one of a triad with Kuan-yü and Confucius. The people up here say he was born at Tsitong, a city about 40 miles to the north of Mienchow. Above these two in a little shrine all to himself is Erlung, who causes Chen Chiang Wang Ie so much trouble as the turbulent inhabitant of the river. It is he, say the people about here, who makes the floods when he gets out of hand. Above him is a large pantheon of Buddhist gods and goddesses.

The People at Peace.

In the second storey, as we said above, are the god of the river, the god of wealth, and the dragon king (?). The inscription on their shrine ran:—"Erect a jade pivot and all things will be arranged and the people at peace."



THE JADE WATER TEMPLE

In the top storey, a single figure without a shrine is Kuei-sin, the star of literature. The temple, like many of the temples in Mienchow, is in a good state of preservation. The superficial observer may regard this as a bad omen in these days of transition, when China is supposed to be leaving the old paths. On the other hand we may argue that it is a sign of religious alertness on the part of the people. Mind is most certainly not so lethargic as it was 20 years ago. If the people are busy renovating their temples, it is also true that many are occupied in the search for something better. This temple stands for an old worn-out convention which will certainly pass before the impact of Christian civilization.

MONGOLIA A LAND OF PROMISE

Brides Leaving for U. S. A. before Bill Becomes Law

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Tokio, May 14.

In the belief that the new immigration law will prevent the entry of brides who are married after July 1 to the United States, bridegrooms here are hustling the "middle men" and the prospective brides. Husbands-to-be are booking every vacant berth on vessels sailing for the United States between now and July 1.

The O. S. K. str. Africa Maru, which was to leave for America on June 26, has changed her sailing date to June 14 to permit Japanese newly-weds to get to their adopted homes before the doors are closed.

A census of the Japanese hotels in Tokio and Yokohama reveals that they are full. Telegraphic reservations are pouring in from the country districts. Most of the passengers are travelling steerage.

With the United States unwilling to take Japanese emigrants, Mongolia is now being boosted as the best place for Japanese fare-abroads. A "Mongolia Club" has been organized for the purpose, and colonization in Mongolia is to be done on a business basis. A French syndicate, it is rumoured, has offered to finance the business partially.

"A land of great promise," reads part of a statement, in brochure form, to interest Japanese in going there. "The country is fine for stock raising and for agriculture and has valuable gold, silver and coal mines."

There are at present 13 Llama priests studying in Tokio and to their leader is ascribed the statement that Mongolia will welcome the Japanese, and that it will not be difficult to reach a workable agreement with China who claims sovereignty over Inner Mongolia.

SIR R. MACLEAY'S DINNER FOR ADMIRAL LEVESON

Peking, May 23.

There was a brilliant gathering at a dinner given by Sir Ronald Macleay, the British Minister, in honour of Admiral Sir Arthur Leveson, the Commander-in-Chief of the China Station, yesterday evening, the guests including Mr. Sun Pao-chi, the Ministers of Foreign Affairs, the Navy, Commerce and Communications, and General Wang Huai-ching, Sir Francis Aglen, Sir Ernest C. C. Wilton and other high officials.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

DR. SUN VERY MUCH ALIVE

Convincing Evidence from Capt. D'Oisy

Captain D'Oisy lent the "North-China Daily News" last Friday a postcard size photograph having a remarkable interest in view of the furious controversy raging still in Hongkong on the subject of whether Dr. Sun Yat-sen is or is not alive. The photograph shows the gallant aviator standing next to Dr. Sun Yat-sen at a reception given in Captain D'Oisy's honour in Canton on Sunday. The picture is unmistakably that of Dr. Sun and leaves no doubt in our mind as to his existence at the time the photograph was taken. There are a number of other Europeans also in the group, and standing on Dr. Sun's right hand side is a lady who looks very much like his wife. Captain D'Oisy stands on his left. The photograph was taken on the Sunday, but unfortunately is not good enough to re-print. This is the most conclusive evidence we have had in Shanghai regarding this point, and Dr. Sun's supporters and enemies alike may take it from us that on Sunday last the doctor was alive, and to all appearances quite able to all appearances quite able to stand unassisted.

THE GREAT ROAD IN CHEKIANG

Held for Want of Bridges: Soldiers Being Called off for Civil War

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT

Taichow, Chê, May 22.

For a time splendid work was done on the construction of the important provincial road, which is to run from Hangchow to Swatow. The portion between Taichowfu and Wong-ngaen was finished last year as far as the road itself was concerned. Nothing, however, has been done to build necessary bridges over intervening rivers or canals, so that the road for all practical purposes is useless. Only seasoned, well trained soldiers were put to work on making this road. When Chêkiang was threatened with attack a few months ago these old warriors were sent off to Ningpo and other important centres. Young soldiers took their place and as they needed so much time for drill the road was left without bridges. Whether it will be allowed to fall into such disrepair as to need remaking remains to be seen. Poor old China! What a pity it is her so-called patriots are unable to realize what harm they are doing their country by their threatenings of war and constant quarreling.

Two-headed Baby.

Quite a lot of excitement was caused a few weeks ago in the town and neighbourhood by the birth of a two-headed baby. The poor little monstrosity was quite healthy and well developed when it made its appearance to its astonished parents. They were so alarmed at the sight of it that the father promptly put it outside the house where it soon breathed its last. Speculation was rife as to what might have happened had it lived. Would both brains and hearts have worked in unison, or would one have wanted to sleep and the other have been equally desirous of going to a picture show? What a fortune he would have made, or they, had one throat developed a fine bass voice whilst the other possessed an equally beautiful tenor! The father unhappily was not gifted with a lively imagination, so the world has been deprived of one of its wonders. The people of Taichow came in crowds to see its two heads and necks, as it lay exposed in a box placed on a table outside the Mongtin-de hospital. Curiously enough a two-headed baby was born at Haemeng last year and met the same fate as befell its unfortunate brother near Taichow.

Russian Wanderers.

Had we not gazed upon the two-headed baby we might have been unduly startled at the sudden appearance amongst us of three travel-stained weary-looking Russians. They were walking from Shanghai to Canton hoping to get work at the latter city, having failed to find any at the former. They were asking help of foreigners as they came across them on their journey. Most of such foreigners being missionaries, I believe they will find ready and practical sympathy. The poor fellows were making a plucky effort and deserved help. Their appearance, however, raised a serious question. Is it wise for Europeans to be wandering about China destitutes and "begging their way?" A Chinese pastor who came across them and took them to a missionary, introduced them to him as "Laen-gonga-koh tao vaen nying," i.e. "three foreign baggars" I do not suppose the Chinese in Taichow had ever seen "foreign beggars" in their city before. As these men go from place to place their appearance and circumstances under which they travel are likely very materially to lower foreign prestige. One cannot but feel that it is worth while making more determined efforts to help these men in Shanghai where they become stranded, than to allow them to feel forced to undertake such difficult and trying expeditions as that upon which these three men had embarked. To render more effective help in Shanghai would be better for the men and for all concerned, though probably Shanghai people feel they have done more than their share already.

WANTED, A BILL OF RIGHTS FOR SZECHUAN

Peace Society on the Szechuan "War that was to End China's Civil Wars"

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Luchow, Sze., May 3.

Perhaps one direct result of the conference of war lords here was the allotting of various generals and their troops to various places. Thus we have at last been relieved of some of our superfluous soldiery On my way home from a trip into the country the other day I sat by the roadside and waited for what seemed a very long time, but in reality was perhaps not more than 20 minutes, while Yuan Tsu-ming's Kueichow division passed by in a continuous stream. My chairmen said there were more than 10,000 of them; I doubted if there were quite so many as that. There are still many left here.

Plain Speaking at Peace Meeting

This week we were invited to a peace meeting at the government middle school. We went with some hopes that perhaps the common people were at last going to rouse themselves and try to do something, but alas! the personnel and character of the meeting did not bear out our hopes. There seemed to be scarcely any one of any importance present, and all that transpired was an effusion of unprepared speechs with no special point to them. One speaker, a divisional commander, said that it was a case of "like people like soldiers," or in other words that the character of the soldiery was determined by the character of the people from amongst whom they came. The people did not like to hear that, but one cannot but feel that there is truth in it, and that every country gets what government it deserves. The aims of the society were set out on a printed sheet and were roughly as follows.

"The War to End Wars"

"AIMS OF THE PETITION OF RIGHT SOCIETY"—For the past ten years our province has seen almost daily fighting. The rich have been drained of their money, the poor of their strength. There are soldiers in every city and robbers on every road. We common people have suffered so greatly at their hands that we can scarcely bear it any longer. Our woe is unutterable. For the past two years we have hoped that the "war to unite our divided country," as carried on by the northern war lords, would bear fruit. When the northern party in Szechuan was defeated the year before last, they issued posters promising compensation for the losses of war. Since that there has been more than another year of war and the people have directly and indirectly suffered much more. So in seeking for a plan to save our lives, we are organizing a society with the purpose of petitioning our leaders to have pity on us. Chêngtu and Chungking are now free from war, but robbers still abound and we people still suffer at the hands of the soldiers as in time of war, and we have never received any of the promised compensation.

According to the constitution of the Republic, the people should rule. Now that there is no fighting we take this opportunity of presenting our "petition of rights." Our society has only this aim—to save the people from their plight and we hope that in the future there will be no such hardships as in the past. We ask for compensation for the sufferings of the past and guarantees for the future. As conditions are now, schools cannot carry on their classes and farmers cannot cultivate their land.

All this reminds one somewhat of the old story of how the mice all met in solemn conclave one night to discuss ways and means of saving themselves from the cat. After much discussion they decided to adopt the plan of one of the younger mice, namely to tie a bell around the cat's neck so that they could hear her coming and so escape. An older mouse, however, poured cold water on this plan by casually asking "who would bell the cat." One cannot help asking "who will bell the military cat." We can all heartily agree with the sentiment of this slight note of protest, but not yet have we seen a Pym or a Hampden come forward to champion the cause of the people.

Rumoured Plot Against North

There has just been another big conference of army chiefs and three at least of those who fought with the first army throughout the year were present, including no less a personage than the redoubtable Liu I-chiu, former dictator in Chêngtu, and perhaps the richest man in Szechuan before the last turn-over. How much of his wealth has melted away we cannot tell. The purpose and scope of this conference was, of course, not revealed, but there have been distinct whisperings that it was anti-Yang Sen in spirit, and the fear is prevalent that it is only a matter of time, and perhaps not a very long time, before more rivals arise to try their luck at chasing him out of the province. The alleged complaint is that he has handed out all the honours to his own men and has forgotten those numerous others who were less intimately connected with him perhaps but yet espoused his cause.

CHRISTIAN EDUCATION IN CHINA

The Nucleus of a Central China University at Wuchang

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Wuchang, May 19.

Last Saturday was the annual Speech-Day of Wesley College. In spite of bad weather, quite a number of guests braved the discomfort of Wuchang ricshas, and came to honour the prize-giving ceremony with their presence. The morning sermon in the college chapel was preached by the Rev. A. M. Sherman of Boone University. In the afternoon, the prizes and certificates were distributed by Mr. A. W. J. Watt, manager of the Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation.

In the course of his report, the Principal of Wesley, the Rev. G. M. Thomas, remarked that the number of boarders this term is 197—an advance on all previous records. With the completion of the new buildings which are now in process of erection there will be accommodation for 250 boys. This advance has, in large part, been made possible by the generous assistance which has been given to the institution by the Shanghai British Chamber of Commerce. Last December, six boys were successful in passing the Matriculation Examination of Hongkong University, one of whom obtained honours. One obtained distinction in European History, and all passed with distinction in Mandarin.

Reference was also made to a new development which will commence next September. This is, a Union College for higher education in which the three institutions, Boone University, Griffith John College and Wesley College will each take a share. By the generosity of the American Church Mission, a large part of the campus of Boone University will be set aside for the new college; and a part of the existent buildings will be adapted for use as a hostel by students sent by the Wesleyan Missionary Society and the London Missionary Society. The present Boone College, instead of being known as Boone University, will become the Boone College of the Central China University. It is confidently expected that, as the new enterprise grows, other missions will be eager to have a share in it, and will send students and appoint representatives on the faculty. Thus a real university will develop out of a somewhat modest beginning, and will supply a need which has long been felt by all who have been interested in the Christian education of Central China.

The scheme just outlined is the most important development which has taken place within the last decade in connexion with Christian education in this centre. It is not a new idea. As long ago as 1909, Lord William Gascoyne-Cecil visited China with the express purpose of surveying the field and finding out how the need for higher education of a Christian type could be best met in China. The result of his visit was the plan for a big University in Wuchang. The scheme was taken up enthusiastically both at Oxford and at Cambridge, and a fund was inaugurated to supply the necessary equipment. But unfortunately, the Great War broke into these schemes, and the whole project was left in abeyance.

Since the war, endeavours have been made to revivify the sceme; but for one reason and another it has been found impracticable to bring it to life again on its original large scale. But quite recently the way has opened for a beginning, upon a much more modest plan; and now, with the whole-hearted co-operation of the three missions concerned, and an assured backing from some of the leading merchants of Hankow, there seems every prospect of a commencement which will, in the course of time and by a natural growth, become what many have been hoping for and working for during many years.

MR. CYRUS WOOD'S RESIGNATION

Deeply Regretted by Japanese: Should He Stay to Ensure Peace in Pacific?

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT

Tokio, May 21.

A chorus of regrets from all over the Empire followed the public announcement of Mr. Cyrus E. Woods' resignation. Mr. Woods has made it clear that his resignation is not due to the immigration question, but because of the injury received by his mother-in-law, Mrs. Marchand, at the time of the earthquake. In a letter to Mr. Katsuji Inahara, managing editor of the English edition of the Tokio "Nichi Nichi" who pleaded with Mr. Woods in a striking editorial article, to stay in Japan "because of your responsibility to remain here and help in preventing the outburst of untoward occurrences which threaten the peace of the Pacific," the American Ambassador to Japan says:

> My dear Sir,—I have been much impressed with your editorial. . . I know that the Japanese people are my friends and the Japanese people know that I am their friend. We lived together through the memorable days of the disaster of last September and that has established a relationship between us stronger and more vital than many years of any other association could do.
> It is because of this friendship existing between us that I want the Japanese people to understand my position now. I am leaving here with the very deepest regret. If I were to follow my own inclination, I should remain. Unfortunately the injury received by my mother (Mr. Woods has always regarded Mrs. Woods' mother as his mother) at the time of the earthquake has affected her health to such an extent that I feel the duty incumbent on me to return home with her. She is quite old and I feel that her remaining days should be spent in our own home in the United States. This is the reason why I am resigning my position here, but I wish to assure the Japanese people that, even after my return home, I shall not lose my interest in Japan, but will do everything in my power to promote a right understanding between Japan and the United States.

This letter was the outcome of the ablest editorials on the immigration tangle that has yet appeared in the press here. Among other things, the editorial said "we sense a smouldering indignation in the bosom of the populace which will blaze forth like a volcanic eruption: the heat of the general election cools down and the general public is brought back to normal and made to realize the significance of the present (immigration) issue. . . We gather that your law-makers are bent on insulting us, and, if such be their intention, they have well achieved it, for at no time have we felt as insulted as at the present moment. This anger, this indignation, will not be quenched for years to come. . . We feel that the storm of public indignation is slowly, but steadily, gathering. . . When our people come to realize fully the significance and the far-reaching effect which the new regulation will have on the status of the Japanese people, they may be depended on for voicing their resentment in a manner not strictly in conformity with the ideals of pacifists dreamers. . . There will be a combined effort on the part of the intelligent sections to prevent the excited populace from committing acts against the people under your protection in a fit of momentary outburst without waiting for the police and gendarmes. . . Stay and co-operate with us for the peace of the Pacific!"

Smouldering Fires.

Is it possible that the indignation of the nation will go to extremes, precipitating a terrible crisis? The admirable manner in which the people have suppressed their emotion has been excellent, but suppressed emotion, when let off, is liable to blaze all the fiercer. It is quite true that the general elections have engrossed the attention of the public, almost to the exclusion of the immigration question, especially that of the intelligentsia, and many thought, that, while the wound would rankle for years perhaps, anything like the populace getting out of hand is not probable. Impulses, however, whether of individuals or of collections of individuals, cannot easily be controlled.

Mr. Hanihara to Resign Too?

The Japanese regard the resignation of Mr. Woods as a sacrifice to duty, despite the Ambassador's statement that private considerations force him to resign. The Japanese have always demanded that a person, when he fails to do what he regards as his duty by the State, regardless of whether it is his fault or not, should sacrifice himself. In the olden days hara-kiri was resorted to. Nowadays it is resignation. Ambassador Wood's resignation is regarded as a species of hara-kiri and as the only correct thing for him to do. Despite denials Mr. Hanihara will undoubtedly resign too.

The devotion that he has shown to his mother-in-law, especially on that awful day in September last, when Mr. Woods carried Mrs. Marchand, wounded, commandeered a ricsha, and, in the absence of a kurmaya-san (ricsha puller) got between the shafts himself and pulled his aged mother-in-law to safety, has endeared him to the Japanese as much as his efforts for promoting friendship and amity between the two nations. This is but natural in a land where the family system and parental reverence is the basis of all life and what proceeds from life.

Mr. Woods has been the best known and most respected of all the representatives that Japan has had since the time of Townshend Harris. His name is known and revered throughout the Empire. His resignation is generally interpreted as meaning that the exclusion measure has gone beyond recall, especially as it synchronizes with the Senate's over-riding of the President's possible veto.

JAPANESE POLITICS

The Selection of a Premier

Kioto, May 26.

Owing to the presence of Prince Saionji, who is the Regent's Chief Adviser in the selection of the next Premier, the political centre has shifted here. Callers on the aged statesman include the Premier, Viscount Kiyoura, who had two hours' tête-à-tête yesterday.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

LEPROSY IN INDIA

"Prejudice of Public Opinion"

BY A STUDENT IN A PHILADELPHIA SCHOOL

The annual report of the Calcutta School of Tropical Medicine contains a chapter on leprosy research by Dr. E. Muir, who states that the most encouraging results in leprosy are those obtained in early cases.

"Our experience shows," he states, "that leprosy can almost always be diagnosed long before it has become infectious, that is to say, the disease may be recognized by clinical signs long before bacteriological examinations are positive. We have further found that most early cases lose all signs of active disease within a few months, if they remain regularly under treatment and comply with instructions given with regard to sanitation, diet and general habits.

"The most hopeful method of dealing with leprosy must, therefore, depend on early diagnosis and early treatment. To carry this out, dispensaries are essential, which must be situated within easy reach of the patients and conducted by medical men who are well qualified to diagnose and treat leprosy. One of the greatest difficulties, however, in carrying out this line of action is the long-standing prejudice of the people.

"A proposal was made to erect an institute in Calcutta for the treatment of early cases of leprosy, to be equipped with an adequate laboratory for research purposes. It was proposed to erect this institute on the opposite side of the street from the School of Tropical Medicine. But so great was the opposition raised by the local inhabitants that the scheme had to be abandoned. The inhabitants evidently preferred that the hundreds of early cases of leprosy in their midst should remain untreated till, they had reached the more advanced stages of the disease. It is evident that whatever remedies may be brought forward by research will be of little avail until the ignorance and superstition of the public has been enlightened."

The report also states that it is hoped that the British Empire Leprosy Relief Association, recently formed in London, will lend a helping hand in dealing with the great problem of leprosy in India. Thanks largely to the magnificent work of Sir Leonard Rogers, the control of the much dreaded scourage of leprosy had now become practicable.

MOST VAST CHINESE SPORTS MEETINGS

Are These Large Undertakings Really the Best Thing for Chinese Schoolboys

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Wuchang, May 15.

The Wu Han athletic sports of a fortnight ago have been followed by the Central China Sports, which were held in Changsha last Friday and Saturday. These again, are to be followed by the National (All-China) sports, which will be held in Wuchang the week after next, May 22—24. The Central China Sports are open to competitors from the four provinces of Hupeh, Hunan, Anhui and Kiangsi; but naturally most of the competitors were from the two nearer provinces and the majority of the prizes were carried of by Hunanese and Hupehese. The National Sports will be open to athletes from all the 18 provinces; it will be a big gathering, and it will be interesting to see how many of the provinces will actually be represented.

It is open to question whether the holding of sports-meetings on such a large scale is really the best way to encourage athletics in China. The organizers of these big meetings are well-meaning men, and experts in their own line. Some of them come to China for the express purpose of organizing sports, and they put a very great deal of time and energy into their work. But it is a pity that they do not study conditions in inland China, and the needs of Chinese students, before they jump to the conclusion that American methods of holding sports competitions are the best suited for developing a love of athletics in the Chinese.

In the first place, it is demoralizing to schoolboys to have their studies broken into three times in two months by these big occasions. Naturally they all expect a holiday, and in government schools of course they get it. In mission schools, more discretion is used in granting holidays for such occasions; but even then, the competitors have to go, and the boy scouts must go to make a show or else the school gets the reputation of being a backwater. In this country, where schools find it necessary to observe a double set of public holidays, owing to the co-existence of the Chinese and foreign calendars, it is too much to expect that extra holidays of two or three days each shall be granted in addition so frequently.

Too Much "Corpore Sano"

But a much more serious objection is the fact that these big gatherings give to the youth of China quite a wrong idea of the proper place of athletics in school life. The impression is given that the only way to conduct sports is to hold committees for several weeks, to spend a great deal of money in organizing and advertising, and to collect great crowds and appoint a large number of sports officials to control the course. Instead of sports becoming a natural part of school life, they become an extra, to be indulged in on public occasions, the chief object being show and excitement. Instead of all the students being encouraged to take their part in these physical recreations, it is the select few who are sent in with a view to winning places, and the majority form part of the idle crowd of onlookers. Furthermore, these sports are very costly. It requires an army of coolies to prepare the ground; the expenses of the competitors who come from great distances must amount to a good deal; and much is also spent on printing, decorations and prizes. This does not matter much, because the expenses are usually covered by a lump sum donated by some big official. But the money might surely be put to a much better use. Most of the government schools have no athletic grounds of their own, or at best very small ones, and their sports equipment is very inadequate. Consequently there is no regular training done by way of preparation for public contests. If these big sums were devoted to enabling schools to give to sports and games a more adequate place in their ordinary curriculum, a much worthier end would be served.

THE CHINA PONY-CROSSBREED CONTROVERSY

A Contention That It Is Impossible to Keep out the New Type of Animal Now Coming

From a Correspondent.

In publishing the following article we are not to be taken as necessarily endorsing the arguments advanced.—Ed.

Tientsin, May 22.

One or two decades hence when the last of the pure China pony tribe is pensioned off by the last Municipal Council to make way for the latest motor water-sprinkler the evolution which finally spelled his well-earned retirement may be chronicled by a keenly observing historian as having commenced with the Tientsin Spring Meeting in 1924. It will be written that back in those good old days an attempt was made by amateur racing men to legislate against evolution, Darwin, Huxley, Drummond notwithstanding, in an effort to maintain a useful but worn-out strain of animal because the racing men of those times wished to indulge themselves in the Sport of Kings at the price of peasants. Nevertheless, the historian will continue, instead of absorbing the first products of cross-breeding and permitting the status of racing ponies to gradually to evolve into the remarkable animal we have today, even though it may have caused some temporary inconvenience, those transient treaty-port residents, concerned in the economic progress of China only in so far as it affected their "health," drew up racing laws against the cross-breed and segregated it into a separate class. However, it will be written, this segregation in itself was the most unfortunate act of a generally unfortunate series, for it at once established a contrast between the performances of so-called pure China ponies and the cross-breed, in which contrast the poor little "thoroughbred" suffered deeply. This, the first step in the evolution of our present racing animals, may be said to have dated from the Spring Meeting of the Tientsin Race Club back in 1924, when the segregated or B Class ponies astonished the racing fraternity of the Far East by smashing three all-China records. It was in this meeting that a thirteen-one hands crossbreed ran the mile for the first time in the history of Far Eastern racing in under two minutes.

In such a manner, we believe, will the racing historian discourse on the evolution of race ponies two decades hence.

Retarding Evolution.

If the foreign amateur race clubs retain the lead in racing in China no doubt the evolution will be retarded. They are composed of a majority of men who are anxious to obtain the thrills incident to racing at a cost within their generally moderate purses. With a few hundred taels the so-called "small" owner can purchase a China pony, of the pure Mongol type, and possibly win a race or two, with a few places. He undoubtedly gets his thrill and no amount of reasoning will convince him that it is not worth the money he wastes. To lead or ride his pony and his silken colours past an admiring and hand-clapping throng is worth to him all the excess gold he can accumulate between meetings. Transient public commendation, feminine admiration and masculine thumps on the back mean more to him than investing his money in solid securities. As for financial compensation, the small owner may or may not be impelled by the gain motive. He may or may not have visions of annexing large sums of money through the prowess of his Mongol steed, but he usually figures upon getting his money back.

This, of course, is the theory of amateur racing. In practice it is otherwise. The big owners—the Taipan class—make all the money there is to be made, and usually make it at the expense of the small owner. It cannot be otherwise with men who can afford to call in their head mafoos and say, "Mafoo, here's ten thousand dollars, go Kalgan side more far catchee me four five fast pony—see?" Pure China pony or crossbreed, it makes no difference, the rich amateur has the advantage all the time, except in rare and accidental cases. One of the exceptions that proves the rule is the famous "Old Bill" of Shanghai [illegible] the Morriss, Arnhold, Toegs, J.M.D., Major Nathan, Howell, Morling and the many "Ewo" taipan stables that provide the bulk of successful racing history.

What Chinese Clubs Will Do.

If, we will repeat, the foreign amateur race clubs retain the lead in China racing, the evolution of the China pony will be retarded, but signs are not wanting that they will not. The Chinese have only recently caught on to the idea of organized racing and, with the Kiangwan, Nankai and Nanyuan Clubs as examples, it will not be many years before every "fu" city in China has its Race Club. At present these clubs are largely influenced in their management and rules by the foreign race clubs, many of whose members have aided their establishment, but as they progress we think they will be the last to legislate against the improvement of their own country's horseflesh. The few hundred dollars difference in price between a Mongol pony and a crossbreed will mean nothing to rich Chinese owners, even though they should maintain racing on an amateur basis. If racing should become professionalized in China the crossbred will without doubt supersede the China pony almost immediately.

It has been argued that the crossbreed is coming down from the north at the present time because of the effect of the great war. It is said that before the war they used to be in demand as cavalry mounts in the Tsarist armies, but that the subsequent disorganization led to a falling off in the demand and that when the Russian armies are reorganized these crossbreeds will go north again into Russia. Such an argument reckons without the fact that horses are no longer considered of the first usefulness in modern warfare and that horseflesh was long ago largely superseded by motor-tractors tanks and other forms of mechanical transportation. If Trotsky's modern Soviet army cannot create a demand for crossbred cavalry mounts, we do not think any future Russian army will do any better. The gradual disappearance of the horse in peaceful pursuits will also contribute its effect on the demand for horses in Russia as elsewhere.

No Progressing Backwards.

It has been rumoured that the Tientsin Race Club will abolish the "B" Class, or crossbreed, events in the Autumn meeting, thus creating further futile legislation against evolution. Such an act will be not only unprogressive but will also be a step backwards, and no retrograde movement ever yet met with success. If the owners had control of breeding of ponies, they might be able to ensure a constant supply of "thoroughbreds," but they do not, and it is a good thing for the country that they cannot control breeding. Racing, as the sport of Kings and gentlemen the world over, has ever been for the development of horseflesh; in fact, in all sports and athletics the betterment of the game and its contributory factors is paramount with all true sportsmen.

We writs this with the knowledge that the majority of amateur racing men in China will disapprove our contentions, but we still believe, that when they can be convinced that their attitude is contrary to the dictates of sportsmanship and common sense; and that when they begin to see it in this light they will be the first to stand up, even at a pecuniary loss, for the development of horseflesh. We have too much faith in their sporting natures to believe otherwise.

In a note to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, the German Legation states that the previous charge that a certain German firm of Shanghai was trafficking in arms is not based upon facts. The note says that the Legation does not know of any German firm in China which is dealing now or will deal in arms in future.

CHINESE CHRISTIANS

Where Missionary Education Fails in the View of a Chinese Critic

The following is a translation of a remarkable article written by one Tseng Yu-hao, and published in the "Shihshih Hsingpao" Shanghai on the May 16 and 17.

"Recently the Turkish Government closed all the missionary schools there. The Educational Commissioner at Mukden also approached the Japanese Government urging that all schools in South Manchuria should be controlled by one authority so as to avoid overlapping, and establish a standard system. Since these reports were published in the newspapers there has been much discussion as to the Christian Missionary Schools in China generally. I have myself written many articles in both Chinese and foreign newspapers on this subject, and I again take this opportunity of drawing attention to a very important matter.

"In the beginning Christian Schools were only used to make converts, and train missionaries. About 1858 the Chinese Government in treaties with England and France recognized the preaching and propoganda of Christianity in China. In the treaty of 1860 with France, it was laid down that Roman Catholics were to be allowed to rent and own land and also build houses. This clause however was only in the Chinese version, and it is well known that the Catholics bribed a high Chinese offical to add this clause after the Treaty was agreed to. From that time the Christians have opened many schools and colleges, and their numbers are still increasing. According to reports issued by the Christian missionaries there were in 1920, 580 elementary schools, 256 secondary schools, and 27 special schools and universities, and the total number of students was 2,000,000 which is about a fifth of all the Chinese students in the Republic.

Registration of Mission Schools.

"There has been a great deal of discussion about these Christian schools, and it is evident that there is a general consensus of opinion that they should be some understanding between the missionaries and the Government. Many men connected with these schools hold that opinion. For instance, Dr. P. W. Kuo, Principal of the National Southeastern University at Nanking has urged the Christian missionaries to register their schools with the Chinese Government. Also the Hwa Tung Missionary Association has appointed a committee to report on the subject of registration.

"Formerly the Chinese Government took up an attitude of non-interference with these Christian schools, but when Fan Yuan-lien was Minister of Education he studied the question, and on December 16, 1921, issued an order that all Christian schools should be registered. The registration was to be effected by the local educational commissioners. He also appointed a commission, headed by Jen Hung chien, to investigaate and report on the Christian universities. But it was laid down as a condition of registration that the religious education should be amended to suit Chinese susceptibilities, and that non-converts should not be forced to attend Sunday services. As a result very few missionary schools registered.

At the time of the issue of this order a certain Christian educationalist told me that if the Chinese Government pressed for the abolition of Christian propoganda in the schools, all the missionary schools would be closed because all the money subscribed abroad was given on the condition that Christianity should be taught. If they did not do this they could not get any money.

Its Westernizing Influence

"There are two more questions connected with these Christian schools; the teaching of the language, and the position of Chinese teachers. A year before last Fen Hung-chun, Dr. P. W. Kuo and Lin Po-ming examined forms of instruction at the Nanking University, and in their report to the Minister of Education, stated that the students knowledge of Chinese was still as unsatisfactory as ever. The Minister of Education (Fan Yuan-lien) has frequently urged the mission schools to give more time to the teaching of Chinese, and such men as the late Dr. Timothy Richards and Dr. Hawkes Potts, have also spoken in favour of this. Recently the Yen Ching University, the Shanghai College, and the St. John's University have offered higher pay for good Chinese teachers, to remedy the mistakes made in the past. A Dr. Moroe (? Monroe) who came to China two years ago, told the missionaries that if they wanted to exert a good influence in China they must have efficient Chinese teachers. But still the results in these Christian schools are very unsatisfactory as the Chinese students simply confine themselves to imitating foreign habits and style, and are easily satisfied with a small smattering of English. After finishing a course at these schools the Chinese girls are quite unfit for Chinese social conditions. The result is unrest and disorder. These evils could be removed by these schools employing more and better Chinese teachers.

ANGLO-AMERICAN CO-OPERATION

Interesting Speech by Admiral Leveson at Complimentary Tiffin in Peking: Friendliness Between the Navies and Civilian Hospitality

Peking, May 23.

Admiral Sir Arthur Leveson, K.C.B., Commander-in-Chief of the British China Station, was the guest of honour at the Anglo-American Association's tiffin at the Grand Hotel des Wagon-Lits to-day. Sir Francis Aglen presided over a big attendance, amongst those present being His Ex. the British Minister (Sir Ronald Macleay) and Mr. W. R. Peck, Chinese Secretary of the American Legation.

After he had been briefly introduced by the Chairman, Admiral Leveson said he should like to say first of all that he felt amongst friends and that was a point he wished to bring out very much. Dwelling with emphasis upon the traditional friendship between the British and the Americans, he said he would like to mention that he was a "Pilgrim." He was not a poet, he hastened to assure the gathering amidst laughter, but he was a "Pilgrim" and the "Pilgrims" were an Anglo-American organization which had a similar object to this Association in Peking—the fostering of friendship between the two countries. During the war, the Admiral continued, he was very closely associated with American naval squadrons and wherever they went British naval officers and American naval officeres fraternized and worked together. They not only worked together, but they played together and that was one of the reasons for the co-operation which always existed wherever the Americans and British were found side by side. The general work which went on here in China was largely due to the close co-operation of the two Navies.

Another form of friendship to which Admiral Leveson wanted to allude was the friendship and hospitality that the Navies of both nations received from the civilians with whom they came into contact. Wherever they had gone they had met with the utmost friendliness and co-operation on all sides and that was one of the things which had struck him most since he had been out here. He should like moreover to congratulate the civilians on what he had seen out here in the way of the advancement of civilization and the significant work that all the various civil elements were carrying out in difficult circumstances all over the Far East.

Significance of Shipping

There were one or two other impressions he had received in coming out to the East for the first time. One of them was the significant shipping—the size of the vessels of all sorts and of all nations and their great numbers. Wherever one went there he saw numbers of these great vessels and in no other ports of the world were so many ships of such size and efficiency to be seen. Admiral Leveson said he would like to see the statesmen of every country coming here to see what is going on in the East and he thought the people who maintained these ships were beyond all praise for the way they were advancing civilization here. Trade and development must, he thought, go on and increase while they had such fine vessels to carry on the work, and, incidentally, that brought out the usefulness of the Navies, which were out to be helpful and to look after things.

Another thing which Admiral Leveson said had impressed him a good deal was the way in which tropical races out here were being administered by the more civilized peoples, as in the case of the Dutch in Java, the French in Annam, the British in Malaya, the Americans in the Philippines. He thought it was "perfectly wonderful" to see all these different nationalities handling the situation in the way they were handling it, all over the Far East. There was an old nautical adage that "different ships have different long splices, but the splice holds nevertheless." He thought that was true of the way in which all these different places were being governed—there were different ideas and different methods but there was good in them all.

China's Possibilities.

The Admiral confessed that he found the subject of China a very difficult one to pass any remarks upon. He had always heard that this country had retained her ancient civilization. It was to be hoped that, with the aid of her friends, and of the United States and Great Britain in particular, her civilization would gradually be brought more into accord with modern developments. He had been very fortunate in going up the Yangtze to see the province of Szechuan and he was enormously struck with the possibilities of that part of the country, with its wonderful river, down which merchant ships and Navies could move. He thought the future of these parts up there in the head waters of the Yangtze lay in the lap of the Gods, but that it was going to be a magnificent future.

"To those of you who are interested in river steamers," Admiral Leveson declared, "I can only say—push your ships up. There is stuff to get there and the steamers are taking the place of the junks and are doing an enormous deal of good work." Sir Arthur said that he would conclude with the words which were so often in the mouth of Stonewall Jackson—"Press forward." "And I would add," he said, "press forward with energy, discipline and civilization." (Applause).

On behalf of the Committee and members of the Association, Sir Francis Aglen tendered cordial thanks to Admiral Leveson for his interesting address.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

RUSSIA AND JAPAN NOW NEGOTIATING

Satisfactory Results Hoped for, Moscow Having Apologized for Nikolaievsk

Riga, May 23.

A message from Moscow states that official Russo-Japanese negotiations have begun.—Reuter.

Tokio, May 24.

An official message from Vladivostok says that the Japanese prisoners were released on May 23.

Reports from Peking of satisfactory progress of the negotiations are confirmed here in the form of a Russian apology for the Nikolaievsk tragedy which was the only outstanding issue. Officials admit that a satisfactory end to the negotiations is approaching though they are not prepared to endorse a report that they will be concluded within the current month.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

According to the "Shunpao" the Ministry of Foreign Affairs has addressed a Note to M. Karakhan, the Soviet representative, protesting against the action of a large number of Soviet soldiers and citizens who are alleged to have crossed the Sino-Siberian border and shot and wounded a number of Chinese residents and pillaged their homes.

EMPIRE DAY AT NINGPO

Another Reversion to Home Custom: Big Children's Party at Consulate

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT

Ningpo, May 26.

Notwithstanding that the day before Empire Day was unusually wet and dismal, giving little hope for the festivities of the morrow, the day itself dawned in unclouded splendour. A committee of Britons had been called together earlier in the week by H. M. Consul, Mr. H. F. Handley Derry, to make arrangements to celebrate the day.

The plan adopted gave us Ningpo's most successful Empire Day. The whole foreign community was invited to a garden party in the beautiful grounds of the Consulate and the committee had provided a programme of games and sports which proved wonderfully attractive to youngsters and grown-up alike.

The attendance was exceedingly good, almost every Briton in the Port being present, while the Americans and the French were well represented. It was not difficult to break off all coldness and formality in the company of so many children (who by the way were specially catered for on this occasion), and under the genial cordiality of the host and hostess, Mr. and Mrs. Handley Derry, everybody immediately felt at home.

Before tea the juniors had their sports and ran for prizes and glory under the direction of their seniors (though every child got a prize and a good one too). After tea, older ones became young again and vied with one another in diving after sundry well placed tubers (in a potato race) or jazz-stepping on flower pots in another kind of race without a name—for glory and prizes as well. Among the ladies the most redoubtable champions were Mrs. Bates, Miss Bethel, Mrs. Delight and Mrs. Scott, all of whom showed skill above their fellows in these arts or possibly in deck-tennis (on the green).

The male champions in the same line of action were Dr. Thomas, Mr. Scott—but why make distinctions when every man had a particular brilliance of his own?

At the close of the more hilarious part of the proceedings the guests were summoned indoors. There the Consul dwelt on the origin and significance of Empire Day and the ideals for which the British peoples all over the globe and were striving.

Mrs. Molony then distributed the prizes and "God save the King" was sung with great zest, all the guests (whatever their nationality) joining in. A round of cheers was then raised, for the host and hostess, for Mrs. Molony, and for those who by contribution of money, refreshments or services had helped to make the day so very enjoyable.

Popular New Customs Official.

Later.

There have been several arrivals and departures among the foreign residents of the port. The departure of Mr. F. W. Carey to be Commissioner of Customs at Swatow has already been reported. His removal has been greatly regretted by foreigners and Chinese alike, yet the welcome accorded to his successor in office, Mr. A. G. Bethell, who comes from Mengtze, has been none the less hearty.

Mr. Bethell comes into the Port accompanied by Mrs. Bethell and three daughters, the two sons of the family being at present at school in England. Already it is felt that in sport and good fellowship a notable acquisition has been made to the social life of the community and at the Empire Day festivities the two charming elder daughters of the Commissioner showed great proficiency in the outdoor games.

Other recent arrivals are Mr. and Mrs. Denniston, of Butterfield & Swire's, Mr. and Mrs. Bewick, of the Asiatic Petroleum Co., and Mr. and Mrs. Daniels, of the Standard Oil Co.

ZAHKOU'S CELEBRATION

FROM OUR HANGCHOW CORRESPONDENT

May 26.

Empire Day was quietly celebrated at Zahkou. Mr. and Mrs. Molony and the A.P.C. staff were "At Home" to the British, and representatives of Allied and friendly Powers. The Americans were there in great numbers to rejoice with us because the heritage of the British flag is the heritage of all English-speaking people throughout the world.

It was a glorious day, after a Friday of downpour and depression. We saluted the flag as we walked up the path to the house where tea and other refeshments were served in abundance. There were quite a number of pretty smart spring frocks in keeping with the weather.

Coming home from the station Mrs. Gaunt was thrown out of her ricsha. Her head was badly cut on the rough stone payment. She was taken to the C. M. S. Hospital, where the wound was sewn up under an anaesthetic. Her friends will be glad to know she is getting on very well.

TERRIBLE CRIME IN SHANSI

Eight People Murdered by One Man for Sake of Wife of One of the Victims

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT

Taiku, Sha., May 20.

One of the most revolting crimes ever committed in Shansi took place near Kihsien, Sha., a short time ago. A party of beggars from Honan took up their abode in an old temple in the south suburb of that city. The party consisted of a man named Li Wen, his mother and his niece, two brothers named Su Erh and Su San and their wives, five children and two dogs. While living in this temple Li Wen began to have illicit relations with the wife of Su Erh. Suddenly the entire party disappeared, but no thought was given to their disappearance until one day one of the two dogs accompanying the party came out of the temple with the limb of a child in its jaws. That led to the gruesome discovery of the bodies of the five children and Su San and his wife hidden in the earthen "k'angs" (platform beds) of the temple. Through the clever work of a member of the Kihsien police the murderer was apprehended and he confessed the crime. The details were as follow:—

On the night before the party disappeared from the temple Li Wen having had some fears of Su Erh when his illicit relations with the latter's wife were discovered, lured Su Erh to a desolate spot near the northwest corner of the city and there beat him to death with a club. The body was thrown into an unused well near by. Returning to the temple in the south suburb Li Wen then brained Su San and his wife and the five children and one of the dogs, using the same bludgeon. The clothing was stripped from their corpses and with the dead body of the dog was thrown into a well in the temple compound. The bodies of the seven victims were then hidden in the earthen platforms used as beds. With Su Erh's wife and his mother and niece the murderer then moved off down the great post-road toward the southwest. His job was not quite complete in that one of the two dogs escaped him, and this aftewards led to the discovery of the crime, as above related.

Naturally, the whole countryside was considerably aroused when the news of this crime was spread abroad. A member of the Kihsien police force had been visiting his home in Pingyao, Sha. Returning to Kihsien he met on the road a party of beggars and noticed from their speech that they were Honanese. After returning to Kihsien he reported the incident and the party was followed and taken into custody.

THE Tientsin Police Bureau has received instructions from the Civil Governor of Chihli, Marshal Wang Cheng-ping, for ever to suppress processions in honour of the many gods that the Chinese people worship. Processions of gods have been held in China from time immemorial and the order will doubtless arouse much opposition. Readers will remember a most entertaining account which appeared in the "North-China Daily News" recently of a gods procession that was held in Tientsin, the first that had been seen in that port for many years. Evidently the governor has determined that it shall also be the last.

ALL-CHINA SPORTS

East China Victorious on First Day of Wuchang Meet

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT

Wuchang, May 22.

This morning, for the first time in history, the inhabitants of Wuchang have seen an aeroplane actually flying in the sky. It is said that two of them are to be on view in the Sports Ground, where the China National Sports open to-day. One of these has been giving an exhibition of flying this morning, circling around the environs of the city. It is a curious sight to see a whole cityful of people looking up into the sky. Coolies, who have possibly never dreamed of seeing such a thing, are shouting with laughter, and portly shopkeepers, who for years have neglected to do any morning exercises, are rushing out into the streets and craning their necks to see this new portent. There will be some stiff necks in Wuchang to-morrow!

Contestants from Far and Near.

The All-China Sports, for which preparations have been going on for so many weeks, open to-day. Competitors have been streaming in during the past weeks, and troops of boy scouts from the schools have been meeting trains and steamers to conduct the new arrivals to the places where they will be entertained. Some of them come from distant provinces of China, and there are even some from as far afield as Manila, come to take part in the contests. In order to prevent overcrowding the number of contestants has been limited to about 500.

May 23.

Yesterday, the first day of the China National Sports, passed off quite successfully. In the morning, the parade of athletes and boy scouts made an imposing ceremony.

In the afternoon, preliminary heats for the flat events, tennis, foot-ball, basket-ball, etc. all went off in order and without a hitch. The general orderliness of the proceedings, and the excellent behaviour of the large crowd, were in striking contrast to the farcical Wu-Han Sports of last month.

So far as results can yet be given, it looks as if East China are going to carry off most of the honours; their representatives have won all the first four places in the shot put, first, second and fourth in the broad jump, and the first three places in the 1,500 metre race. In the basket-ball contest between North and Central China, the latter (representated by the team of Boone University) were defeated after a hard struggle.

Splendid Arrangements.

Something like 20,000 people were present on the field. The success with which such a large crowd was handled and kept in order was no doubt due to the great precautions which had been taken beforehand in preparing the field. The running track is now completely surrounded by a wire fence, erected at a distance of about two feet from the inner edge of the track. Outside this, and at a distance of five or six feet, is a wooden barricade, also running the whole way round the track; and beyond this again, at a further short distance, is a sloped platform, extending most of the way round the field, upon which spectators can stand one behind the other to a depth of six ranks. None but competitors and officials are allowed to enter inside the track. The wire fence is strongly guarded everywhere by police, soldiers and scouts. Upon the wooden stand, in companies, are the students from the various schools which are taking part in the competitions. Each of these companies has its flag, with the name of the school upon it in Chinese characters, and most of the schools have their uniforms, khaki or white. The effect of this long circle of uniformed onlookers, with the flags waving above them, red, blue, yellow and other colours, gives quite a brave aspect to the field.

Swimming Bath.

Other additions have been made to the equipment of the grounds. At the west end eight tennis-courts have been laid out, surrounded by wire-netting. Beyond these, is the new swimming bath. It is made of cement, 25 yards in length, the shallow end being about four feet in depth and at the deep end 15. The water is supplied by two high tanks, which are filled by specially installed pumping machinery. On the straight running-track, a field telephone has been set up for communication between the officials at the starting and finishing posts. The whole field is surrounded by an electric wire carrying coloured lamps. Altogether, if shear expenditure of money on a lavish display of machinery is calculated to instil a love of sport into Young China—then nothing has been omitted which could possibly have been thought of.

SHANSI FOR SHANSI MEN

Provincial Assembly's Ban on Mining by Outside Undertakings

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Taiku, Sha., May 20.

The Provincial Assembly has just adjourned after a month's session. The main items of business taken care of were the examination of the provincial budget for the current year and the drawing up of a set of mining regulations for the province. One important item in the regulations so drawn up is that no outside interests will be allowed to obtain a controlling interest in Shansi mining projects. There is, of course, a Provincial Bureau of Mines, with salaried officers.

One would be glad to see a little constructive effort in the direction of opening the coal resources of Shansi, instead of mere paper regulations and an obstructive attitude. In the meantime the price of coal has advanced to the highest figure ever known and many cannot get it at any price.

The weather continues dry in this part of Shansi, and in a day or two more there will be no hope of sowing what the Chinese call the "large grains," that is, sorghum and millet. Furthermore, much of the winter wheat is perishing from drought. Summer rains may enable the farmers to sow "small grains" and vegetables, but without the main autumn and summer crops hard times are ahead. From certain districts in the southwest of the province rains are reported,—it is hoped in sufficient amount to save the crops in that region.

TSINGTAO GOLF CLUB

Annual General Meeting: War Embargoes Now Removed

The annual general meeting of the Club took place at the Grand Hotel on Friday the 23rd instant at 6 p.m. when a good attendance of members were present—Mr. T. Adams being in the chair.

The accounts for 1923, which showed a satisfactory profit for the year, were approved, and the following office bearers for 1924 were duly elected:—

President:—Mr T. Adams.
Executive Committee:—
Messrs. T. Shimidzu, G. C. F. Russell, T. Yamamoto, R. A. Russell (Hon. Treas.), C. R. Rice (Hon. Sec.), P. Jernigan.
Balloting Committee:—Messrs. J. W. Richardson, A. L. Shaw, F. Momotani.

A discussion took place as to the desirability of removing the embargo placed in 1920 on then enemy subjects as regards their joining the Club—and it was unanimously resolved that Germans now be admitted to full membership of the Club subject to the usual rule as to balloting for election.

The meeting terminated with the usual votes of thanks to the Chairman (Mr. T. Adams), the retiring President (Mr. T. Shimidzu), the Hon. Auditor (Mr. C. R. Rice) and to the proprietors of the Grand Hotels and to Mr. Herlihy for kindly placing a room at the disposal of the Meeting.

GEN. Sun Chuan-fang, Director of Kuangtung-Fukien Border Defences (and former Tuli of Fukien), has, states the Chinese press, issued bonds of $50,000 denominations and under for the purpose of raising funds for his army. Gen. Sun has ordered the Chambers of Commerce to dispose of these bonds, which he promises to redeem in three instalments.—When, where and how?

THE TRUTH ABOUT DR. SUN YAT-SEN

Tyrannous Treatment of Hin Wong: Railway Reopening: Strikes against Taxes

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT

Canton, May 21.

The most outstanding feature of the last week was the falsely reported death of Dr. Sun Yat-sen. This was reported from several sources, and caused a great deal of apprehension but it turned out that the rumours were without any foundation. It is true that Dr. Sun was slightly indisposed as a result of his exertions, but after a short rest he is now completely restored to health.

Strong action was taken by the authorities to stop the spreading of false rumours, and Mr. Hin Wong, the well-known editor and leader of the Boy Scout Movement in Canton, was arrested and charged with spreading rumours. He was at first sentenced to banishment for ten years, but this was later altered to imprisonment for ten years. Representations on his behalf were made by several people to the Generalissimo, and evidence was produced to prove his innocence of the charge so that it is to be hoped that he will be released shortly.

On Sunday, the 17th instant d'Oisy arrived on his flight from Paris, having flown from Hanoi in six hours. He landed at Tai Sha T'au Aerodrome and was received and welcomed by a large number of Chinese officials and foreigners. He was later received and congratulated by Dr. and Mrs. Sun Yat-sen. He left again on the 20th, for Shanghai.

The New Cantonese C.-in-C.

There is little change in the military situation on the East River and the threatened attack on Waichow has not yet been made, although it is still announced that it will be made shortly. Gen. Hsu Tsung-chih has decided to accept the post of C.-in-C. to the Cantonese forces but has not taken up the post yet. He was to have assumed office yesterday, but all preparations for the ceremony not being completed it was postponed until the 22nd. He intends to reorganize the whole of the Cantonese troops.

It is announced by the Commander of the Railway Guards and the Railway Administration that the Canton-Kowloon Railway will run a through train to Shumchun to-day, and it is hoped that the regular traffic will be continued.

Gen. Hu Han-min has now returned from Shanghai and will assist at the Generalissimo's Headquarters taking the place of Gen. Tan Yen-k'ai, who has been acting as general secretary, thus releasing the latter who will proceed to the Eastern Front to direct operations.

Taxes Broken by Strikes.

Owing to the Government's announcing its intention of taxing them there have been strikes threatened by the jadestone merchants and pawnbrokers, but these have been settled when the Government announced its intention of discontinuing the proposed taxes. The strike of the junk trade has also been entirely settled, the merchants having received sufficient guarantee that the tax on shipping would be discontinued for ever.

Owing to the large numbers of soldiers who have not yet moved out of the City boundaries, there are still daily reports of robberies of civilians anad even of officers having committed them. The Police are doing their best to deal with the matter but it is not an easy problem, as in most cases they are outnumbered by the delinquents.

Reports have been received of the appointment of many of Gen. Chen Chiung-ming's adherents to posts in the province, by Peking. Lin Fu has been appointed Tuli of Kuangtung, Yeh Chu, has been appointed Civil Governor, and Hung Chao-lun has beeen appointed Chao-Mei Defence Commissioner.

PEKING, May 24.—Later information, says Reuter, shows that Mr. Hubbard will be joint Agent of the Hongkong & Shanghai Bank at Peking, as Mr. Hillier was. Mr. R. C. Allen will remain Joint Agent, as heretofore, managing the bank's loan business.

A CLEANING-UP IN TSINGTAO

Russian Refugees a Troublesome Element: Work or Deportation: Efficiency of the Police Force: Expected Visit of Marshal Wu

Tsingtao, May 24.

The Police Department has issued [illegible] refugees that they must either obtain [illegible] or be banished from the city. The police have frowned upon the constantly increasing Russian colony here, as they say that it contains troublesome elements which are a source of annoyance and worse.

The police say that the Russians flock to Tsingtao, labouring under the misapprehension that they can find employment here. When they arrive, there are no positions for them and they either become objects of charity on the part of generous countrymen or resort to thievery, from the proceeds of which they purchase food for their subsistence. The police declare that scores are roaming the streets and they are resolved to drive them out of the city. If this step is not effective, they will be deported to Siberia.

Thefts in several homes and shops recently are laid at the door of indigent Russians. The other day $400 worth of silk goods, which disappeared from a silk shop, was found in the home of several Russian women, who were arrested.

The Russians, of course, are being dealt with in the same way as the Chinese, as they are not protected by extraterritorial rights.

It is reported that Marshal Wu Pei-fu intends coming here in the near future to get an accurate line on the true strength of Admiral Wen Shu-teh's squadron. He is said to be concerned about the naval and military strength of Shantung Province, which, he believes, would be a strategic centre if Marshal Chang Tso-lin's Manchurian Army were to attempt another drive on Peking.

Marshal Wu is reported to have expressed the hope that the Pei-Hai Squadron, the official designation of Admiral Wen's force, could be made at least as strong as Marshal Chang's steadily growing fleet.

The 5th Brigade of 10th Division, which has been quartered at the old Bismarck Barracks in the outskirts of the city for the past two months, was transferred yesterday to Weihsien. There were 1,000 men in the command and their departure means that Tsingtao will take on much less of a military appearance.

New Instructions to Police.

The Chief of Police, Mr. Chang Tien-wa, who is a stickler for discipline, has promulgated more orders for his policemen to observe. The force, which is considered one of the most efficient in China, will find it somewhat difficult to carry out the new instructions, but Mr. Chang has declared that punishment will be meted out to offenders and that he will tolerate no violation of the new regulations. His latest edict is calculated to inculcate in policemen a proper sense of dignity and reserve, for officers are strictly ordered not to indulge in needless conversation with passers-by. The police head believes that an officer's [illegible] by indiscriminate tongue-wagging and and he is resolved to stamp out the "evil."

Another prohibition along the same line is the declaration that the practice of certain officers of playing with children must cease. Moreover, policemen are ordered not to eat, drink or smoke while on duty, meaning that the habit of the corner traffic officer of stealing over to the street vendor ever and anon for a "snack" of this and that must cease.

Railway Agents and Bribery

Railway officials are exercised over reports that certain railway agents are habitually accepting bribes from shippers for preferential treatment in the matter of filing car orders. Two were found guilty and were summarily discharged. The officials have promulgated strict orders that all shippers are to be treated alike and that no favours are to be shown. The instructions have been printed in the local vernacular papers and in them is a warning to shippers, the railway asserting that it will be necessary to take steps against shippers who tempt its employees.

Summer Holiday Campaign

Tsingtao is undergoing a thorough cleaning-up, the Public Health Department having instituted the campaign. All merchants and manufacturers and the general public have been given instructions to make a thorough house-cleaning and destroy all rubbish and debris. Inspectors are busy seeing that the orders are carried out. The administration is doing its part by putting the streets and sewerage system in first-class shape, and the city is commencing to take on a spick and span appearance.

The vanguard of the summer colony has started to arrive and all indications are for a rumper season. There never were so many hotels and pensions before and the holiday-maker, apparently, will have little difficulty in finding accommodation. Several new establishments have started up and the wants of the summer visitor will be amply taken care of.

Summer weather has made its appearance, but it is of the mild variety that makes the climate here so delightful. Straw-hats and flannels are beginning to make their appearance and launch and motorboat are being tuned up for the summer's enjoyment, while the more hardy of the bathers have started to take dips in the surf.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

JAPANESE PREMIER CARRIES ON

Viscount Kiyoura Convinced the Opposition Have No Policy Worth Consideration

From Our Own Correspondent

Tokio, May 21.

"I will not hesitate to dissolve the Diet as often as I think fit—once, twice, three times, four times—if this is the best and only way of serving the interests of the country at large."

It was the aged Viscount Kiyoura, Premier of Japan, just defeated at the election polls, speaking to press men and, while his voice trembled with emotion, determination showed strongly in his face.

"I cannot regard the Opposition as one single party. Each of the different Opposition parties stands for different political ideals, and anything like a real fusion amongst them is utterly impossible. This Government is determined to remain in the saddle until political stability is assured. To resign now would be to invite chaos in a domestic political situation which is, already, bad enough. To resign now would be to register infidelity to the Imperial command."

Viscount Kiyoura talked to press men immediately after a Cabinet meeting convened for the purpose of deciding what policy the Government would pursue as a result of the general elections. The policy of refusing to make way for the Opposition had already been settled at this Cabinet meeting which reached the following important conclusions:

A Common Hate.

1. The three Opposition parties, the Kenseikai, the Seiyukai and the Kakushin Club, hold different political principles. Their disunity is obvious. Whatever unity and co-operation they have achieved during the elections was realized merely for the purpose of overthrowing the Kiyoura Ministry. As a common hate united them, their unity will be short-lived and is doomed to failure. The majority held by the Opposition in the Lower House is, for these reasons, devoid of great significance.

2. Despite the apparent unity, plots against each other are already brewing in the Opposition camp. The Kiyoura Ministry believes that, to resign now, would be a heartless betrayal of the nation's interests, for it is convinced that a sudden political change cannot restore political stability.

3. The Government policy will be, in the main, one of watchful waiting, and every effort will be made to strengthen the hands of the Seiyuhonto, the Government party in the House of Representatives.

Patching Up Differences.

The Opposition leaders are taking every possible opportunity to patch up the differences that have sundered them. Viscount Kato, leader of the Kenseikai, numerically the strongest party to-day and regarded as possible premier if party government is permitted, and Mr. Inukai, leader of the Kakushin Club and one of the ablest orators in the Empire, have been on bad terms for years. The urge of politics has reconciled them. Then, the Kenseikai and the Seiyukai have never basked in the sunshine of each other's friendship. Fistic fights, both on the floor of the Diet and out of it, between their members and adherents have been very frequent in the past. Steps are being taken now to whittle down the respective political platforms of these two parties to enable them to co-operate. One of the deepest gulfs separating them was the question of universal manhood suffrage. The Kenseikai vigorously championed giving the franchise to all Japanese males. The Seiyukai has vigorously opposed it. A compromise is said to have just been reached on the point that the Seiyukai will not oppose universal manhood suffrage if it were to come into operation four years from now, that is to say during the next general elections, should no dissolution of the Diet occur in the meantime.

Geisha Aid to Reconciliation.

The reconciliation of the Opposition parties and the attempt to work out a compromise that will be satisfactory to all concerned was brought about in a geisha house, according to a section of the Japanese press, the Kokumin newspaper declaring that hundreds of yen were spent on eating drinking and presentable geisha "to facilitate love and reconciliation.

"When politics and secrecy associate and impure habits commingle with these," the paper says in a trenchant editorial, "it is simply intolerable." The Kokumin is an anti-Kiyoura daily and its remarks are, therefore, all the more significant.

The press is united in favour of the Opposition and demands the immediate resignation of Viscount Kiyoura.

BRITISH TELEPHONES FOR TOKIO

Orders for Reconstruction of System Placed in London and Liverpool

London, May 29.

It is announced that the whole of the equipment for the reconstruction of the Tokio telephone system will be manufactured in London and Liverpool. The first portion of the contract, amounting to £750,000, has been placed.—Reuter.

THE death occurred at Tientsin on the 20th instant of Sgt. L. G. Shepherd, (22) R.A.S.C., from heart failure and pneumonia. The military funeral took place on Thursday last at Canton Road Cemetery.

A correspondent who had just eaten a tender steak in the wilds of Mokanshan, writes that he found out that it had been cut from a wild bull. The beast was shot on Sunday by a Chinese gentleman, Mr. Yoh Kuei-ling, at Seouchiaosan, distant about four li from the health resort. One has heard of wild pig, deer and even leopard in the mountains of Mokanshan, but of wild bull never.

EMPIRE DAY CELEBRATIONS

Splendid Weather and a Delightful Day: The Service at the Cathedral: Reception at Shanghai Club: The Children's Festival on Race Club Grounds

Traditionally, the British are not a demonstrative race and it is difficult to arouse them en masse to any pitch of enthusiasm for anything, outside of sporting events. As a rule patriotic displays and "flag wagging" leave us cold, but the celebration of Empire Day on Saturday saw us excel ourselves. The enthusiasm displayed was real and heartfelt, and of the best description, lacking anything aggressive or calculated to give offence to our neighbours. The service at the Cathedral in the morning was well attended, and was of the simplest description. The breaking of the flag, in which Shanghai's Boy Scouts took part in the British Consulate grounds at 8 o'clock in the morning was marked by keen enthusiasm on the part of the boys, and was observed with a solemnity fitting the occasion. In the afternoon the jamboree at the Race Club under the auspices of the Boy Scouts' Association in Shanghai proved the most successful ever held. The crowd, both of grown-ups and children alike, was terrific, and the kiddies were obviously having a right royal time.

Cathedral Service.

The service at the Cathedral in the morning was attended by a large number of people, and was conducted by the Dean, assisted by the Rev. A.C.S. Trivett. A prayer for the King's Majesty was recited by the Dean, followed by a prayer for the High Court of Parliament.

A very brief sermon was delivered by Mr. Trivett, who took as his text "All these men of war that could keep rank came with a perfect heart to Hebron to make David king over all Israel," First Book of Chronicles, Chapter 12, verse 38. He spoke of the significance of the phrase "keep rank," and urged the necessity for every one of us to "keep rank" as Christians. He spoke, also, of the danger of losing step, instead of keeping in time and pulling together for the Empire, and for religion. The service concluded with the National Anthem.

At the Shanghai Club.

Since the Earl of Meath founded Empire Day, never, whatever the facts at the time, has there been a more enthusiastic gathering than that at the Shanghai Club this year. The British members were "at home" to fellow nationals and those of allied and friendly Powers from shortly after noon and even the large upper salon of the club scarcely sufficed to accommodate all those who visited the club. The subsequent proceedings were most inspiring and there is no doubt the reasons for this were three-fold—first, the striking speeches delivered by Mr. Barton, H. M. Consul-General, Mr. Stirling Fessenden and Mr. A. du Pac de Marsoulies; secondly, the presence of Capt. d'Oisy, the gallant French aviator; and, possibly even more than all, the enthusiasm aroused by the singing of Mr. William Heughan. The toast of His Majesty was honoured with the usual patriotic enthusiasm.

Mr. Barton, after a brief but cordial welcome to the visitors, extended by Mr. R. G. Macdonald, Chairman of the club, said that in Shanghai we were able to celebrate Empire Day under particularly charming conditions, because we did so in conjunction with so many friends of other nationalities, with whom we lived in a state of the most cordial relationship and co-operation. Looking back over the past year, we might perhaps ask ourselves whether our Empire was worthy of the share others were taking in our celebrations, and he thought that, without undue boasting, we had little ground for lack of confidence. In the heart of the Empire there had been witnessed an event which, all political questions apart, persons of all parties must agree was without parallel in British history. He referred to the advent of a Labour Government. It might justly be said that something in the nature of a revolution had taken place, but without a violent upheaval of any sort and it was regarded by most thinking people as something more in the nature of natural evolution. It showed that our Empire, gloriously old, still was capable of adapting itself to the requirements of new and changed times. This change had taken place not only without any upheaval in our own family circle, but it had not lost us any of our friends or allies throughout the world, nor had any of them had cause to reproach us.

If we were justified in this belief, surely it was a good omen for us in Shanghai, where so much depended on two things—solidarity amongst ourselves, our friends and allies and the capacity for change, because in Shanghai we were no more immune from the law of evolution and change than our own country and its Dominions. We could look around us to all the boundaries of Shanghai and we could not fail to see that all was well, and never better, with ourselves and our friends. If one doubted it, he had only to think of the unveiling of the Shanghai War Memorial, which would convey a good idea of what solidarity was capable of achieving. In such circumstances it was a great privilege to have the opportunity of thanking all our friends for coming to the club and joining in the celebration of Empire Day.

American Sympathy.

Mr. Stirling Fessenden spoke under difficulties, for his address coincided with the release of a long string of tram cars and motor cars on the Bund, but judging by the great cheer from those nearest to him, he spoke in his usual happy vein. He was heard to say that American history and ideals and American life enabled Americans thoroughly to appreciate the British people without any diminution of their admiration for their own country. They realized, too, that the great heritage of the British people also was the heritage of English-speaking people throughout the world, which made for the peace and union of all mankind. It was because of that, on behalf of Americans in Shanghai, he extended to Britons the heartiest congratulations and good wishes on their Empire Day.

Mr. du Pac de Marsoulies voiced the congratulations of the French and then Mr. Heughan sang "Land of Hope and Glory," his powerful voice so thrilling the company that they sang the refrain as it can seldom have been sung in Shanghai. Yet there was even greater enthusiasm when he followed with that immortal song, "A man's a man for a' that," which seemed to be so well suited to the occasion—and, as Mr. Barton had said, the changed times. The song drew a great burst of applause and demands for more, but of course the occasion could not be turned into a concert.

Tout le Monde Parle Francais.

After this there were loud calls for Capt. d'Oisy, whose health was pledged and finally he was persuaded to mount the platform. Speaking in French after a united "Oui!" had signified that every one of the hundreds present was perfectly acquainted with the language, he thanked them all for their kindness to him, acknowledged the assistance he had received from British people along his route, particularly members of the flying services, and concluded with an expression of his hopes for the continued unity and success of the British and French flying corps.

Again there was a most enthusiastic outburst and if Capt. d'Oisy had not before heard "For he's a Jolly Good Fellow" he knows now what a great song it can be made when sung in the right spirit. In one's enthusiasm for people of wider fame, omission has been made of the fact that earlier in the proceedings Mr. G. F. Dumbarton led the company in the singing of the National Anthem. He was in fine voice and did not falter even though in the presence of a singer of renown like Mr. Heughan.

The Jamboree.

The brilliance of the day, especially following on the gloom and wet with which we were afflicted during all last week, made greatly for the success of the Jamboree. The Race Club enclosure was crammed with happy children with their parents and friends, and Boy Scouts of all nationalities. Never in any past year has there been such a scene in Shanghai, resembling somewhat a kiddies' Hampstead Heath. There were chutes for the children to slide down (on mats), helped forward by sailors from the British naval ships in port, there was an aerial flight, a Chinese Punch and Judy show, an energetic band, and exhibitions given by Chinese firemen with a length of hose, also—great institution—there were donkey rides for the youngsters. Indeed, all that was needed to complete a very homely scene was a stretch of beach and a bandstand.

The programme commenced with a grand rally, in which Rovers, Scouts and Wolf Cubs all took part. This was followed by the ceremony of saluting the Flag and the Stars and Stripes. The boys were then inspected by Mr. Barton, H. M. Consul-General, the Presidents of the various Patriotic Societies and of the Rotary Club, and members of the Scout Executive Committee. The smartness of the turn-out was something on which Shanghai's scouts can congratulate themselves.

Rotary and Fraser Shields.

At the conclusion of the inspection came the most interesting part of the afternoon, the displays by the various troops in competition for the Rotary Club Shield (Scouts) and the Fraser Shield (Wolf Cubs). These were judged on the work of scouts and scoutmasters, originality of display, amount of training shown, timing, spirit and energy, etc., and the enthusiasm shown by the spectators. The contests were won by the Jewish lads, both scouts and cubs, the order of merit of the various troops being as follows:

Jewish Troop, 88.5.
American troop, 86.7.
Cathedral Troop, 84.8.
Public School, 82.5.
French Troop, 69.8.
Wolf Cub.—
Jewish pack, 93.6.
Cathedral (girls) 92.5.
Cathedral (boys) 88.8.
Thomas Hanbury, 87.3.
Public School, 85.3.
French pack, 74.3.

At the conclusion of the programme, Mr. Barton presented the troop awards, including the Fraser Shield. He congratulated those responsible for the success of the jamboree, which, he said, was undoubtedly the best that had ever been held in Shanghai. He wished to thank the public, also, in his capacity as President of the Association in Shanghai, for their support that day, and the Race Club for so kindly lending their enclosure. In presenting the Jewish Pack with the Fraser Shield he offered them his congratulations, and at the same time commiserated with the Cathedral (girls) pack on the narrow margin by which they had been beaten. The Jewish Pack had shown their superiority in training, however, the Cathedral Pack not being so long established.

Mr. T. C. Britton then presented the Jewish Pack with the Rotary Club Shield, and the afternoon concluded with the saluting of the Flag and the singing of the national anthem.

The officials were:—Patron and President, Mr. Sidney Barton, C.M.G.; Vice-Presidents, Sir Edward Pearce, Sir Skinner Turner; Commissioner, Mr. F. C. Millington; Executive Committee, Sir Edward Pearce, Mr. Percy Fowler, Mr. Eric Moller, Mr. I. Tuxford; Hon. Secretary, Mr. Noel Jacobs; Hon. Treasurer, Mr. Harold Holgate; District Scoutmaster, Mr. J. P. Jones; Recorders, Mr. Eric Moller, Mr. H. S. Bartley; Time Keepers, Sir Skinner Turner, Mr. I. Tuxford; Stewards, Scoutmaster Noel Jacobs, Senior Rover Mate D. Wagstaff; Scout Stall, Rover Mate Eric Shekury; Bugler, Patrol Leader Lindsay Moller.

Judges:—For Work in Camp and Clubroom, The Commissioner; For The Jamboree (Scouts), Mr. T. C. Britton, President, Rotary Club, and the Commissioner; (Cubs), Mr. Sidney Barton, C.M.G., H. B. M. Consul-General, and the Commissioner.

Stewards not previously mentioned were:—Messrs. F. C. Millington, H. Holgate, A. S. Campbell, L. P. Ridgway, R. L. S. Webb, I. H. C. Godfrey and W. H. Trenchard Davis.

Saluting the Flag.

At 8 o'clock in the morning some 400 boy scouts, rovers, girl guides and wolf cubs paraded at the British Consulate to salute the Flag. The troops represented were the Shanghai Public School Troop, the French School Troop, the Cathedral School Troop and the Catholic troop, in addition to the wolf cubs and girl guides. The parade formed up facing the flag staff, and after the saluting, was inspected by the Consul General, Sir Sidney Barton, C.M.G.

The Consul General addressed them on Empire Day and its significance, and concluded by offering prizes to Boy Scouts, Girl Guides and Wolf Cubs for the best essay on Shanghai's monuments.

ADVT. HOARDINGS ROUND SHANGHAI

Intruders into the Countryside that Spoil the Scenery and Annoy those in Search of Change and Refreshment

Some few weeks ago, at the request of one of our readers, we drew attention to the advertisement hoarding then being put up at the corner of the Hungjao, Warren and Great Western Roads, with the suggestion that objects of this kind are not an improvement to the countryside and might well be withdrawn. Since then we have been asked by other readers to go further into the whole question of advertisement hoardings, which undoubtedly threaten to become a serious blemish to the surroundings of Shanghai. Accordingly, the present writer took a run round Avenue Joffre, Avenue Haig, Hungjao, Warren and Brenan Roads yesterday morning to see what hoardings there are.

Let it be emphasized that the following is in no sense whatever an attack on advertisement hoardings generally, still less upon the firms who are using them. We fully recognize that the latter are entitled to buy the available space for advertising and that if they had not taken it, their competitors would have done so. As regards hoardings generally, the question is one of comparison. In the business quarters we all accept many things which we may not altogether like as being necessary to business. But when we go out into the country it is expressly to get away from business associations and the reminders thereof provided by huge advertisements of soaps and pills are a disfigurement to the surroundings and an irritant.

The Hoardings Described.

"Blydenburgh's Turn," on Avenue Haig, opposite the end of Avenue Joffre, is so-named from a long-departed resident who bought a plot of land here to have room on which to turn the tandem that he drove, the road at that time going no farther. A few years ago the Council embellished the turn with bushes and a grass plot. But these have made way for three hoardings, advertising a local newspaper, Bourneville Cocoa and Gossage's Primrose Soap. There has been an attempt to make the hoardings as ornamental as possible by building them in the shape of Chinese pailous. But situated where they are, in one of the pleasantest residential quarters, nothing can really redeem them.

The next point for notice is the junction of Hungjao, Warren and Great Western Roads. Here in addition to the big hoarding of Lactogen previously mentioned, there are, on other sides of the space, posters announcing Texaco Oils and Nestle's Cocoa.

From here one went by Warren and Brenan Roads to the southern gate of Jessfield Park. The space fronting this gate has been laid out with the greatest care, with flower beds, lawns, trees and stone images. It should surely be kept free from advertisements. But on one side of the road, in the grounds of an otherwise rather ornamental looking cafe, are boards announcing Germol, Flyosan, Chesterfield cigarettes and Texaco oils; and right alongside the very carefully designed entrance to the park, another board advertising Wrigley's Gum and Black and White whiskey.

Lastly, at the Jessfield patch, along the creek side, are hoardings of Asahi beer, Minimax, Glaxo and 555 Cigarettes. The Bubbling Well tram terminus is flanked by big hoardings: but to these we do not think exception can be taken, because, if they are not really almost in the business quarter now, they certainly cannot be called in the country

The Council Powerless.

The Municipal Council has no power over these hoardings. In 1914 it passed a resolution through the ratepayers' meeting to tax hoardings in the Settlement at rates from 5 to 50 tael cents per square foot. And it is interesting to recall that the chief reason for so doing was, not to get revenue, but to control the amazingly unsightly posters then prevalent. But the hoardings we have mentioned are outside the Settlement.

The Chinese could do something and, if they think of doing so, we would specially draw their attention to the hideous hoardings along the banks of the lower Huangpu.

In this connexion we are informed that the Chinese authorities of Hangchow absolutely forbid hoardings round their beautiful city. All honour to them.

Voluntary Abstention.

In recent years there has been a campaign in England against hoardings in the country, in response to which the Shell Motor Spirit announced, last year we think, that it would take down all its country advertisements.

In China too, it may be mentioned, one of the most prolific advertising firms, the B. A. T. Co., has been scrupulous as regards the country and, in particular, allows none of its posters to be pasted on the walls of temples, as some of its rivals regrettably do.

From the advertiser's point of view, one cannot but wonder whether these outlying hoardings really pay. In the town their advertisements catch the eye of thousands daily. On the country roads they are scarcely seen by as many hundreds in a week. But those hundreds are precisely the people who, having gone out for exercise, change of surroundings and such beauty of nature as the Shanghai countryside affords, feel the intrusion of the hoardings most keenly. There are many places for hoardings in the Settlement. As regards the outside we appeal to advertisers to exercise a [illegible] pay them to do so.

THE STORY OF SHANGHAI

The republic of Shanghai, for that was the description of it by the lecturer, was Mr. Sokolsky's subject at last Friday's meeting of the Literary Department of the American's Women's Club. A self-governing body responsible to no other country, controlled by a group of men of different nationalities, he said, it was a veritable league of nations.

When Marco Polo visited China Shanghai seems to have been too small to notice, although the Lunghua Pagoda had been built more than a thousand years according to historians. Ningpo, on the other hand, was a much larger and more important city.

The Gutzlaff expedition of 1832 was the first occasion on which foreigners came to Shanghai for the purpose of making a settlement, and the first concession granted to them was an area bounded by Honan Road, the Yangkingpang and the Soochow Creek. It was mere swamp then. This was a British concession, Captain Balfour being the first consul. The foreigners in those days had great difficulties to contend against; one of these was the milk question, it being discovered by them that the milk they were being supplied with was merely the juice from water chestnuts.

In 1848 Bishop Boone laid out an American Concession, which was what is now called Hongkew, several of the roads there, Boone and Seward, being named after prominent Americans. Shortly after came the gold rush to California, and seekers after fortune who found themselves stranded in San Francisco were frequently shipped off to Shanghai by force or guile, from which originated the term "Shanghaied." They frequently deserted the ship in Shanghai and had no reason for returning home. The Taiping rebellion was going on also at this time, and in 1853 the Chinese Custom House was burnt down by the Taipings at Shanghai, resulting in the establishment of the Chinese Maritime Customs under foreign control. The first three controllers were French, British and American, but not long afterwards the French and American representatives withdrew and the Inspectorship has been held by British representatives ever since.

It was in 1854 that the Battle of Muddy Flats occurred, after which the foreigners got together and formed the first municipal council. The Chinese crowded into the Settlement for protection in those days and the value of land soared high, much money changing hands in real estate.

It was at this time that Frederick Ward appeared on the scene and created the Ever-Victorious Army with which he took Sungkiang. From Ward's time Mr. Sokolsky traced the history of Shanghai down to present day memories with which most of us are more or less familiar.

WORLD'S EXHIBITION FOR SHANGHAI

Mr. G. A. Bena's Proposal Discussed at a Preliminary Meeting: No Definite Scheme Submitted: The Vision of Greater Shanghai

Mr. G. A. Bena's suggestion that a great World's Exhibition be held in Shanghai was discussed at a preliminary meeting held on Thursday in the rooms of the Shanghai General Chamber of Commerce, "North-China Daily News" building. There was an attendance of about 50, and among those present were representatives of the British, American, Italian, Russian, German, and Japanese Chambers of Commerce, the Shanghai General Chamber of Commerce, the China Association, Pan-Pacific Association, and various business houses. The representative of the French Chamber of Commerce was unable to attend, but wrote expressing sympathy with the proposal as did also the Italian Consul-General. Mr. Herbert Chatley was voted to the chair.

In presenting his idea to the meeting, Mr. Bena said: Mr. Chairman and Gentlemen,—This meeting has been called, not to discuss a definite plan for a World Exhibition, but to consider the advisability of such an Exhibition and for the purpose of appointing a Commitee, representing the different interests of this city, the duty of which would be to prepare a final technical and financial project.

It has been suggested that we should have come before you with concrete proposals for discussion, but we have decided to come rather with the suggestion for the undertaking. The compilation of such a great project cannot be the work of a few men, but the collaboration of all parties interested.

It is primarily the great moral benefit, issuing from a disinterested and cordial collaboration between foreigners and Chinese, that prompted us to make the suggestion, besides the conviction that the execution of this great project will mark the end of all misunderstanding and jealousies amongst the different nationalities here and amongst the Chinese themselves. The unification of all factions in China and a better understanding between foreigners and Chinese must be the vision that should guide us through the difficult, but not impossible, task of materializing our scheme.

We have not called you here in order to ask for your financial support, but for your moral support, for your advice and for your free collaboration with the work of the Committee that you are going to appoint.

A broad vision of to-day's economic situation will clearly show us what an immense rôle China will play in the future economic readjustment of the world, when a mutual undertanding and loyal collaboration will permit the development of the enormous resource of this great country.

A Vision of Greater Shanghai.

Shanghai, because of her geographical position and importance in Eastern trade, is destined to develop more rapidly than any other city in the world. Why not prepare the plan for a greater Shanghai, concentrating on the function of this city during the next 25 years? It would be possible to embody in it the plan for the World Exhibition, for the erection of permanent buildings and for public work indispensable to the gradual expansion of the city.

I wish to dispel from the mind of our Chinese friends the idea that our suggestion is a trap in order to make them agree to the extension of the Settlement. It will not be the task of the Committee to discuss the future status of Shanghai, but to prepare a plan for the extention of the city without any preoccupation as to her future political standing.

The hearty collaboration and reconciliation of different interests will make possible political agreements of everlasting duration. We are confident that you are convinced that the moral result obtainable from this undertaking will be fully justified.

We have been told that a World Exhibition in Shanghai would be a financial failure, "because all other World Exhibitions were financial failures." We do not wish to go into detail, because the task of preparing the technical and financial plans must be left entirely to the Committtee you will appoint to-day for this purpose, but we wish to point out to those who are in doubt that no other city in the world has the favourable characteristics that Shanghai has for a World Exhibition.

Shanghai's geographical position is unique. The watershed served by Shanghai Harbour represents well over one-tenth of the population of the world. This population by its unflagging energies manages to maintain an economic standard far superior to that of many other parts of the world; an intelligent population open to everything new and interesting and consequently a certain supporter of the Exhibition.

It is not necessary to have lived long in Shanghai to know how rapidly the value of land increases. Any large plot of land, embodied in the plan of Greater Shanghai, improved for the use of the Exhibition, is bound to increase in value and pay a great part of the cost.

Mr. Charles C. Moore, President of the San Francisco Exhibition, has kindly sent us all the records of that great Exhibition and after perusal of those interesting documents the Committee will be easily convinced how Shanghai can make her Exhibition pay.

We suggest that each one present pledge himself to give the Committee his moral support and his promise to render any help in the form of advice and information in order to facilitate its work.

We are perfectly aware of the grave task facing the Committee, but we are also confident that the enthusiasm of its members and the cordial support they will receive from all those far-sighted men who see before them the great future of Shanghai and the great moral and material benefits that such an Exhibition will bring to China and the rest of the World, will pave the way to a solution meeting unanimous approval (applause).

Mr. A. de C. Sowerby opened a general discussion by warmly supporting the proposal, dwelling upon Shanghai's favourable geographical position and its growing commercial importance, and saying that it must prove of great benefit to importers and exporters, and shipping, insurance, engineering and building interests. He thought that Shanghai would benefit commercially, even if by any chance actual cost of the scheme exceeded actual receipts, while on the intellectual side also there must be great gain both to East and West.

Financing the Exhibition.

Mr. A. Brooke Smith said he thought most people in Shanghai would like to see an Exhibition here, but the enterprise would be a most difficult one to carry out in a community such as that of Shanghai, a city of many nationalities. He had hoped that Mr. Bena would have placed before the meeting some idea of how the scheme was to be financed, but he had given no figures and only proposed that a Committee be appointed to go into the pros and cons of the matter. It seemed to the speaker that such a committee would be faced with a very great difficulty in the question of finance. An exhibition of the magnitude proposed by Mr. Bena would involve an expenditure of many millions before any revenue was to hand. How that revenue was to be forthcoming he did not know, and he would like Mr. Bena to give the meeting some ideas on the question.

Mr. Bena, in reply, admitted that he had no financial plan ready. Considering the financial potentialities of Shanghai, he thought it should be possible to form a syndicate to advance the necessary money during the five or six years which would be required in preparing the exhibition. A big asset would be that land needed for the exhibition would be developed for the use of greater Shanghai, and this must be done in conjunction with the Settlement authorities and the Chinese, while when the ground was ready the various nationalities participating would, of course, finance their own exhibits and erection of pavilions, as was done in other great exhibitions. In his opinion, the financial question would be the easiest to solve. As he viewed the position, the greater difficulty would be to secure complete international co-operation. Mr. Bena added that there was a suggestion that an exhibition be held in Peking, and the Chêkiang Government was also considering a similar proposition, but he had been informed that the latter would be prepared to co-operate with Shanghai. Reverting to the question of funds, Mr. Bena suggested that the amusement section of the exhibition might be turned over to a syndicate and become a permanent "Coney Island."

In answer to a question by the Chairman, Mr. Bena said that the Nanking Exhibition was financially disastrous, the reason being that $2,000,000 could not be accounted for!

Questioned as to land for the exhibition, Mr. Bena said possibly an area of 5,000 mow would be required, and his idea was that an option be obtained in two or three localities.

Mr. Chang Nieh-yun (Chinese Chamber of Commerce), speaking unofficially, said he thought that all the support that could be hoped for from the Chinese Government would possibly be a grant of land for the exhibition. If Shanghai business men organized and financed the scheme and took everything upon their shoulders, it might be a success, and he suggested that the various Chambers of Commerce should get together and thresh the matter out before taking any steps to get the Chinese authorities to move. Mr. Chang added that he was not present officially as representing the Chinese Chamber of Commerce.

Major Hilton Johnson, speaking on behalf of the China Association, said he thought the more prudent course would be to appoint a committee simply to explore the possibilities of such a scheme rather than appoint a committee to make arrangements as indicated. The financial side of the matter presented bigger difficulties than Mr. Bena appeared to think, and there were other troubles ahead, land, provincial rivalries, and so on.

Mr. E. M. Gull, speaking on behalf of the Committee of the British Chamber of Commerce, endorsed Major Hilton Johnson's view. By appointing a committee he thought they would be jumping a stage. It would be more advisable for those who conceived the idea, and believed in it, to put forward something a little more definite; but to appoint a committee would give an impression that the meeting approved of the idea of the exhibition, and he was not sure that things had really reached that stage. They should first have some concrete proposal, and on that decide whether or not to appoint a committee to go further into the scheme.

Mr. Sowerby.—That is precisely the idea of appointing this preliminary committee—to prepare a more definite scheme for consideration by the various Chambers of Commerce and the Chinese.

Mr. Bena emphasized that the appointment of a Committee would not imply that they were bound to anything, or even that the meeting approved of the idea. It would not be an executive committee, and would simply be appointed to study the question.

Mr. Brooke Smith then proposed that Mr. Bena write to the national Chambers of Commerce and ask them to appoint one representative to form a committee and consider the matter as a whole.

Mr. Chang Nieh-yun seconded, and the resolution was carried with the addition that foreign and Chinese representation on the committee be equal, and that, in addition to inviting a representative of the Chinese Chamber, the latter body be asked to name suitable representatives of the leading Chinese financial and industrial concerns.

LOCAL Japanese residents will celebrate the marriage of their popular Crown Prince on June 1 next.

THE Chinese press states that the Japanese authorities in Shanghai have been asked to investigate the source of supply of counterfeit coins which are finding their way to Japan in bulk. It is said that recently 50 cent. silver pieces of the face value of Y.100,000 were recently shipped to Moji from Shanghai, and that the coins are of such excellent manufacture as to deceive all but an expert. Recently also, two Chinese were arrested at Moji in possession of counterfeit bank-notes printed in Shanghai.

CHINESE CATHOLIC PRELATES

Native Priests Raised to Rank of Monsignori with Seats in General Council

The Catholic Church excludes no nationality from the ranks of its priesthood, or even of the prelacy, provided the men come up to the intellectual, moral and general standard of efficiency required by Canon Law. The Church having at present 2,208,000 converts in China, dispersed over the 18 Provinces and Outlying Dependencies, and an ordained native clergy numbering 1,701, it was deemed advisable at the close of 1923, to raise a select few of these Chinese clergymen to the dignity of prelates. Trained for about 15 years in their native literature, in mathematical and physical science, in general history, in Latin, philosophy and theology, in Scripture, apologetics and Canon Law, they are thoroughly equipped for the duties of their ministry. Two among them have been recently selected by Rome, the Supreme Centre of authority over the whole Church, and raised to the dignity of Prefects Apostolic. Though not bishops, they have the rank of prelates, and may wear the mitre and ring, but are not allowed the use of the crozier or of the throne.

Names of the Two Prelates.

The first appointed is the Rev. Father Odoric Cheng, a member of the Franciscan Order, founded by the great and popular Saint of Assisi, A.D. 1209. Father Cheng was born in 1873, and joined the Franciscan Order in 1894, making his religious profession in 1898. He is therefore at the present day 51 years of age. Before being raised to the dignity of prelate, he was sometime professor in the Central Seminary of Kiangchowfu, Hupeh.

Their Missionary Field.

The other prelate is the Rev. Father Melchior Sun, of the Congregation of the Vincentians or Lazarists. Father Sun is a native of Peking, where he was born in 1869. He joined the Vincentian Fathers in 1897, and became a professed member of the Congregation in 1901. He is a little more advanced in age than the first prelate, being at present 55 years. In his previous lifetime, he laboured both as a missionary and a professor in the Preparatory Seminary, in Peking. He has had thus much experience both in the field and in teaching.

The Procession at Siccawei.

Monsignor Cheng, for such is the title to be henceforth given him, controls the whole region in the province of Hupeh south and southeast of the Yangtze River, down to the borders of Kiangsi. This comprises the district cities of Puki, Kiayü, Tsungyang and Tungcheng.

Monsignor Sun's sphere of work is in the province of Chihli, east of Paotingfu. The centre of the mission is Lihsien, with five other towns to the east and southeast, Shuhe, Ankuoh, Poyeh, Kaoyung and Shenchai. The congregation which he controls numbers 25,000 converts.

Preceding the bishops, both of these newly elected prelates walked in the procession, which took place in Siccawei at the opening of the General Council on May 15. Besides them was the Venerable Abbot Brun, Superior of the Trappist Monstery, near Peking. All three were highly conspicuous, and the object of peculiar attention on the part of the crowd. The natives were especially pleased in seeing two of their race among the highest dignitaries of that Church, which extends the world over, and reckons within her fold 325,000,000 members (Whitaker's Almanack, 1924, p. 263).

Seats in the General Council.

In the afternoon preceding the opening of the Council, five Commissions were established, each having a bishop presiding over it, and assisted by other bishops, theological consultors and secretaries. The two Chinese prelates are members of the 4th Commission, over which presides Bishop Geurts of Eastern Chihli. Among the consultors are the Very Rev. J. Verdier, S.J., superior-general of the Shanghai Mission; the Superior of the Dominicans, Foochow Mission; Rev. Father Espelage, of the Order of St. Francis, Wuchang, and Rev. Father Ford, representing the American Foreign Mission, Kuangtung. The presence of the Chinese prelates at the opening procession and as members of the above Commission, displays the wonderful progress of Catholic life in China, and the healthy expansion, which, as a result of the present Council, is expected to follow in the near future.

MEMORIAL TABLET TO SIR E. FRASER

Unveiled at the Consulate by Mr. Barton in Presence of Many Friends

The little ceremony which accompanied the unveiling of the Sir Everard Fraser memorial at the Consulate on Saturday was especially appropriate to the memory of the late Consul-General in being without ostentation in word or deed. There was a representative gathering of officials and friends, among those present being: Mr. G. S. Moss, M.B.E., Consul, Mr. W. S. Toller, Vice-Consul, Mr. A. J. Martin, Vice-Consul, Mr. C. E. Whitamore, Vice-Consul, Mr. H. J. Brett, Commercial Counsellor of Legation, Mr. H. N. Steptoe, Vice-Consul, Commander Green, Sir Skinner and Lady Turner and Miss Turner, Sir Edward Pearce, M. Wilden, Consul-General for France, Mr. V. Grosse, Assistant Commissioner of Russian Affars, Dean Symons and Mrs. Symons, Mr. Peter Grain, Mr. R. F. le Mesurier, Mr. A. Brooke-Smith, Mr. John Prentice, Mr. C. M. Bain, Mr. E. S. Benbow Rowe, Lieut. Col. T. E. Trueman, Major Hilton Johnson, Mr. Alister Campbell, Mr. M. Reader Harris, Mr. L. M. Beytagh, Mr. P. W. Massey, Mr. L. E. Canning, Mr. O. M. Green, Mr. A. C. Clear, Captain Hillman, Superintendent T. Vaughan and Mr. L. J. Cubitt.

A guard of honour, under command of Sgt. Fanthorpe, was furnished by "A" Co. British, S.V.C., (Sir Everard Fraser's old company) and presented arms before the memorial upon the arrival of Mr. Barton, H. M. Consul-General. In a brief speech Mr. Barton said:

In the past, the memorials upon the walls of this building have not been unveiled with any ceremony. The men whom they commemroate are not men who were very well known in Shanghai, and their memorials were placed here without any ceremony at all. In the case of the tablet I am about to unveil to the memory of Sir Everard Fraser, we thought a departure from that custom would be fitting in the case of a man who served so long at this post and who was so well loved in the place where he died. I do not propose to say anything in the nature of a eulogy of Sir Everard Fraser. It is unnecessary. Shanghai has already honoured him by placng a memorial tablet in the Cathedral. This small memorial placed here to-day thinks of him rather as the Consul, and merely records the fact of his service for 42 years and his death here at his post, and it is placed here by members of his own Service in China in testimony of their regard for him and of their desire to preserve his memory, and that this table may serve to keep his memory green and be an incentive to those who shall follow in his footsteps. On behalf of the Consular Service in China, I unveil this tablet.

The unveiling concluded the ceremony.

MOST of the Chinese newspapers on Monday contained reference to recent cases of abduction said to have taken place in Shanghai. It is suggested that these have been very numerous but that little can be known about them owing to threats held out to relatives of the victims. Special reference is made to the case of the wife of a piece goods broker, kidnapped from a theatre about a week ago, and held for a $50,000 ransom; one report states that $15,000 has been paid and that the woman has returned home. So many versions of the affair are given, however, that all must be accepted with the usual caution. One highly coloured story describes how the abductors decorated the lady's headdress with flowers and worshipped her as the goddess of wealth. Another report states that a special proclamation on the subject of these crimes has been issued by the Chief of the Chinese Constabulary, and that rewards are to be offered for information leading to the arrest of the gang believed to be at work. A leader writer points out that if these crimes are not checked, Shanghai will be unsafe for any wealthy person, either Chinese or foreign.

CAPT. D'OISY REACHES PEKING

Shanghai to the Capital in Nine Flying Hours: Most Difficult Stage

Departing from Lunghua at 5 a.m. on Thursday, Capt. d'Oisy reached Nanyuan Aerodrome, Peking, at 5.45 last evening. He covered the distance of 700 odd miles in nine flying hours, in what he described in an interview at Peking, as his "most difficult flight so far."

He made two two-hour stops at Hsuchowfu and Tsinanfu where he met with an ovation.

The start was made at the Lunghua field in the presence of M. Wilden, the French Consul-General, Dr. E. L. Tartois, Mme. Beudin and a surprisingly large group from the French colony, who had remained up all night to wish their countrymen "bon voyage."

The motor was started and the 'plane ran down the field and then rose gracefully into the air. In the early light, the tri-colour identification circlees on the lower side and similar colours on the tail which showed the 'plane to be French shone clearly.

The start was made under most favourable weather conditions. Only under such conditions and an engine working as near perfect as possible Capt. d'Oisy felt he could make the distance. In case of failure there was the threat of Marshal Chih Shi-yuan to seize the 'plane if it landed at Nanking.

Triumphant passage past this obstacle was announced in a telegram received by M. Wilden shortly before noon. Signed by Capt. d'Oisy, it stated that the aviators passed above Nanking at 6.45 a.m., and made a successful landing at Hsuchowfu.

The "North-China Daily News" Correspondent at Hsuchowfu wired yesterday afternoon that the machine, with both men in good condition, had arrived there at 8.50. They were greeted with a splendid reception by the foreign community and the Chinese authorities, every facility being afforded them for the remainder of the journey. Gen. Chen Tiao-yuan, Commissioner of Defence, who assisted so materially in the release of the Lincheng captives, gave personal attention to details which might be of assistance to the aviators. The landing and take-off were made perfectly. By 11 a.m. they were off again for Tsinan.

Tsinanfu, May 29.

Capt. d'Oisy arrived here at 1.15 p.m. and left two hours afterwards.—Reuter's Pacific Service

Peking, May 29.

Capt. d'Oisy arrived at Nanyuan at 5.45 p.m.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

"Most Difficult Flight."

Capt d'Oisy, interviewed by Reuter's correspondent, said that the Chinese authorities en route were helpful, but it was his most difficult flight so far.

As he was landing at Suchowfu a tyre burst, causing breakage of a shock absorber strut which the fliers repaired. While flying the magneto burnt out and a valve had to be replaced.

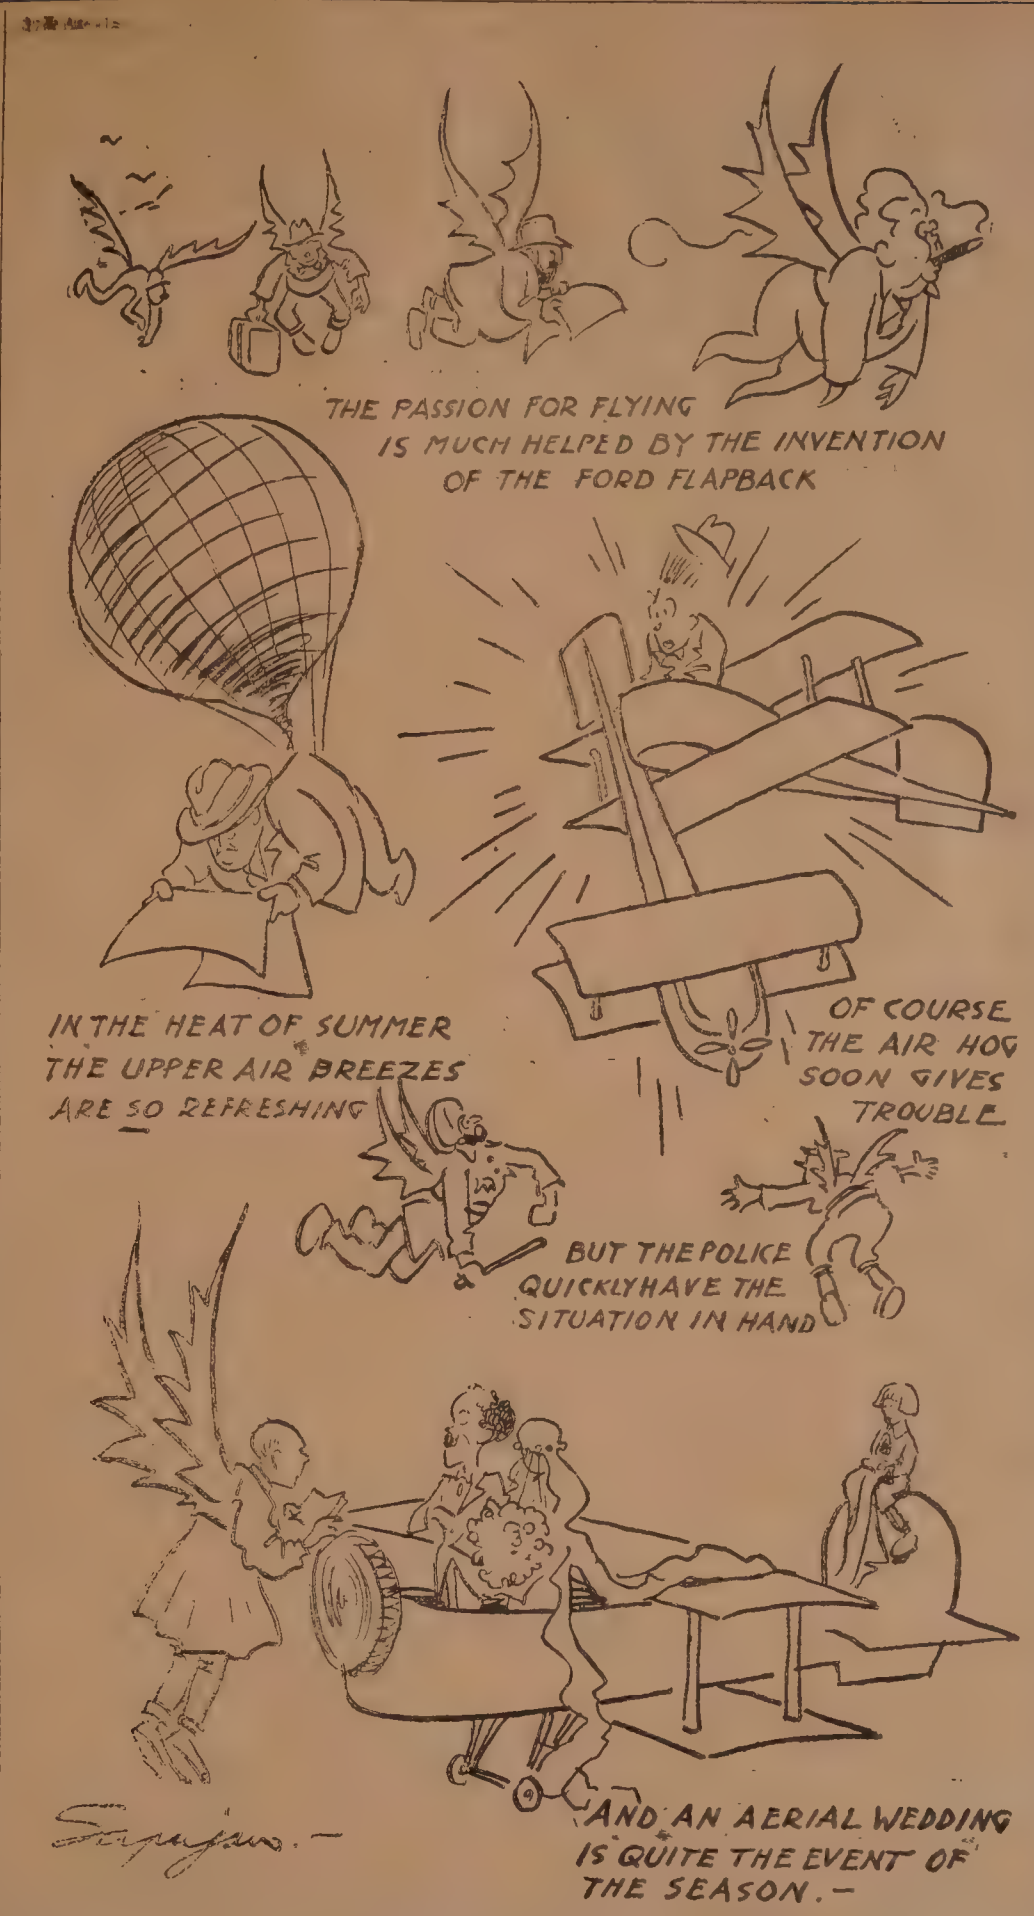
He made a perfect landing at Nanyuan escorted by a Chinese plane which went out to meet him.

Thousands of people were present including the French Minister, most of the French community, representatives of the Legations and numerous high Chinese officials. A feature of the reception was presentations to Capt. d'Oisy and his mechanic of commemorative medals and certificates from the President and the Aviation Department, and also handsome curios. The Aviation Director read an address of welcome to which Capt. d'Oisy replied, thanking the Aviation Department for the Assistance it had given throughout.

Three-day Stay in Peking.

Capt. d'Oisy expects to remain in Peking for two or perhaps three days. The French Minister is entertaining him to a banquet tonight. A Presidential and other receptions are arranged for to-morrow.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

It is announced that the Chinese Students' International Union will hold their annual conference at Shanghai in August.



THE ARRIVAL, ACTUAL AND PROSPECTIVE, OF FAMOUS AVIATORS, NATURALLY STARTS SHANGHAI ON A NEW CRAZE

GOODS TRAINS IN COLLISION

Serious Accident on Tientsin-Pukou Line, but No Lives Lost

Two goods trains crashed together on the Tientsin-Pukou line on Sunday night. A number of freight vans were completely wrecked, but as far as can be ascertained no one was killed or injured.

Miscellaneous freight is lined up alongside both lines. The track is covered with coaches smashed to splinters along the better part of a hundred yards. Portions of boxes, crates and general freight were hurled over an area of nearly an acre.

The crash which, it is reported, was caused by the failure of one engine driver to obey the signals, is a attributed entirely to his negligence. Passengers coming through to Shanghai say that the general opinion of railway men in the vicinity was that the driver ran right past the red light into the other engine, which had the right of way. It is reported that this driver, seeing the impending collision, jumped from the foot plate, without first throwing over the regulator. He has not been seen since, although officials and the military searched the country.

The scene of the accident is about 55 miles north of Pukou, not far from the ninth stop above the terminus, a small town called Changpaling.

Passengers reaching Shanghai from northern cities on the Blue Express stated that they were forced to go round the piled-up wreckage and walk until they met the up train, a portion of which then put back to the river with them and their baggage, which the coolies carried from the upper side of the wreckage. They arrived in Pukou several hours late, but according to the local railway officials, the Nanking express came in at the North Station but 40 minutes late.

Information received by Mr. G. L. Turner, assistant to the traffic manager, was very meagre merely to the effect that the trains had crashed and that coolies had carried the baggage round. One of the local specialists proceeded to the spot on Monday night. Passenger services are being maintained regularly, though in order to prevent delay, an extra siding is being constructed until the main line is cleared. This may take several days more.

WEDDING

Eustace—Hickson

A very pretty wedding took place on Thursday of last week in Holy Trinity Cathedral, which was effectively decorated for the occasion, when Miss Edna Hickson, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Hickson, of Maghull, Liverpool, was married to Mr. Harold Curtis Eustace, son of Mr. and Mrs. F. D. Eustace, of Croydon, Surrey, and Yokohama, Japan. The Very Rev. Dean Symons performed the ceremony.

The bride, who was given away by Mr. G. A. Haley, wore a charming costume of white marocain crêpe, elaborately trimmed with pearls, and carried pink carnations. The bridegroom was attended by Mr. H. G. Allen as best man and Mr. W. B. Hughes acted as usher. After the ceremony, a reception was held at 81 Yu Yuen Road, the residence of Mr. H. G. Allen.

CHAPEI VOLUNTEERS PROHIBITED

Military Governor of Shanghai Wholly Opposed: Existing Forces Quite Enough

Gen. Ho Feng-ling, Military Governor of Shanghai and Sungkiang, has refused to give his approval to the scheme of a number of local merchants to reorganize the Chapei and Shanghai City Volunteer corps.

It will be remembered that the merchants requested the Chinese General and City Chambers of Commerce to bring the matter to the attention of Gen. Ho and to persuade him to approve of the scheme, as it was very essential, they said, that the Volunteers should be reorganized in order that the members might give the local military and police authorities their support in coping with the armed robber menace and for the protection of Shanghai.

Gen. Ho, in a reply to the Chambers, said that he had seen their letter and a copy of the proposed regulations which would govern the Volunteer Corps and was much interested. He stated that he greatly approved of their spirit and greatly respected them for showing so much concern in maintaining peace and order within his territory, but—"Since the third year of the Republic," he writes, "you know that, although we have passed through many crises and troubles, we have managed to maintain peace and order and nothing untoward has happened. You will see, therefore, that our force of militia and police have been sufficient to carry out their multifarious duties properly and that there is no necessity of establishing once more the Volunteer Corps.

"Of course, we cannot compare Shanghai with the interior where there is constant trouble. Here I assume responsibility in maintaining peace and order, and I guarantee that my troops and police will maintain peace and order and will protect the people and their interests, including their lives and their properties. I might say conscientiously that we have been, are, and will continue to do our best to make them happy and peaceful.

"Please notify all concerned that I have ordered my subordinates, the troops and the police, to take stricter precautions in maintaining peace and order and that there is no need for them to worry about protection for that they will surely receive."

Merchants' Desire Justified

Commenting on Gen. Ho's letter, the "Shanghai Journal of Commerce" says that the merchants, in attempting to restore the Volunteers, have been striving hard for a long time to reach their object in order that they may themselves assist the police and the troops in maintaining peace and order, but now their hopes appeared to be shattered.

"The merchants, prompted by patriotic and protective motives, have been following a safe and a proper course," it adds. "They are respectable men, their aims are honourable and without reproach, and their actions are faithful and honest, not to say straightforward. They have tried to strengthen the troops and the police and to establish further the confidence of the people in the merchants. They wanted to protect the people's interests and their lives and property. The troops and police are insufficient in number. Absolutely no suspicion rests upon the aims of the merchants, who, as we have stated, are honourable and respectable. The Chambers of Commerce have gone over the regulations and found them in order, hence we hold that permission should be granted by the Military Governor for the reorganization of the Volunteers. Gen. Ho's contentions are based on firm grounds, but still we think that the Volunteers should be part of the merchants' equipment as they can do much to help the troops and the police to maintain peace and order for the benefit of their people. We have much to thank the police and the troops for, the efficient manner in which they have given us peace and protection in past years, but the robber menace is increasing."

THE World's Christian Students' Federation will meet in London from August 7 to August 21. China will be represented by Dr. Y. Y. Tsu, Mr. T. Z. Koo and Miss Yang Shih-tsen.

ATTACK ON RACING AT KIANGWAN

Chapei Merchants Protest to Paoshan Assembly against Evils of Gambling

Is Kiangwan Race Course a gamble? If so, should it come under the Chinese gambling laws? —These are questions that are being asked in Chinese circles as the result of a letter which, according to the Chinese Press, has just been addressed by a number of Chapei residents to the members of the District Assembly of Paoshan.

The merchants say that the strength of a country depends upon the strength of its citizens. When people who are strong physically, spiritually and mentally, the country is sure to be strong. But if the people lack in these three things it is only natural that the country should be very weak.

The Kiangwan Race Club, they say, does not in any way tend to strengthen China in this respect; on the contrary it is encouraging the gambling spirit. The opening of such a big place is simply for race meetings, and not, as the Chinese name suggests, an athletic club.

Simply a Cover.

It has been stated that racing has come from the West and that there should be race meetings for the benefit of foreigners as well as the Chinese. As a matter of fact racing is simply a cover, for in reality the race course is opened for gambling purposes. The issue of parimutuel and sweep tickets is nothing less than a lottery, the writers say.

Before racing was introduced in Shanghai, gambling was openly permitted, but the authorities refused to permit it further because it did not look nice, but now there is no difference at all between gambling and racing. Lotteries on a small scale injure the people's lives and property, but on a big scale they damage the financial market.

"Laws have been made by the Government forbidding lotteries," the writers continue, "and the Civil Governer has issued an order forbidding gambling as well as for the carrying out of the Government's law concerning lotteries. Everybody said that such acts on the part of the authorities were praiseworthy, but still we have permitted racing and gambling and the issue of race tickets without even taking any notice of them. Is this because racing is a part of western civilization that we welcome the practice and do nothing to suppress it—even going so far as to give it our support?

Foreign Countries' Example.

"Two years ago the Japanese Consul-General forbade his nationals to purchase race tickets, and America is now refusing to issue permits for the opening of race courses. Why? Because they know that such are a danger to society and injure their people.

"We learn that the Kiangwan Race Course was established because the Shanghai Race Club held but two meetings each year in spring and autumn. The promoters of the Kiangwan Race Course knew that the people were greedy for money and wanted to take chances at their luck, so they opened the Kiangwan Race Course and hoisted a new flag. Meetings are held whenever the weather is good, in spring, autumn and winter. On the days when they are expected to rest, the people are led to gamble in this place. The Shanghai Race Club has also increased the number of its racing days, and the two have since been competing. Altogether the two clubs hold 10 race meetings each year.

"Because of restrictions, the Shanghai Race Club has to limit its activities and the number of racing days each year. In Kiangwan, however, the number of days and meetings are limitless.

"Now, we understand, the two clubs are proposing to unite their activities. This year, the Kiangwan Race Course has been making improvements and extending its space in preparation for the entry of the Shanghai Race Club.

A Free-Gambling Place.

"All nationalities use Chinese territory as a free gambling place, and thus make Chinese territory a base for the menace to the lives and property of the people.

"Therefore, we are appealing to you members of the District Assembly, as representatives of the people of Paoshan District, in which the Kiangwan Race Course is situated, carefully to consider this question. You gentleman have to be responsible for the suppression of the Kiangwan Race Course. This is an important matter. The Kiangwan Course is a danger to the individual, to society, to the public in general and to the nation as a whole. We have, therefore, to ask you to discuss this matter to see whether or not we should in future grant permission for the continuance of the Kiangwan Race Course, to see whether it and its tickets are a gamble, to punish those concerned for conducting a gamble contrary to the law (should they come under Chinese law), or to limit the number of racing days, so that the source of the poison might be cut off."

THAT CADASTRAL LOT

Scene: A Court in Shanghai

Attorney: What is this?
Witness: A cadastral plan.
Judge: A what?
Witness: A cadastral plan.
Judge: What's that?
Attorney: A cadastral plan is . . . . er . . . Tell his Honour what a cadastral plan is Witness: A cadastral plan is a cada....that is to say, it is a plan issued by the Municipal Council.
Judge: But "cadastral!" What does that mean?
Witness: I am afraid I cannot tell you precisely.
Judge: Does anyone know what a cadastral plan is?

The Marshal looked at the clerk of the court, the clerk of the court looked at the court stenographer, the court stenographer looked at the reporter; the reporter looked at the judge and the judge looked at counsel, and nobody knew what a cadastral plan was.

It appears not a little surprising that so learned body of gentlemen found themselves unable to describe correctly so simple a thing as a cadastral plan. The situation is all the more astonishing when one considers that Shanghai is simply full of cadastral lots, and that every little lot has a plan of its own, so that people really should know a lot about the word.

The word cadastral is derived from cadastre, from the late Latin capitastrum, a register of the poll tax, and is a register of the real estate of a country, with details of area, names of owners, and value. A cadastral survey, therefore, properly is one which gives such information as the Domesday Book, but the term came into general use as a name for the Ordinance Survey of the United Kingdom, which is on a sufficiently large scale to give the area of every field or piece of ground. Thus the Encyclopædia Britannica.

In Shanghai the word is of course used in precisely the same sense. Here we have Consular lots and Cadastral lots. The "Consular lot" is the number given to a piece of ground upon registration at the Consulate to whose jurisdiction the owner is subject. The cadastral plan of the lot is the Municipal Council survey, giving exact details of the land and any property which may be upon it, area, name of owner, and assessible value. The cadastral plan is thus a complete and exact official record of land in the Settlement.

BRILLIANT Chang, a Chinese restaurant keeper who was sentenced at the Old Bailey on April 10 to 11 months in the second division for being in possession of cocaine, has a particularly livid record, according to the London police. Socially and educationally Chang is far removed from the ordinary Chinese. He is the son of a wealthy Chinese merchant who acts as contractor to the British Admiralty at Shanghai and Hongkong. Evidence was given that the cocaine was found at Chang's restaurant when the police searched it following the arrest of a woman who was convicted and admitted that she had been a drug-taker. Chang denied supplying the woman, and said he did not deal in drugs. He was not aware that the packet of cocaine was in a recess in his cupboard, and did not know how it got there.

OBITUARY

Mr. R. Utz.

Shanghai art circles will learn with deep regret of the death of Mr. R. Utz, the well-known Russian artist, which occurred at his residence in Shanghai on May 22, from tuberculosis.

The artist was chiefly remarkable for his impressionistic style, having a penchant for bold outstanding effects with plenty of colour. Like most artists and journalists he was never rich, and the news that one of his pictures, entitled "A canal scene," had sold for the sum of $160 caused him a great deal of pleasure, shortly before his death. He has held exhibitions of his work from time to time, the most recent being that at the Wintergarden Café. He exhibited some of his work at the exhibition held in the offices of the "North-China Daily News" a few days ago, and only ill-health prevented his serving on the committee. His loss will be a blow to Shanghai's artistic community.

Mr. Chun Fai-ting

The death is announced at his home, 13 Haining Road, at 5.30 p.m. on Sunday, of Mr. Chun Fai-ting, a director of the China Merchants' S. N. Co., and one of the leading Cantonese merchants in Shanghai.

Mr. Chun Fai-ting, who was a native of Sunwui, Kuangtung, and 76 years of age at the time of his death, came to Shanghai 45 years ago and immediately became connected with the infant China Merchants S. N. Co. Largely due to his indefatigable efforts, the company rose from small beginnings to what it is to-day, China's premier shipping concern. In spite of his advancing age, Mr. Chun attended office every day and was to be seen at his desk practically up to the time of his death. Many who passed the China Merchants' office in the Bund were no doubt familiar with the little, elderly figure of a Chinese gentleman who stepped out from his carriage and with the assistance of a servant walk into the office. This was Mr. Chun. He stuck to this carriage always, this being the only means of conveyance which he liked. Motor-cars he ignored.

Apart from his interests in the China Merchants' S. N. Co., Mr. Chun devoted a great part of his time to such organizations as the Chinese General Chamber of Commerce, the Cantonese Guild, the Cantonese Merchants' Association, the New York Life Insurance Co., and the Sun Life Insurance Co., of all of which he was a director. He also associated himself with many other organizations and activites and gave freely to deserving charities.

Mr. Chun was married and had 11 children, six sons and five daughters. Two daughters have already preceded him in death and the other three are married. His six sons are still alive and are well-known in Chinese circles. These are Mr. Chun Wing Kee of the China Merchants' Co., Mr. J. Wing-chun Chun (a district engineer in the Shanghai-Nanking Railway), Dr. J. Wing-hon Chun M. B., B. CH., (senior medical officer of the North Manchurian Plague Prevention Service), Mr. T. Wing-kue Chun, B. COMM. (assistant chief accountant of the Shanghai-Nanking and Shanghai-Hangchow-Ningpo Railways), Mr. Chun Wing-lai (of the China Merchants' Co.), and Mr. Chun Wing-ching.

Mr. A. A. Claxton

Shanghai cricketers and sportsmen in general were deeply grieved yesterday to learn of the death of Mr. A. A. Claxton. Mr. Claxton, who was in the Far East as the representative of a Manchester firm, had spent some time in Singapore and Hongkong and came to Shanghai last year. He had recently been down to Hongkong and only returned to the Settlement a few days ago. He succumbed to typhus.

Mr. Claxton was one of the finest cricketers seen here for many years and as a wicket-keeper he stood out even amongst the several very clever men the Settlement has had in that position in recent years. Some said of him that he was inclined to take liberties behind the wicket, yet it was seldom that he gave anything away through so doing. He was equally accomplished with the bat, being both a stylist and a fast and prolific scorer. He had the unique honour of having played Interport cricket for Singapore, Hongkong and Shanghai, which is believed to be a record. Mr. Claxton, who was a son of the Rev. A. E. Claxton, leaves a widow, with whom the greatest sympathy will be felt.

The funeral took place at Bubbling Well Cemetery on Tuesday afternoon, and many members of the Shanghai Cricket Club and other friends attended to pay a last tribute of respect to one whose sudden passing is so greatly regretted. The service in the Chapel and at the graveside was conducted by the Rev. A. N. Rowland, Pastor of Union Church. Among those present to express their sympathy with the chief mourner, Mrs. Claxton, were: the Rev. E. Box and Mrs. Box, Dr. J. Davenport, Captain E. I. M. Barrett, Dr. W. E. O'Hara, W. C. G. Clifford, D. W. Leach, A. E. Lanning, J. R. Weeks, E. S. Elliston, A. H. Leslie, A. Badeley, J. Tippin, G. F. Forshaw, R. Grimshaw, W. J. Monk, T. Rawsthorne, and W. Martin.

Many beautiful wreaths were sent.

GEN. FREDERICK WARD MEMORIAL

Dedication by U. S. Consul-General at Sungkiang: Chinese Join in Recognition

A large number of Americans, including Mr. E. S. Cunningham (Consul-General) and Mr. M. D. Purdy (Judge of the U. S. Court of China) and representatives of the Frederick Ward Post of the American Legion went to Sungkiang on Sunday to dedicate a memorial to Frederick Ward, the founder of the Ever-Victorious Army. When the foreigners arrived at the shrine, they found many Sungkiang officials there to welcome them, as well as a large number of Chinese. Red candles had been placed before the family tablets of General Ward by the Chinese, who apparently have come to regard the shrine as sacred to the memory of one who helped their country in the hour of distress.

The dedication programme was very simple. Rev. C. L. Boynton, of the American School, opened with a prayer, Mr. Gardner Crane, Commander of the Frederick Ward Post, then introduced Mr. Cunningham, who delivered a dedicatory address, in the course of which he said:—

It is altogether fitting that Frederick Ward should be honoured to-day by the American Legion, whose members are of those adventuresome Americans who crossed the Atlantic as Ward crossed the Pacific, and who fought in foreign lands for principles which they believed to be right and just and in defence of countries other than their own. But this memorial must be only a beginning of honours to be paid to this great-hearted American. This tablet that we unveil to-day is the first memorial erected exclusively by Americans in China to the memory of its distinguished citizen. It must not be the last, for on the American grounds in Shanghai, surrounded by Government buildings and under the flag of his country, should a monument be erected in commemoration of his services. The American Legion would do a great work if it accepts the responsibility for this monument. It will be a reminder to the Chinese people that it was erected to an American who helped their country in an hour of distress. His life typifies the great friendship that Americans and the American Government have always shown towards China. He brought that which China needed at that time, and many contributions has America made since to China of the things she needs, such as missions, schools, hospitals, etc.

Mr. S. K. Chen followed. He said that he had been requested to represent the provincial and other Chinese officials and to do honour to General Frederick Ward for the distinguished services which he rendered to China during the Taiping Rebellion. It was through General Ward's valuable assistance that the rebellion was finally quelled, thus enabling the people of Sungkiang and Shanghai to enjoy peace and order. Local Chinese joined with Americans in coming to the tomb during this part of the year to make a sacrificial offering to the memory of the General.

Mr. Chen placed a wreath upon the tomb on behalf of General Ho Feng-lin and Mr. Hsu Yuan.

After Rev. J. Bushey, pastor of Grace Church, Sungkiang, had pronounced the Benediction, a detachment of sailors from the American men-of-war in harbour and the Boy Scouts from the American School fired a volley to "Taps."

The inscription on the memorial is: "In Memory of the Organizer of the Ever-Victorious Army, erected by the Frederick Ward Post, American Legion."

ANOTHER SNAKE STORY

Hairs Transformed into Reptiles which Steal the Human Heart Away!

An up-to-date fairy tale, which has led the authorities to take steps to suppress it, has appeared in the Chinese press.

We are told that a 16-year old Chinese girl, taking a nap after tiffin several days ago, suddenly died. Her parents then sat on the front door-steps and began the usual Chinese weeping for the dead girl. A beggar, passing by, inquired what was the reason for the sadness, and upon being told, said that he would explain the reason for the girl's death.

If the parents, he said, would take the trouble to look at the four corners of the blanket of the bed on which the girl was lying they would find that in each was a human hair. The spirits of these had transformed themselves into poisonous snakes, and had worked their way into the girls' heart, which was all eaten up.

Upon saying this, the beggar disappeared from sight. The parents immediately took his advice and went to inspect the bed clothes. There they found, exactly located as the beggar had stated, the human hairs. They tapped the girl's bosom and found also that she was "heartless!"

The story was circulated, and of course the Chinese press took it up. One of the more enterprising reporters went to the house and lo! he too saw the hairs! After that many people looked at their blankets and found that these also had the hairs. They were immediately taken out and burned, so that the poisonous reptiles were also burnt to death and many human lives were saved.

The matter has now been brought to the ears of the authorities, who have issued an order forbidding the absurd story to be circulated further. They state that Shanghai is such an important commercial port and many people are not as enlightened as one might expect.

Remedy Clean Blankets

"Of late," states the proclamation, "a rumour has been circulated to the effect that human hairs in four corners of blankets have turned into poisonous snakes and have eaten the hearts of various people. This is a foolish rumour but ignorant men and women believe that it is true and have become greatly alarmed. It a menace to the public peace and order of Shanghai and has a great bearing on the minds of the people. No matter how many hairs blankets contain, it is foolish to think that they can be transformed into snakes. There evidently are some bad people in Shanghai who are attempting to stir up the minds of the people, hence all concerned are ordered to put an end to it at once. The police are ordered to take the necessary steps to suppress rumours of this nature and to arrest rumour-mongers. It is hoped that people will clean their blankets and not believe such stories, as during the winter the people neglect to change their bed sheets and blankets with the result that they are dirty and rumours of this nature are circulated. All concerned hereby take note."

OWING to lack of funds, the Chinese press understands, the National Southeastern University, Nanking, has decided to abolish its engineering department. This institution is considered to be one of the best administered in China.

CORRESPONDENCE

MIRAGE IN CHINA

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—It would be difficult to find a subject that has not been discussed in your correspondence columns, by the wire and sometimes otherwise.

I think though I am introducing a new subject, and that is mirage. Any sunny day after 10 o'clock a.m. on the sandy plains of China one sees with exact distinctness the clear water of beautiful lakes. Trees are seen growing in the lake and people carrying their burdens through it. To one not versed in mirage appearances it is difficult to believe the lake is phantom. Change your height, either by kneeling, or by ascending to a higher level and the mirage is proved.

On Sunday at noon after a severe blow of wind, and when the heavens were filled with all varieties of clouds for reflexion, we saw from our porch, several hundreds of yards distant, a native thatched house, and a pai-fang, a widow's monument. These were so distinct that at the time we did not realize we were viewing a mirage. We wondered that they could have been built so near us, and that we did not notice the workmen. When they disappeared, then we realized we had seen a mirage.

I want to ask if others have seen objects in mirage, not in the sky, but as though built upon the earth. There were two of us and we discussed it together, so there is no doubting the facts in the case.

I am, etc.,
ONE WHO PRACTISES PROHIBITION.

May 21, 1924. Tenghsien, Shantung.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—In reference to the letter on the above subject which appears in to-day's issue, I beg to call attention to a passage in the "China Sea Pilot," Vol. V. p. 490, referring to the coast from Litsinho to Ninghai (near mouth of Yellow River).

"Mirage.—This shore in hazy weather presents a very peculiar appearance from seaward, all objects being ridiculously magnified. The small villages start out of the mist like huge towns, and men loom like towers, whilst the shores vanish on either hand in long, finely tapering points."

I have often seen "pools" of mist in Chihli province and Mr. Barcus of "hollow-earth" fame was led to his illusion largely by the mirage effects at the mouth of the Huangpu.

All these phenomena arise from a low lying layer of dense vapour which distorts the light passing through it.

I am, etc.,

ARE FISH SOMNAMBULISTIC?

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—Say! Can any of your paper perusers enlighten yours truly, Fisher T. Fish, on a dashed perplexing problem i.e., are fish ever dormant? As a gold fish enthusiast I guess I have frequently dashed from my couch way back during the small hours of the night in the hope of getting wise as to whether the boys indulge in a little nap but I have sure met with little success.

As a wind up I may say that I have been no more fortunate in my nocturnal expeditions with sampan and lantern at this sea-side resort commonly known as the "Los Angeles" of China.

I am, None Other Dear Sir,
Than,
Yours as ever and a day,
FISHER T. FISH.

Ningpo, May 21, 1924.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—Referring to the letter appearing in last Saturday's issue of the "North-China Daily News" under this heading, it would appear that our friend, Mr. Fisher T. Fish (I doubt whether this is his correct name—it sounds a bit "fishy"), has forgotten his Esperanto otherwise he would remember that the word fish is a redivation of the verb Fishanto—to sleep.

I must confess, however, that I have never yet seen a fish in a dormant state and would be very interested to hear whether any of your fish-loving readers can throw any light on the matter.

I am, etc.,
INTERESTED.

Nanking, May 28, 1924.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—Referring to the article appearing in the correspondence columns of last Saturday's "N.-C. D. N." I should be very pleased if Mr. Fisher T. Fish would be so good as to do me the honour of entertaining him one evening at my country place. "The Rockery," Ningpo, (standing as it does in its own grounds and possessing magnificent portals it is an ideal place for fish) when I shall have much pleasure in showing him my aquarium which is considered to be one of the finest in the world and will also have the satisfaction of convincing him that fish do sleep. They do not, or cannot, however, close their eyes, hence the familiar expression "poor fish." I may say that I have made a life-long study of aquatic oviparous animals and can therefore speak with some authority on the subject.

I have not the pleasure of knowing Mr. Fish's real name but if he will drop a line to the undersigned intimating when he proposes availing himself of my invitation I will make suitable arrangements for receiving him.

Enclosing my card,

I am, etc.,
PROFESSOR BROWN.

TWO RACING QUESTIONS

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—There are two matters more or less controversial upon which I venture to address you.

The first is the question of declaration to win at Race Meetings here. I enclose a cutting from the last received copy of the "Weekly Times," which you might, if you think fit, reproduce. I have no doubt in my own mind that whenever a stable has more than one starter in a race, it is only fair to the public to make a declaration. I can call to mind many instances during the past few years in which there has been no such declaration and the public has been disagreeably surprised.

The question is further complicated by the fact that in some cases an owner has ponies running in his own name whilst owning shares on joint account with others in ponies running in the same race.

Should there be any declaration in such cases?

The second question is that over which so much controversy now rages—what is a China Pony?

On this, I feel that most of us are missing the point.

The pony raced here and on most, if not all, of the courses in China is, or was, a Mongolian-bred animal.

I have travelled fairly extensively in China and have, except in the north, found the China pony to be a small animal rarely exceeding 12.3 and usually much under even that height but with many characteristics in shape and manners.

I speak of Kuangtung, Kuangsi, Yunnan and Kueichow in particular.

I am told that in Szechuan the same small hardy breed is to be found and that the Burmese pony is of much the same type.

At the close of the Russo-Japanese War the Mongel breeders got hold of a number of Cossack horses and mares and commenced to interbreed, obviously with a view to improvement.

This has resulted in some of the "Smashers" that are now in the "lime-light" of racing circles to-day.

When I first arrived in the East early in 1901 "Walers" were raced in Hongkong and elsewhere. There can be little doubt but that a lot of "Waler" blood, through them, filtered into Mongolia.

It should not be difficult to discriminate between the Mongolian pony and half-breeds but the China pony is very much more like an Arab than any pony such as we imported exclusively from Mongolia and raced in the old days.

Mr. Morriss is right in his contention that the Mongol horse breeders only wanted to improve the breed by importing fresh strains; and that this has been done is abundantly proved by recent results.

The real "China Pony" is not Mongolian. Let us agree to race Mongolian-bred ponies and leave it at that.

They may improve their breed as much as they like. Why not? We have done the same in Britain, since the days of "Eclipse."

I am, etc.,
PHILIP W. GOLDING.

Shanghai, May 27, 1924.

P. S. The above was written before I had seen the letter from your Tientsin correspondent in this morning's issue of your paper.

*The cutting enclosed by our correspondent is as follows.—

H. H. THE AGA KHAN AND MR. DAWSON.

Question of a Declaration

During the flat-racing season of last year we (the "Times") published some articles by our Racing Correspondent commenting upon the practice of owners running two horses in the same race without making a declaration as to the one with which he intends to win. One of the races under review was the Coronation Stakes, where the two horses in question were Paola and Teresina, owned by his Highness the Aga Khan and trained by Mr. R. C. Dawson. In this race Teresina carried the Aga Khan's first colours and Paola his second colours; Teresina was first favourite, but Paola won, and Teresina finished second.

Our Correspondent expressed the opinion that the owner would have been well advised from the public point of view to have run only one of the horses, but he had no desire to suggest that the result was anything but unfortunate. The Aga Khan and Mr. Dawson, however, thought that the articles impugned their good faith and integrity. We desire to correct that impression. The Aga Khan is a very good friend of England, and a welcome and honoured patron of the Turf in this country. The success of Mr. Dawson's career as a trainer is sufficient testimony to the trust which is reposed in him by the racing community.

We trust that this explanation will remove any misunderstanding which may have arisen in the minds of any of our readers. We, however, adhere to the view that where an owner runs two horses in the same race he should, in the interests of the public, make a declaration.

PLAYING THE GAME

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—Although I have absolutely no connexion with the Jewish Boy Scouts and Cubs and although I attended neither the Jamboree held on Thursday nor the one on Saturday, I hope you will permit me to answer Ricardo's letter, as I happen to be of the same race as the boys who won.

Those of us who are acquainted with the parents of some—not all—of the boys, who are extremely orthodox, will understand that they would never permit their sons to take part in the competition on their Sabbath—the day of rest—especially in the fire-lighting event. I am sure not all the Jewish boys whose parents respect the Sabbath and who were there went there with the knowledge of their parents.

I can assure Ricardo that it was not very many years ago that—when still a boy—I used to sneak away on a Saturday afternoon to go and watch the football matches or some other sporting event and, upon returning home, used to receive a good scolding—and sometimes a hiding from my father for not having attended the Synagogue Services.

Would Ricardo have wished rather to see the whole troop turn out on Thursday or only part of the troop on Saturday under such a condition?

Thanking you for the space you allow me, and enclosing my card.

I am, etc.,
A YOUNG JEW.

Shanghai, May 27, 1924.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—"Ricardo's" letter referring to the conditions under which the Jewish Scouts and Cubs won the two shields is most opportune.

There is no doubt that the conditions under which the Jewish lads performed their stunts were all in their favour, especially so in the case of the very little boys, the Cubs, as they were immune from the natural nervousness and excitement usually engendered both in men and boys when performing in public under the scrutiny of a thousand eyes.

Yet again, the Girls School Cubs and other packs had to perform in the face of a crowd after they had been enjoying themselves at the sideshows and after they were tired little boys through waiting in those surging and tiresome queues.

The Jewish Cubs were taken to a beautiful garden, fresh and tuned up to the minute and there went through their stunts under entirely different and more favourable conditions to all the other little boys.

Of course, the Scout Council is responsible for having allowed this to take place for although the Council will naturally consider the religious susceptibilities of the various packs it must also be remembered they are also the guardians of all the packs, and the fair thing to have done was to insist upon equal stunts under equal conditions, coute que coute, which in this case they have quite failed to do.

The scoring between the Jewish Cubs and the Cathedral Girls School Cubs was very close—totals of 93.6 per cent. as against 92.5 per cent.—and, if I remember rightly, the Girls School Cubs beat the Jewish Cubs in all the detailed items marked on the blackboard and only lost to them on the "general" marking for their camp effects.

As "Ricardo" points out, the Jewish leaders had no religious qualms about allowing their lads to put on their war-paint and to receive their Shields in public, nor also, in allowing the lads to enjoy themselves on a Saturday afternoon as all boys like to and ought to do—but some explanation is awaited from the Jewish Elders controlling the packs as to why religion prevented the boys doing their stunts with their companion Scouts and Cubs?

If their boys must needs perform in quietness and privacy—so, by the same token, should their boys have received their Shields in seclusion and privacy and not in the full glare of publicity—on their Sabbath.

What were the Jewish Elders doing to allow their little boys to have a glorious Jamboree on their Sabbath if no exception could be made, for once in a way, to performing their stunts—for the two things are synonymous and the spirit precisely the same.

The essence of the Scout Movement is fair play and "fair does," and in this matter all the other packs of Scouts and Cubs have been penalized in favour of the Jewish packs—and, in face of the presence of the latter on Saturday afternoon taking full part in all of the Jamboree except their business—penalized unfairly.

I am, etc.,
ENGLISHMAN.

Shanghai, May 27, 1924.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—First I must thank you for your kind defence of the Jewish Scouts and Wolf Cubs in your Notes and Comments on Tuesday. What "Ricardo" had at the back of his head when he wrote his letter, which appeared the same day in your columns, on the subject of the Jewish Scouts and Cubs and the Empire Day Jamboree, is not quite clear to me. Is he upset because the Jewish boys carried off both shields or does he wish to start a religious argument?

If I am to reply to the former, I would point out that the judges were the same for all Troops and Packs and that they were gentlemen who could be relied upon to give fair decisions.

Some months before the date of the Jamboree, when it was first realized that Empire Day would fall on a Saturday, the Jewish Sabbath, the Jewish Troop, then holders of the Rotary Club Shield, decided that they could not compete this year, and it was the suggestion of the Scoutmasters of the other Troops that they should give their exhibition on a different day, and though realizing the disadvantage this might be to them they fell in with it.

It might also interest "Ricardo" to know that the Jewish Scouts did not attend on Saturday "with drums beating and colours flying." They use something a little more "woodcrafty" than a drum, they have a tom-tom, which, at the time of the Jamboree, reposed peacefully on the second shelf of the cupboard in their clubroom in North Szechuen Road. As for the flying colours, they do not possess a Troop flag, but they hope shortly to have a totem-pole. They attended in uniform but without staves, band instruments or colours. There is surely no sin in that!

"Ricardo" should also understand that the points for the Jamboree represented only 30 per cent., 70 per cent. being awarded for the method of carrying out the training during the year. In the case of both the Troop and the Pack it was the points for the latter which gave them the lead. It is difficult to declare a Troop or Pack efficient on a 20 or 10 minutes' display and it is the work of the year that should count.

As for the religious question, I regret that I am not an authority on this subject, but I did take the trouble to inquire before the Jamboree if it would be in order for the Jewish boys to attend and ride the chutes, etc. To one who understands the Jewish religion there is a big difference between driving a tent peg and sliding down a chute.

Let "Ricardo" look at the circumstances as they would appear if reversed. Supposing the Jewish Troop invited one of the Christian Troops to take part in a competition on a Sunday, the Scoutmaster of the Christian Troop, if he knew his job, and a number of the boys' parents would decline, but would that prevent those same Christian boys having a romp round the garden on Sunday?

The Jewish Scouts and Cubs sincerely hope that "Ricardo" is in no way connected with any of the other Troops or Packs as they would not like to feel that there is any unfriendly feeling between their brother Scouts and themselves.

Scoutmaster and Cubmaster,

SIR,—In reply to your Note and Comment whether Jews can participate in the rejoicings of their fellow-citizens on a Sabbath day or not, I believe there is nothing in the Bible to prevent them from doing so, so long as they do not engage themselves in manual work.

If there were some Jewish patrol leaders on the course on Saturday last, they were there as spectators to watch the work done by their competitors and anxious to know the result of the day, which is not unnatural and does not in the very least degree desecrate their Sabbath.

Mrs. E. M. Gull, c/o The British Women's Association, Shanghai.

I am in receipt of your letter of February 28, enclosing cheque value £386.8.9, being the result of a lecture given by Mr. W. E. Cowen.

Would you please accept and convey to the Societies of St. Andrew, St. Patrick, St. George, St. David, The Shanghai Race Club, the "North-China Daily News" and the British Women's Association, the most grateful thanks of our Chairman and Council for the very generous and practical way in which you have helped us.

Will you please accept the expression of gratitude which I am conveying, as coming not from the organization alone, but from our Blinded men, who from the benefits received by their training at St. Dunstan's and with the aid of our After Care organization, are able to take their places as happy and useful citizens again.

It is by such support that we are able to carry out the promise made on behalf of the Nation by the late Sir Arthur Pearson, our Founder and Chief, that no war-blinded men should ever want for help and comfort.

I enclose herewith official receipts, and should like once more to assure you of our warmest thanks.

Yours very truly,

GERMAN POINTERS

To the Editor to the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—In view of the forthcoming Dog Show I would be greatly obliged if any of your readers could tell me the characteristics of a German pointer.

I am, etc.,
CANIS.

Shanghai, May 24. 1924.

To the Editor of the
NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—Mr. Canis asks for the characteristics of the "German pointer," and I take it that he wants to know the points of the dog, as we say in canine circles.

The pointer dog goes back in dog history as far as about 1600 A.D. when it was known as a dog with which you can kill "when on the wing." It was about this period when it was imported into England, but prior to this, it was well known in France, Germany and Italy. I have several of the best books on dogs, but cannot find any individual points relative to the "German pointer." I believe, (but am willing to be corrected) that the only differences that characterize the German pointer from the English are its size and colours. The German pointer is larger than either the English or French pointer and is generally of white coat with liver ticks, or liver patches, and liver ticked. I have had all kinds of pointers but prefer the "German pointer" to the others. Why? Well, I cannot tell you unless it is that it is larger and I love large dogs. For shooting purposes I really do not think there is any difference in the breeds; everything counts in his training and general management. I offer the following points for Mr. Canis's consideration, but again I am willing to learn or be corrected.

HEAD:—Wide from ear to ear, long and slanting from top of skull to the setting on of the nose; cheek bones prominent, ears set low and thin in texture, soft and velvety. Nose broad at base, mouth larger and jaws level.

NECK:—The neck should be strong, but long and slightly arched, meeting the shoulders well knit into the back which should be straight and joining a wide loin. Great depth of heart room, deep brisked, narrow chest, if possible, shoulders long and slanting.

LEGS AND FEET:—Legs straight, knees big, and bones of good size down to the toes, the feet should be cat-shaped and very round.

HIND QUARTERS:—It cannot be too long in the haunch, or strong in the stiffle, which should be well bent, and the muscles in the second thigh of a good pointer are always remarkable. The hocks may be straighter than in a foxhound, for in pulling up sharp on the "point" it in a great measure throws its weight on to them. The shank bones below the hock should be short.

COLOUR:—The colours of pointers are multi-coloured, some black and white, others liver and white, but most of the pointers only show two colours, white being the ground and liver the colouring or vice versa. The full liver-coloured English pointer is, I think, the most popular in the Far East, of all pointers but not of sporting dogs.

HEIGHT:—The height of a dog is about 24-26 inches and a bitch 23-25 inches.

WEIGHTS—64 lbs. for a dog and 54 lbs. for a bitch is about the right weight.

The above I sincerely trust will help our friend Canis, and I sincerely hope to see his dog in the show on the 14th. May I quote where the ordinary owner is incapable of judging his own dog? A miner sent his dog to the show giving his son half-a-crown entrance fee. His final instructions were, "You tell the bloomin' Judge he's not much to look at; but he is a 'danged' good ratter." Papa came at the closing time and found his dog had won first place. Go ahead Mr. Canis, and may you do likewise.

Apologizing, Sir, for taking so much space,

I am, etc.,
P. H. H.

POPULATION OF SHANGHAI

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—I observed in your issue of May 16 ("Shanghai—the Wonder City of all Asia") the statement that, according to one report, Shanghai is to-day the largest city in Asia. In Whitaker's Almanack the following figures are given for the population of the largest cities in Asia—Tokio 2,173,000, Osaka 1,633,000, Peking 1,300,000, Calcutta 1,263,292, Canton 1,250,00, Bombay 1,172,953, Shanghai 639 000. Even allowing, then, for the partial depopulation of Tokio as a result of the earthquake and granting that the figures for Peking and Canton may be slightly too large, Shanghai, it would seem, still has a long way to go before being able to claim pride of place among the cities of Asia.

I am, etc.,
X. O. X.

Shanghai, May 22, 1924.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—Your correspondent "X.-O.X." quotes Whitaker's Almanac as an authority on the population of Shanghai. Why this is taken in preference to the Annual Reports of the Shanghai Municipal Council is hard to discover.

The S.M.C. Annual Report for 1920, on page 271a, states that the population of the Foreign, French and Chinese districts of Shanghai was 1,687,967 (Whitaker gives 639,000 according to "X.O.X."). It further states that in the five years preceding 1920 the population had increased 22.48 per cent.

Even if the same ratio of increase has continued, and most authorities judge that later increases have been in even greater proportion, the population to-day will be well over 2,000,000. The latest reports from Tokio estimate the population there to-day to be not more than 1,500,000, so that if "X.O.X.'s" other figures are correct Shanghai leads Tokio, Osaka, Peking, Calcutta, Bombay and Canton by about 20 or 25 per cent. in its population figures.

I am, etc.,
S. M. D.

THE "Shunpao" says that the British Government has notified the Legation in Peking that until the likin stations are abolished and the illegal cigar and cigarette taxes revoked no steps should be taken by the British authorities in connexion with the calling of the special tariff conference.

BRIEF messages sent to us by Mr. Harry Morriss in the course of his journey Home vid Siberia are all in appreciative terms, the railway service excellent and the journey picturseque and interesting. He mentions that the only money in use in the "Chevonitz" note, worth about £1, with which the traveller has no trouble at all. "I am glad I came this way," Mr. Morriss writes, "as it is not only interesting but extremely pleasant. There is one Wagon Lit car run by the Soviet Government, on the train. The dining car and food are very good."

READERS will remember reading in these columns last week a breezy tale by the Tientsin News Service of the recalcitrant students of Peiyang University who surrounded the Ministry of Education to enforce their demands for the immediate dismissal of their University President, (non persona grata to them) and were only persuaded to leave by a subterfuge. The Chinese Press on Sunday followed up the story by reporting that 167 students had "tendered their resignations" rather than study under a President who refused to be dismissed. Meanwhile the Minister of Interior has sent a secret message to the Civil Governor of Chihli at Tientsin saying that, latterly, students have been refusing to study and have been accepting Bolshevism and spreading Bolshevistic propaganda, such as the nationalization of women, "much to the danger of the peace and order of the country," and will the Civil Governor, please, take steps to place them under proper control?

SOUTHERN RHODESIA

SOUTHERN Rhodesia which was inaugurated as the youngest self governing Colony of the British Empire on October 1, 1923, and which had previously for 33 years been ably administered by the British South Africa Company possesses one of the finest climates in the world with long hours of sunshine, breezy temperate days and cool nights. For those who wish to take up farming or ranching in order to make the most they can of their capital, energy and technical knowledge, or for those who wish to retire from strenuous business or professional life and make a home, Rhodesia offers many advantages unequalled elsewhere. The business, social, sporting, educational and medical facilities bear favourable comparison with those of other countries. Native labour is plentiful and when properly managed is cheap and efficient. Taxation is light. Good land in healthy surroundings and amidst fine scenery is plentiful and not expensive.

Full information is obtainable on application to The Secretary, Southern Rhodesia Settlers' Board (attached to the Government of Southern Rhodesia), P. O. Box 372, Salisbury, S., Rhodesia.

The giving of advice to prospective settlers will be facilitated if applicants will advise the Board in detail of their circumstances and the amount of capital they would be prepared to invest in a suitable venture

The price came yesterday at 34⅝d. ready and 34⅞d. forward, against 34⅞ ready and 34⅛d. forward a week ago, showing a rise of ⅛d. in ready and a fall of ⅛d. on forward compared with last week. The lowest prices during the week were 34⅛d. ready and 34⅛d. forward on Tuesday and Wednesday. India and China are reported as sellers during the week and the Continent as a buyer.

Bars in stock, 5,180, including Silver Yen 10 lakhs. Stocks of Sycee and Dollars amount to Tls. 364⅔ lakhs and $353⅓ lakhs, against Tls. 365 lakhs and $416 lakhs last week, and Tls. 197⅓ lakhs and $241⅓ lakhs on May 29, 1923. During the week $69⅓ lakhs have been shipped to the Cocoon Districts.

Exchange.

Exchange left off last week with the official quotation for T.T. at 3/3⅛d., where it remained until Tuesday afternoon. The market closed that afternoon quite weak, with very few sellers at that rate. On Wednesday, the rate dropped to 3/3d., but went up again yesterday to 3/3⅛d. With silver up yesterday morning ⅛d. ready and forward the official quotation rose to 3/3⅛d. The market opened firm yesterday and closed at tiffin time steady with sellers of T.T. at 3/3⅛d. May/June, 3/3⅜d. July forward, with very little merchant business doing and no bills offering whatever.

Speculators are reported oversold Yen 5,000,000 and £1,300,000.

THE SILVER MARKET

Quiet and Inactive: Senators Anxious to Allocate Outstanding Amount of 14,000,000 Ounces

Reporting from London on April 23, Messrs. Samuel Montagu & Co. state:—

The market has been quiet and inactive, China and India doing but little. The former has been a small seller and the latter a very moderate buyer. Until Monday the price remained steady, but a strong improvement in sterling exchange with America caused freer sales from that quarter, and quotations have dropped. Though still better exchange rates would make purchases easier from the United States, the tone of the market is fairly steady.

It is reported that Senator Pittman will soon place before the Banking and Currency Committee of the Senate all data pertaining to his bill recently introduced for the completion of purchases of silver under the Pittman Act of 1918. The Senator will endeavour to have such action recommended to Congress, as will make it mandatory for the Treasury to allocate the outstanding fourteen million ounces of silver. Both his arguments and the arguments of the Treasury officials will be included in the testimony before the committee.

The silver quotations to-day for cash and two months' delivery are each ⅛d. below those fixed a week ago.

A Good Undertone.

Messrs. Mocatta & Goldsmid, reporting from London on April 17, state:—

The silver market has been very steady during the past week and the price, which has been on a slightly higher level, has only varied between 33⅛d. and 33⅜d. India has shown more disposition to buy, whilst China has both bought and sold, but the chief support of the market has been the buying on Continental account, which has been in evidence on most days. As this buying has been mostly for forward delivery, whilst a good deal of the selling has been for spot, the two quotations since the 12th instant have until to-day been identical. In view of the Easter Holidays the market at present is quiet and apathetic, but the undertone seems good and we do not look for any important change at present.

April 24.—Owing to the Easter Holidays, business in the silver market has been very restricted during the past week and there is little to report. There has been very little buying, either for India or China, and the market has again been chiefly supported by Continental buying, against which there has been a little China selling. The price, which a week ago was 33⅜d., is to-day 33d., the rise in the American exchange having encouraged sales from that quarter and caused a weaker feeling in the market, but the undertone is fairly steady.

THE GOLD MARKET

The Accumulations in America and the Suggestion of State Loans: The Present Impasse

Reporting from London on April 23, Messrs. Samuel Montagu & Co. state:—

The Bank of England gold reserve against its note issue on the 16th instant, amounted to £126,287,835, as compared with £126,286,745 on the previous Wednesday.

Only a small proportion of the fair amount of gold on offer this week was taken for the Far East. Whilst the American exchange is moving in such a way as to reduce the price of gold, the Indian bazaars are likely to hold off in the hope of obtaining gold at a still lower figure. It is reported from Bombay that the slackening of demand for bullion, particularly for gold, that was felt at the beginning of the month was attributed by bullion dealers in the bazaars to the prevalence of plague in the Punjab.

	Laths of Rupees.
Imports, private merchandise	19,31
Exports, private merchandise (including re-exports)	41,35
Net imports of private treasure	4,03

The balance of trade, including enfaced rupee paper, etc., is Rs. 17,52 lakhs in favour of India, as compared with Rs. 13,61 in favour of India in February.

Gold valued at $4,435,000 has arrived in New York from London.

American Accumulations.

The always interesting circular of the National City Bank of New York thus comments upon a speech of the Chairman of the Westminster Bank, at a meeting under the auspices of the Institute of Bankers, in which he alluded to the huge gold accumulations in the United States of America:—

"Dr. Leaf's theory seems to be that this gold should be used as the means of making loans or industrial investments in other countries, thus counteracting the influence of the people investments here. Who is to make such investments? Is not customary for Governments to make loans, and the Government of the United States is not the owner of these gold reserves, except as a trustee. It is not customary for banking institutions, either here or in London, to buy securities, either of foreign or domestic origin, except to sell, and they buy only what they are confident they can sell. We come, therefore, to a conclusion with which we are sure Dr. Leaf will agree, that if this gold is to be transferred to Europe by means of investments it must be done through the voluntary action and choice of private investors. The people who are able to make such investments probably have had no part in bringing the gold to this country, and most likely feel no responsibility for its being here. They will be governed in their decisions about investments by about the same considerations as would govern an Englishman, a Frenchman, or a German. They have bought in the aggregate quite a sum of foreign securities in recent years, in view of the fact, with which Dr. Leaf is familiar, that the United States itself affords many and excellent opportunities."

The above does not allude to the fact that the United States—as a State—made loans to other countries in connexion with the Great War, and that this very circumstance is an important factor in the gold impasse that confronts that country. Great Britain's annual payment of debt and interest induces a flow of gold into U.S. reserves, and any payments by other countries on account of similar debt—should they be made—would have a like result, unless the policy of the United States of America in its corporate capacity be modified. The United States did not leave the finance of the war to private initiative, and any financial difficulties accruing from Governmental financial action during the war would also appear to lie within the function of he State.

Indeed, the above extract does not conflict with this view, for it contains this sentence: "The people who are able to make such investments probably have had no part in bringing the gold to this country, and most likely feel no responsibility for its being here." When, therefore, a suitable moment occurs, such as, for instance, the loan suggested for the purpose of restoring stability to the currency system of Germany, an opportunity would seem to be afforded for judicious action on the part of the United States in its capacity as a State.

SHANGHAI MARKET REPORT

Very Little Business on Account of Approaching Settlement: Auctions Quite Brisk

May 31.

It is one of the features of a general holiday in Shanghai that its effects on business always are felt for several days both before and after the actual celebration and that has been the case this week. Next week there will be a cessation of piece goods auctions and most other business on account of the Dragon Festival and the Whitsun holidays and in preparation therefore very little business has been done this week, most of the Chinese being too busy over the settlement, which it is anticipated will pass off quite smoothly. The piece goods auctions were the one exception, business in the salesrooms being really brisk.

Piece Goods.

So far as indent firms were concerned the week has been as quiet as any for a very long time, dealers reporting less inquiry all round. There was nothing doing in Greys or Whites and only a little business in Fancies for shipment towards the end of the year.

Cotton, Yarn, Etc.

China Cotton.—The market has been very quiet throughout the week, with very little doing, but it remains steady at practically the same quotations as last week. The Chinese Cotton Goods Exchange was closed yesterday afternoon. The latest spot quotations are: — Tungchow, 48½-49; Shensi 46-47; Hankow 45.

Yarn.—Though there was a somewhat easier tendency early in the week, few sales resulted and the tone now is steady to firm.

Produce.

All markets continue lifeless and there is nothing of interest to report. A few inquiries are coming forward from America for egg products, but at prices which render business impossible. There is nothing to indicate any improvement in the near future.

NEW SALVAGE COMPANY FOR SHANGHAI

Two Tugs and Fleet of Cargo Lighters to be Purchased: No Success, no Payment

A British company, to be registered under the Hongkong Ordinances, is in the course of formation by Messrs. Bowern & Co., ship brokers and general shipping agents, of Shanghai, as managers and agents, for the purchase of two large and powerful salvage tug-boats, on which an option has been secured, and several large new cargo lighters for operating on the China Coast, for towing, cargo transportation and salvage purposes. The salvage boats are fitted with wireless and all the latest appliances for this class of work and will carry expert engineers and divers well experienced in wrecking operations. Salvage operations will be conducted on the principle of "no success, no payment."

Support has been promised to the promotters by ship owners, insurance companies, dock companies, etc., who are interested. It is anticipated that the company will be formed and floated as soon as the prospectus and full details are issued to those who have agreed to take shares in the company. A few shares will be placed on the market for sale.

EXHIBITION OF CHINESE TRADE MARKS

In view of the importance of trade-marked Chinese goods and with the dea of making registered marks known to the public, the Shanghai Chinese General Chamber of Commerce will devote its fourth annual exhibition of goods to trade-marking. The chamber has recently been devoting one year each to a group of allied industries or subjects, and taking up trade marks at this time bears out this programme. The exhibition will be at the commercial museum of the Chamber, North Honan Road, on October 10. It will succeed a display of products of the Chinese chemical industry. This followed a display of silk goods collected and displayed last year from all parts of China. A considerable portion of the silk display then was sent to America for an exhibition held in New York.

It is announced that the purpose of this trade mark exhibition will be to fix the attention of the public on the importance of trade marks and the necessity for adequate control to prevent duplication and infringement. The attention now being centred on the subject is partly the result of a trade mark law promulgated by the Chinese Government last year.

The exhibition held at the museum will contain only products manufactured by Chinese labour and capital. It is expected that firms from all parts of China will be represented, although most will, of course, come from Shanghai. Besides the actual goods in package or wrapped form, if thus sold, there will be put on display in another section copies only of marks used. The chamber of commerce is providing a local advisory committee for arbitration, if duplication is found. Certificates of merit will be awarded.

The local share market continues very depressed and the turnover for the past week shows a still further decline in business. "Rubbers" did not maintain the interest shown in them at the end of last week and the price of rubber has again declined a point or two in London and Singapore. Langkat, Shanghai Loan & Shanghai Exploration, separately or combined, have been a dull market with sellers holding in the hope of better prices before the June Settlement. "Cottons" continue flat with a few buyers quoting bargain prices for "Ewos" and "Shanghai Cottons." Demand for local investment stocks and shares has declined somewhat due no doubt to the recent upward movement in the rate of exchange on London. It is reported by cable from London to-day that the Shanghai Electric Construction Co. new issue of shares will be offered to shareholders at £2 per share.

COMPANY MEETINGS

YANGTSZE INSURANCE ASSOCIATION, LD.

Japan Earthquake: Risks Excluded from Land Policies: Satisfactory Year

The annual general meeting of the Yangtsze Insurance Association, Ld., was held at the Association's offices on the Bund on Tuesday afternoon. Mr. John Prentice (Chairman) presided, supported by Mr. B. A. Clarke, Mr. A. W. Burkill and Mr. C. J. Scott (directors). There were 46,037 shares represented.

The notice convening the meeting and auditors' report having been read, the Chairman said: Our working account for 1922 and former years shows a balance at credit of $2,213,327.14. Second year payments on account of 1922 were heavy, but payments on account of former years were lighter than usual. We propose to carry the balance of the account forward.

As regards the working account for 1923, net premia amount to $4,399,964.43, a decrease of about $68,000 from the figures of the previous year. Interest, dividends and rents at $504,684.56 are less by $24,000. Claims paid amount to $1,919,655.26 as compared with $2,320,069.26 last year. Agency commissions show a decrease of $50,000 and charges an increase of $24,000.

Dividend of 22½ Per Cent.

Your directors recommend that a dividend of 22½ per cent. be paid out of the balance of this account and, if you adopt this proposal, there will be a balance of $2,375,638.15 to carry forward. In view of the unfavourable Underwriting position this proposed increase in our dividend calls for an explanation. For several years past the interest, etc., earned by the association's funds has been considerably more than the dividend paid to shareholders. The principal reason for this conservation of our resources was to assist us to provide for depreciation of certain mortgages to which I referred at last year's annual meeting. Adequate provision has now been made and your directors feel that shareholders are entitled to a larger share in our interest earnings.

Turning to the balance sheet you will notice that investment and exchange fluctuation account stands at $482,613.31 as compared with $900,000 a year ago. The decrease is accounted for principally by the decreased value in silver of our gold investments by reason of the rise in exchange from 3s. 6d. at December 31, 1922, to 3s. 3½d. at December 31, 1923, and partly to writing down our Yokohama property to Tls. 1 in our books after the destruction of our building in the earthquake of September 1, 1923.

On the assets side of the balance sheet loans and mortgages at $1,280,266.39 are less by $1,177,000 and cash at bankers on fixed deposit and current account stands at $1,583,401.78, as compared with $897,839.59 a year ago. Municipal and other debentures stand at $519,504.79 as against $187,530.15 last year. Sunday debtors show a satisfactory decrease from $539,699.02 to $292,251.76.

Investments are shown at their market values as at December 31 and our gold investments and funds have been converted into silver at the rates of exchange current on December 31, 1923. Our Gold Investments are set out in detail. A list of our silver investments is on the table for the inspection of any shareholder desirous of seeing it.

The terrible disaster which overtook the cities of Tokio and Yokohama and the surrounding districts on September 1, 1923, is fresh in the minds of all of us. All nations sympathize with the people of Japan in their great calamity and admire the courage and energy with which they are facing the problems of rehabilitation.

Yokohama: No Serious Losses.

It will doubtless be of interest to shareholders to know how our business was affected by the disaster. No losses were sustained under our policies of fire insurance as the risks of earthquake and its consequences were expressly excluded. No such exclusion, however, was stipulated for in our marine policies. Large quantities of cargo in course of shipment or discharge and at risk under marine policies were destroyed or damaged during or subsequent to the earthquake. Our losses in this direction though considerable are not of such magnitude as to cause us any anxiety. Our branch manager and his family were absent from Yokohama at the time of the disaster. Our acting manager and his wife escaped unhurt. Our entire local staff, however, of eight Japanese were killed in the fall of our office building. The sympathy of the shareholders and your directors has already been expressed in tangible form to those in our employ or their dependents for the losses sustained and I feel sure that our action has your unqualified approval. We have not re-opened our Yokohama branch and we have not yet made any definite plans in this respect.

Definite Plans in this Respect.

As regards business generally the long looked for trade revival is not yet in sight and insurance business suffers accordingly from the reduced premiums offering and the increased competition for these premiums. The cycle of lean years cannot, however, be continuous and we must look forward to better times.

The services of the staff have not been overlooked by your directors who have voted to them a bonus not exceeding 15 per cent. of their salaries in 1923, to be paid partly in cash and partly to the credit of their provident fund. We are confident that this vote has your approval.

There were no questions.

The following resolutions were passed: That the report and accounts for the year ended December 31, 1923, be accepted—Proposed by the chairman, seconded by Mr. Brodie A. Clarke.

That a dividend at the rate of 22½ per cent. (equal to $2.25 per share) on the paid up capital of the association be declared payable in tael at exchange 73 on and after May 28, 1924, at the Chartered Bank of India, Australia & China or the Hongkong & Shanghai Banking Corporation to shareholders on record on May 17, 1924.—Proposed by the Chairman, seconded by Mr. A. W. Burkill.

That Messrs. Brodie A. Clarke and C. J. Scott be re-elected directors.—Proposed by Mr. B. Firth, seconded by Mr. H. J. Clark.

That Messrs. Thomson & Company be re-elected auditors to serve until the next ordinary general meeting of shareholders and that their remuneration be Tls. 1,000 per annum.—Proposed by Mr. Thomas Cock, seconded by Mr. D. M. Gubbay.

Extraordinary General Meeting.

The Chairman—You have all doubtless studied the circular letter dated March 31, 1924, issued to the shareholders, in which you were advised of the directors' reasons for advocating an addition to the memorandum of the association so as to permit the association to act as a trustee, executor, administrator and agent, and otherwise in a fiduciary capacity. I do not think that there is anything which I can usefully add to the information contained in the circular. I may mention however that our proposals have been well received and we have reason to think that, if the resolution is approved by shareholders and the sanction of H. M. Supreme Court at Shanghai is later obtained for the proposed alteration of our memorandum, the facilities offered by us will be duly utilized.

Clause 2 of our existing memorandum provides that the registered office of the association shall be situated in Victoria in the Colony of Hongkong. The association, however, being a "China Company" within the meaning of the Companies' Ordinance of 1915, is required to have its registered office within the limits of the China (Companies) Order in Council 1915. This opportunity, therefore, has been taken to obtain the alteration of clause 2 of the memorandum so as to make it conform to the present law.

The re-lettering of sub-paragraphs (H) to (S) inclusive of the present memorandum is necessitated by the insertion of the new sub-paragraph (H).

With these explanations, gentlemen, I now propose and Mr. Brodie A. Clarke seconds: That the company's memorandum of association be altered by substituting for the present clause 2 thereof a new clause to read as follows:—2.—The registered office of the association shall be situate at Shanghai in China.

And by adding to clause 3 thereof immediately after sub-paragraph (G) of the said clause a new sub-paragraph to be lettered (H) and to read as follows, that is to say:—

(H)—To undertake and execute any trusts the undertaking whereof may seem desirable and also to undertake the office of and act as trustee, executor, administration, guardian committee, agent, custodian, receiver, treasurer, registrar or auditor and to keep for any company, government, authority or body any register relating to any stocks, funds, shares or securities or to undertake any duties in relation to the registration of transfers, issue of certificates or otherwise and generally to transact all kinds of fiduciary business and either with or without remuneration and by re-lettering the present sub-paragraphs (H) to (S) inclusive of the said clause (I) (J) (K) (L) (M) (N) (O) (P) (Q) (R) (S) and (T) respectively."

Resolution Carried Unanimously

The Chairman:—It will now be submitted for confirmation as a special resolution to a further extraordinary general meeting to be held on June 10.

Mr. H. J. Clark proposed a vote of thanks to the Chairman and Directors for the success of their efforts during the year, and wished them equal success in the coming year.

Mr. D. M. Gubbay seconded and the resolution was carried with acclamation.

This concluded the business of the meeting.

FAR EASTERN INSURANCE CO., LD.

Trade Depression Reflected in Insurance Business: Fewer Claims Paid

The 8th ordinary general meeting of shareholders in the Far Eastern Insurance Co., Ld., was held at 26 The Bund on Tuesday. Mr. E. T. Byrne presided, supported by Mr. J. Harold Dollar, Mr. H. M. Tibbey and Mr. P. H. Nye (directors). The attendance represented 34,844 shares.

The notice convening the meeting and the auditors' report were read.

Proposing the adoption of the report and accounts, the Chairman said:—The working account for 1922 and former years shows a balance at credit of Tls. 169,844.59 and your directors recommend that this balance be carried forward.

In the working accounts for 1923 net premia are shown as Tls. 1,289,820.82, a decrease of about Tls. 60,000 as compared with the previous year. Rents and interest account at Tls. 79,958.38 shows an advance of Tls. 16,000 over last year's figures. Claims paid amount to Tls. 588,072.82 as against Tls. 725,872.34 last year. Commission at Tls. 190,949.09 are less by Tls. 21,000, and charges show a trifling increase.

The balance at credit of this account is Tls. 731,344.25. Although the underwriting position does not warrant any increase in the dividend your directors feel that shareholders are entitled to a fuller participation in the interest earnings of the company. They therefore recommend the distribution of a dividend of 7 per cent. (Tls. 1.40 per share) as compared with 6 per cnet. last year. If this recommendation is approved there will be a balance of Tls. 680,944.25 to carry forward.

Turning to the balance sheet, sundry creditors show a reduction from Tls. 219,745.88 to Tls. 34,039. Our holding in British Government National War Bonds stand at Tls. 223,152.45 as compared with Tls. 137,530. The increase is due to our purchase of a further £15,300 of this stock during the year. You will also notice a new investment of Tls. 33,086.79 in Chinese Government Reorganization Gold Loan (French Issue). This represents a holding of £8,000 face value.

Trade generally remains stagnant and the business of insurance is no exception to the general order of things. We must look forward for better days to come.

I now propose and Mr. Harold Dollar seconds the resolution: That the report of the directors and statement of accounts for the 12 months ended December 31, 1923, as presented, be accepted and passed.

I now propose and Mr. H. M. Tibbey seconds: That a Dividend at the rate of 7 per cent., being one tael and 40 cents per share, on the paid up capital of the company, he declared payable on and after May 28, 1924, at the Hongkong & Shanghai Banking Corporation or the Russo-Asiatic Bank, Shanghai, to shareholders of record on May 17, 1924.

It is proposed by Mr. J. Prentice and seconded Mr. G. E. Griffin: That Messrs. E. T. Byrne, V. Meyer, H. E. Arnhold, J. Harold Dollar, H. M. Tibbey, P. H. Nye and C. Bleuler be re-elected directors to serve until the next ordinary general meeting of shareholders.

It is proposed by Mr. J. Prentice and seconded by Mr. S. A. Sleap: That Messrs. Thomson & Co., be re-elected auditors to serve until the next ordinary general meeting of shareholders and that their remuneration be Tls. 300 per annum.

The resolutions were carried.

LAW REPORTS

DRAMATIC TRIAL AT WEIHAIWEI

Foreign Woman Charged with Murder of Chinese Husband: Found Not Guilty

In H. M. High Court at Weihaiwei last week, Mr. H. P. Wilkinson, Judge of the Court, and a jury of which Mr. H. L. Beer was foreman, were occupied for two days in hearing a charge of murder against a Russian woman named Eugene Feodorova, alleged to have murdered her Chinese husband, Kao Shih-hsin, by stabbing him. The tragedy took place at the village of Sungchiat'an on April 17.

Mr. A. G. Mossop conducted the prosecution, and Mr. J. G. Priestwood defended the accused.

According to the story of the prosecution, in April of last year deceased returned to his native village after 20 years absence in Manchuria and brought the Russian woman to live with him. They were very unhappy together, and neighbours spoke of quarrels frequently occurring. Deceased spent the afternoon of April 17 at a theatre in a neighbouring village, returning at dusk with Sung Wen-hsin, a neighbour. The latter had been in his house half an hour when he heard sounds of violent quarrelling and, accordingly, with another man also named Sung, he looked in to see what was going on. They saw husband and wife struggling, and separated them. They then saw the deceased strike the woman with his fist and afterwards kick her twice. They remonstrated with him, and he retired to another room, but returned and the quarrel was resumed and again he kicked the woman. Finding they were unable to restore peace, the two Sungs left, but they got only as far as an outer room when they heard a heavy fall and then a groan and, rushing back into the room and taking a lamp down from the wall, saw the deceased lying on the floor, fatally wounded. One of the Sungs ran off in fright, while the other shouted at the top his voice and summoned the villagers. Neighbours arrived in force, and their first act was to secure the accused woman, which they did by tying her up to a tree. The village headman next appeared on the scene and, searching for a weapon, found a dagger on the floor near the body of the deceased. A messenger was sent to the nearest police station, four miles distant, and at mid-night returned with the constable. The woman was then released from the tree, and then handcuffed, and just as day was breaking she was put into a cart and began the long journey of 17 miles to Port Edward, the deceased's body being taken with her in another cart.

Dr. M. C. Cooper gave evidence that death was due to a knife wound which had reached the heart, and he expressed the opinion that the wound might have been self-inflicted.

Accused's Bodily Injuries.

Surgeon-Commande McCloy, who examined the unfortunate woman at the Island prison, said that she had a black eye and abrasions on the face, and that her limbs were covered with severe bruises of recent origin, while she had handcuff marks on both wrists.

The accused woman, a fragile little person of 32 years but looking much older, told an unhappy story of her life with the deceased, a heavily built, muscular man of 6ft. She said that she had known him for four years, and by the name of "Nicolai," being unacquainted with his Chinese name, and that until their arrival in Weihaiwei he had treated her well. There, however, she had to work in the fields, while he did little work, and she never at any time had possession of more than 50 cents. They lived in a house belonging to deceased's brother. Here also lived his sister-in-law, and it was on account of this woman that quarrelling began. Deceased assaulted witness nearly every day. About China New Year the sister-in-law attempted to commit suicide, fearing disclosures that might be made on the return of her husband. Deceased continued to ill-treat her, tying her hands together and beating her, and he said he would beat her to death if she said a word about his relations with the sister-in-law. He added that he would kill her and then himself. He always carried a knife in a cloth round his waist. Witness had a little son, and on one occasion the sister in law said to him: "You will both die, you and your mother." Witness wrote to deceased's two brothers complaining of his conduct with the other woman and, when the husband announced he was about to return, both deceased and the woman said it would be bad for them if he came back, and that if anything happened they would die together. "If I do not kill you I will kill myself," said 'Nicolai'."

Speaking of the night of the tragedy, witness said it was dark when "Nicolai" returned home and she unbarred the door for him and set his dinner. He was angry and began to beat her, and she ran out into the road. There she met the two Sungs and they returned together into the house, "Nicolai" kicking her, so that she sat down and cried. She became terror-stricken and did not know what happened afterwards, except that she noticed deceased standing with his back to her and his hands fiddling with his belt. Becoming unconscious, she did not see a knife and did not know who stabbed the deceased, only regaining consciousness when nearing Port Edward in the Chinese cart.

The Judge Sums Up.

In his summing up, Judge Wilkinson said the real question before the jury was whether the deceased had killed himself or whether the accused killed him. The medical evidence was that it was possible the wound was self-inflicted. His Honour pointed out that the Sungs had not seen the deceased fall, nor did they see the accused with a knife in her hand. The jury would have to decide whether it was likely the deceased killed himself. There was evidence that he had lost "face," and that complaints about his conduct had been made to his elder brother in Manchuria; also that that brother had sent him a serious warning to mend his ways, and had intimated that he might return to Weihaiwei." In view of the serious assaults committed on the accused by deceased just before he fell, and in view of the fact that there was no evidence at all of premeditation, he must direct the jury that they need not consider the question of murder. The question for them was: who held the knife at the time deceased was struck? If they found that the woman held it, they would return a verdict of manslaughter. If the deceased, they would find the woman not guilty.

Not Guilty.

The jury retired for some time, and returned to ask whether they could return a verdict of "not proven," the Judge instructing them that such a verdict could not be received. He pointed out that in case of disagreement, juries on a criminal trial in Weihaiwei, where the issue was other than one involving the death penalty, were entitled to return a majority verdict.

The jury again retired, and later gave a unanimous verdict of not guilty, in respect both to the charge of murder and that of manslaughter, and the accused was discharged.

Subscription for Prisoner.

In view of the unhappy plight in which Mrs. Feodorova found herself at the conclusion of the trial, being in a destitute state, a collection was organized on her behalf and sufficient funds were gathered to enable her to proceed to Shanghai.

Mr. C. Mansel Reece was summoned at H. M. Police Court last Friday for failing to obey a police signal in Bubbling Well Road. He sent an apology for his absence and an admission of a technical offence due to a misunderstanding, and Mr. Peter Grain imposed a fine of $2.

For discharging oil into the Huangpu from his ship, Capt. A. Ahlin, of the Dollar str. President Harrison, has been fined G.$10 and warned against future infringements of the law. Defendant was before Mr. N. E. Lurton at U. S. Commissioner's Court on May 22. Mr. H. D. Rodger, acting District Attorney, prosecuted and Major C. P. Holcomb defended.

THE TLS. 50,000 CLAIM AGAINST DRUG CO.

Druggists' Dual Liability Plea: Judgment Next Week

Further medical evidence was heard by Judge Purdy at the U.S. Court last Friday in the claim for Tls. 50,000 damages brought by Magdalena Guignard against the American Drug Co. Plaintiff alleges that by the use of an ointment supplied by defendants who negligently substituted it for another ordered, she has sustained internal injuries.

Dr. F. Reiss stated that he was called in consultation with Drs. Marsh, Petit, and Marcovici during December, 1923, to examine the plaintiff. Witness found nothing wrong with her except a little palpitation, her organs were absolutely normal, she had no internal growths and she showed no marked nervousness. He did not consider the ointment likely to cause the growths alleged nor did he think it a strong and dangerous compound.

Dr. J. Marcovici said he found no injuries and no scars, and the heart was normal. His opinion was that one application of the ointment would not have caused serious injury and that many preparations contained a larger proportion of salicylic acid than did this.

Dr. S. A. Ransom, who said he spoke from no personal knowledge of the case, but from his own general experience, gave it as his opinion that there was only a "remote possibility" that the ointment would have caused the injuries described. Such a condition might have existed previous to the use of the ointment, as indicated by plaintiff's feeling an itching for which she used the ointment.

Dr. Thomas Dunn stated that in his opinion the ointment used as described would have caused a burning sensation lasting for a half or three-quarters of an hour. It would hardly have produced growths, or extreme nervousness, though it might cause acute dermatitis.

No Plea of Contributory Negligence

Mr. R. T. Bryan, in his final speech for plaintiff, said that the defendants were bound to exercise extra care if they were engaged in that trade, that they had failed to use safeguards, and that no defence of contributory negligence could be set up, as it had not been set forth in the answer. The only question before the court was the amount of damages, which should be sufficient to compensate for the suffering, nervous shock and impaired health of plaintiff.

Mr. W. W. Worthington, for defendants, submitted that the evidence of Mr. Guignard was contradicted by that of Mr. Miller, an employee of the American Drug Co., that the defendants were not guilty of negligence, inasmuch as the compound delivered by them was not dangerous. Therefore plaintiff had no cause of action against defendants. With respect to damages, medical evidence had shown that the injury was slight and easily cured and that a simple operation would remove the growths which, it was claimed, were a result of the use of the ointment; moreover that it had not been proved that this condition was a result of the use of the ointment.

The matter of the druggist's "dual liability" was the pivotal point in the defence, counsel continued. A druggist was only bound to use extra precautions when dealing with drugs which were actually dangerous to human life.

The Judge here interposed that if a druggist sent a wrong prescription that would, in his opinion, constitute negligence, if the prescription did no harm, or even did good, there could be no claim for damages, nevertheless the negligence would exist. He had never heard the doctrine of dual liability advanced before.

Judge's Summing-up.

The Judge, in his summing-up, said Dr. Reiss prescribed for the plaintiff a harmless compound. She used it until it was used up and then [illegible] some more, asking defendant if they could give him the ointment. They said yes, but sent a stronger ointment which he supposed was the same and his wife supposed was the same. "Is that actionable negligence," asked the Judge. "Whose fault was it?" Defendants tried to fill the prescription and made a mistake." The Judge added that he had expected to give judgment in this case, but since the legal point of dual liability had been raised, and various cases cited he would reserve judgment.

POSER FOR ARCHITECT

Judge Purdy Asks What Is a Cadastral Lot: Council Chairman also at Sea

What is a cadastral plan? Judge Purdy asked the question on Tuesday at the U. S. Court and no one present was able to give a correct answer—not even the Chairman of the Municipal Council, who was engaged in the case, nor an architect who was in the witness box.

The matter was one in which Messrs. Dowdall, Read & Tulasne brought an action against the Shanghai Building Co. Inc., and the Shanghai Building Co. (Federal), Inc. in respect of the construction of the new Carlton Café. Plaintiffs' case was that in December, 1921, the first-named defendant company employed them to make sketch plans for the Carlton, and these were accepted in February of the following year, while in March an agreement was entered into whereby plaintiffs were to receive Tls. 14,000 commission instead of the usual 5 per cent. on the cost of construction. Plans were duly completed and calculations made as required, and they were submitted to the Municipal Council and approved. The whole arrangement was adopted and agreed to by the second-named company, but only Tls. 9,416.61 of the amount due under the agreement had been paid, and plaintiffs therefore claimed the balance of Tls. 4,583.33, together with Tls. 2,000 for extra work done. Defendants counter-claimed for Tls. 6,769, costs incurred through alleged defects in plaintiffs' plans.

Mr. S. A. Moss appeared for plaintiffs and Mr. S. Fessenden for defendants.

The morning was occupied in hearing the evidence of Mr. Read in support of plaintiffs claim. He stated that the plans were prepared, approved, and handed over to the contractor to proceed with the work. Part of the additional work consisted in redrafting the plans for the theatre, upon defendants discovering that there were 3ft. of additional land available.

A Tls. 7,000 to Tls. 2,000 Bet.

In answer to Mr. Fessenden, witness denied that excessive time was occupied in preparing the plans There was no delay for which plaintiffs were responsible. The building was, in fact, put up with extraordinary speed, and they claimed it as a record. Some people were astounded that the building, dining room, dance hall, and theatre, was got ready for use by the Christmas holiday, and there were actually bets made—one of Tls. 7,000 against Tls. 2,000—that the work could not possibly by done before the new year.

Mr. Fessenden questioned witness at length with regard to plans for the roof of the theatre and dance hall which showed a certain amount of wood construction, and asked if they were not against the Municipal Regulations.

Mr. Moss—We submitted a complete set of plans to the council, and they were approved.

Mr. Fessenden—Yes, and you gave us a different set of plans to build by, as a result of which the council refused to pass a lot of the work and we had to re-build in accordance with the plans which you submitted to them.

Mr. Moss—If they went ahead and built on plans which had not been approved, that is not our fault, providing we fulfilled the terms of the agreement.

Mr Fessenden, comparing plans submitted to the Council and to the plaintiffs, pointed out differences in detail, particularly as to the use of wood in roof construction, and he asked if witness knew defendants had been compelled by the Council to rebuild in accordance with their requirement?

Mr. Read answered that he had heard of that, but the builders never informed him. He agreed with counsel that the plans for "extra work" were drawn up prior to the complete plans being passed as final by the Council. There was a good deal of extra work done, but he did not recall having actually said to plaintiffs, "This is extra work."

Mr. Fessenden—The contract states that you must supply detailed plans approved by the Council, and therefore that is all part of the work under the agreement.

Mr. A. A. Toone, assistant surveyor in the Public Work Department, stated that a complete set of plans was submitted to the Department by plaintiffs, and they were satisfactory and were approveed.

In answer to Mr. Fessenden, witness said that the plans did not show any wood construction. Theatre roofs should be fire resisting, but the use of wood might be allowed if protected by a reinforced concrete ceiling. The Carlton was inspected several times during building operations, and these were stopped on three occasions: first, because of defective steel; second, because of defective pouring of concrete down the dining room columns, and for alterations to the exit levels.

"Work Delayed for Six Weeks."

For the defence, Mr. Edward Bell, defendants' secretary and manager, stated that they were not claiming on account of delay in the work, but for loss sustained through mistakes in the plans. Plaintiffs gave them plans which provided for wooden construction in some parts of the building instead of reinforced concrete, and these were given as detailed working plans. Witness understood the plans had been passed by the Council. He supposed the architects had to pass the plans through the Council and then hand them over to the builder to go on with the work. They did go on with the work, but the Council's inspectors came and told them the regulations did not permit the use of wood of any kind in a theatre roof. Further, they produced plans which bore the Council's stamp, and these showed no wood at all. Mr. Bidgood told witness that if plans containing wood construction had been submitted they would never have passed. The result was they had to stop the work, take down part of the structure, and replace it with steel roofing, this involving six weeks' delay and considerable expenditure in material and labour. The fire escapes, also, did not comply with the Council's regulations, the landings not being wide enough, and two had to be taken down and replaced by a single one. The main staircase to the theatre was also objected to, by the lessees, it being said that it was more like the back stairs of an ordinary residence.

The hearing was adjourned.

CONFESSED AFTER BEING BEATEN

Armed Robber's Unfounded Accusation against the S. M. Police

A Chinese who pleaded guilty at the Mixed Court on Monday to three out of four charges of armed robbery, complained that he had been severely beaten by the police before he consented to sign a confession of his guilt. The statement was put in as evidence.

Prisoner rolled up his sleeves in front of Mr. Whitamore and Magistrate Li, exhibiting black and blue bruises on the forearm. He asserted that they had been inflicted by detectives at west Hongkew police-station.

Addressing the Bench, Insp. Mackenzie denied that the injuries had been inflicted at the police-station. Witness had been present in the inquiry room while prisoner was under examination. On two other occasions the officer said he was in charge of the Chinese detectives with accused. A foreign sergeant had made an examination of the man's body. Witness therefore was quite certain that the injuries were not inflicted at the station.

Turning to the dock the Inspector ordered accused to say where he really got the beating. After some hesitation and faltering the latter replied that he received them while in custody of the City Police, who had held him temporarily.

The Assessor declared with some heat that he was tired of such assertions by men accused of armed robbery, for upon investigation it was found that this sort of thing was mere fabrication. The Magistrate concurred in the exoneration of the Settlement police.

Accused, Loh Pau-Laung, was stated to be the perpetrator of a number of armed robberies.

In sending accused to the Arsenal with a recommendation that he be shot, the Bench first ordered that he be handed over to the Ching Ch'a T'ing (City Court) where he is also wanted on a similar charge.

"CHINA PRESS" AND "EVENING NEWS"

Defendants' Motion for Bill of Particulars in the Mixed Court

Motion was made by the defence in the case of the "China Press" v. the "Evening News" at the Mixed Court on Tuesday morning for a bill of particulars. The former publication brought action several weeks ago for $14,607, alleging that sum due for printing bills from November, 1922, until September, 1923. Mr. W. J. Schoenfeld presented the motion and Mr. H. R. Snyder opposed.

It was asked that the Court direct plaintiff to set forth the agreement or arrangement, if any existed, under which they were engaged to do the printing, as it had been alleged in paragraph 4 of their petition. It was also asked, if such an agreement existed, whether it was in writing, that a copy be produced. The defence required them to make a proper and adequate presentation of their case to the Court.

Mr. Snyder stated to the Court that defendant admitted in their answer that they had knowledge of the agreement, but he was willing to give any and all information he could to Mr. Schoenfeld.

The latter then stated that if they under Court order admitted the answer as correct he would be satisfied, to which Mr. Snyder retorted that if it was not correct he would soon point out its defects.

Judgment was reserved.

LAWYER CRITIC OF THE GAOL

Mr. Goldring's Alleged "Wild" Statements on Treatment of Oscar Mathias

Mr. E. T. Maitland, Police Prosecutor, moved the Mixed Court on Wednesday to direct Mr. P. W. Goldring, solicitor for Oscar Mathias, who has been detained in connexion with civil proceedings, to retract a statement he made to the Court recently regarding defendant's alleged ill-treatment while in custody.

Mr. Maitland informed Mr. Martin and Magistrate Kuan that Mr. Goldring had stated in open court that his client had been confined under conditions that were little short of torture. Goldring had said that the prisoner's room was small, that he had no books, that his food was bad and he had no exercise whatever. He had further said that the man might go out of his mind shortly if he were detained any longer in such quarters.

The police prosecutor went on to say that he had visited the cells. While not large, they were certainly not small. Mathias had a comfortable bed, magazines, and could have any newspapers he wanted. "I can only describe Mr. Goldring's statements as wild, irresponsible and untrue, and tending to bring the Model Settlement into disrepute," Mr. Maitland added. "I make an application that a time be set when you and Magistrate Yui can go to the Municipal Gaol with a view to making Mr. Goldring retract his statements made in open court."

Not Kept with Convicts.

An official stated that Mathias was not lodged with the convicts, but in a special place set aside for civil prisoners.

In answer to a question by the Assessor, Chief Insp. Wheeler said civil prisoners were kept in the House of Detention as a rule, though a number of foreigners had previously been detained at the various police stations. Now, however, part of the Gaol was reserved for them. This was the first complaint he had ever received.

The Assessor undertook to visit the cell in question, accompanied by the Magistrate, and the matter was accordingly adjourned.

It is reported that the Great Asiatic Association, which has been in existence in Shanghai for two years and has strong Indian, Filipino and Chinese support, is about to establish a college for Asiatics in Shanghai, and that the institution will specialize in art and commerce.

TWO CWT. OF CAFFEIN SEIZED IN RAID

Also Large Quantities of Cocaine and Morphine: Five Arrests

A police raid which resulted in the seizure of eight [illegible] of caffein, a large number of [illegible] each containing 25 oz. of cocaine, a quantity of morphine and strychnine, besides several pounds of opium, was described at the Mixed Court on Wednesday. Five Chinese were charged under the Presidential Narcotic Measure of 1920 with being in possession of drugs. Mr. A. Covey defended.

Following evidence of arrest, a week's remand was granted.

It is understood that the raid, which was in charge of Assistant Commissioner of Police, Mr. Springfield, is regarded as one of the most important yet made by the police in their efforts to suppress the drug traffic. In addition to the narcotics found on the premises, a shop in North Soochow Road, the police seized over 50 containers for putting up various drugs. Some idea of the magnitude of the trafficking, which, the police allege, was being carried on, may be had from the fact that the caffein, which was found in 28 lb.-tins, is sold wholesale at $200 per litre.

SERIOUS CHARGE AGAINST CHEFOO MERCHANT

A Chinese merchant, of Chefoo, charged with having fraudulently received G. $9,750 came before the Mixed Court on Monday morning. Mr. W. J. Schoenfeld prosecuted on behalf of a New York firm, Messrs. Finkelstein & Co., while Dr. Mei defended.

It was alleged that defendant received the money for a cargo of hair nets to be shipped from Chefoo to New York in 1922, but that the cargo had been never received. A warrant was issued in September 1923, but the arrest was not made until Saturday, when accused was taken into custody at 68 Route Baron Gros by Det.—Sgt. Tinkler, who accompanied the French Police to the premises.

Dr. Mei submitted that there was no jurisdiction but it was decided to remand accused for a special hearing, at which time this question would be gone into. Accused was admitted to bail in $3.000.

THE inquest concerning the death of Leading Stoker James A. Treagus, who was drowned in the Huangpu while returning to H.M.S. Despatch from shore leave on the night of the 12th instant, was concluded by Mr. Peter Grain last Friday. Deceased was one of several men who were thrown into the water when a sampan capsized, and unfortunately he was never seen again. Dr. Burton certified that there were no traces of violence on the body, which was recovered from the river on the morning of the 18th, and that death was due to drowning, and a verdict of "accidentally drowned" was accordingly returned.

Through the Looking Glass-

"WHAT does it matter where my body happens to be?" said the Knight as Alice dragged him out by the feet, my mind goes on working just the same. In fact the more head-downwards I am the more I keep on inventing things."

"Now the cleverest thing I ever did," he went on, "was to originate the idea of smoking a "Three Castles" between the soup and the fish."

"That was a good thing to invent, certainly," said Alice. "What else did you invent?"

"Smoking 'em between the fish and the entree" chuckled the Knight, "and then smoking 'em again between the entree and the pudding." "In fact," he went on, "I invent an excuse for smoking a "Three Castles" whenever I can."

EMPIRE DAY OBSERVANCE IN LONDON

Mr. Ramsay MacDonald on the Elizabethan Spirit Still High in Britain's Sons: A Still Small Voice from Australia on Deeds and Not Words

London, May 24.

The Empire Day celebrations in London were held on an unparalleled scale. Eight thousand members of juvenile organizations took part in them at the Stadium at Wembley. The Pageant of Youth, organized by the League of the Empire, marched past the Duke of Connaught in the Royal Box to music played alternately by massed pipe bands from Scottish regiments, 100 strong, and a drum and fife band of 300 strong. The processionists, assisted by a choir of 1,600 Boy Scouts, later sang "Hearts of Oak" and "Auld Lang Syne," accompanied by a massed band of 600 drawn from all units of the British Army.

Rain poured throughout the night and morning, but the sun shone at 3 o'clock this afternoon, when the proceedings began. Special trains brought spectators from all parts of the country. The Stadium was packed, children predominating.

The cheering was vociferous when the Duke of Connaught walked to the dais and megaphoned that he had sent a loyal telegram to the King, who had replied expressing thanks. The proceedings were broadcast by wireless. Messages from Empire statesmen were read at intervals in the evening. There was a special Commonwealth performance at the broadcasting station, including Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, who said, inter alia, that "the parent tree is still green. The sap of high endeavour still swells its branches. Our days of voyaging are not over. The world of mind and idea lies around us in vast unexplored tracts. The commonwealth of nations centring in this Motherland still hears the call to go out in the Elizabethan spirit of gallantry and doughtiness to search for liberty, justice and peace."

A United Empire for Ever

May 23.

"A united Empire" was the theme of the speeches at an Empire Day dinner to-night under the auspices of the Colonial Institute. The Duke of Connaught presided over a distinguished company of 400 guests, including the Duke of York, Sir Joseph Cook, the High Commissioner for Australia, Sir Hugh Clifford, Governor of Nigeria, Sir James Allen, High Commissioner for New Zealand, and Sir Gordon Guggisberg, Governor of the Gold Coast.

Mr. J. H. Thomas, the Secretary of State for the Colonies, proposing the principal toast, appealed for the dropping of miserable class warfare and class talk (cheers). "Let all," he added, "no matter of what class or creed, unite in making the Empire worthy of the sacrifices of those of all classes who defended the Empire during the war."

Sir Thomas Mackenzie, the former Prime Minister of New Zealand, replying, voiced a warning that the Government must change their procedure if oversea representatives were to continue to attend Imperial conferences, as the latter would be bitterly disappointed if they did not see that effect was given to the recommendations of the conferences. Referring to the Singapore scheme, he said that if ever Australasia fell away from the Empire, it would be through responsible people in Britain not providing proper protection.

The proceedings were very enthusiastic.

The King and Queen at Wembley

May 25.

Their Majesties the King and Queen attended an Empire Thanksgiving service at the stadium this afternoon when bands, comprising a thousand instruments, and a choir of two thousand which sang at the opening ceremony, reinforced by a Boy Scouts' choir, participated in the impressive ceremonies. The day procession, which was symbolical of the Builders of the Empire carrying Colonial flags and emblems, entered the Stadium first, followed by the Ecclesiastical procession, which including archbishops, Bishops, representatives of the religious bodies, and the choir. The Archbishop of Canterbury delivered an address, and a collection was taken on behalf of the British Empire Cancer Campaign.

Throughout the Country

Empire Day was celebrated throughout the country by the flying of flags and patriotic demonstrations, the most notable of the latter being at Belfast where, in spite of the bad weather, ten thousand school-children assembled in Ormeau Park and were presented with Commemoration medals and there was a parade of Boy Scouts and Girl Guides which was inspected by the Duke of Abercorn. —Reuter.

Thanksgiving Service Attended by the King and Queen and Cabinet Ministers

London, May 25.

The Empire Thanksgiving Service at Wembley was marred by unsettled weather, there being a cold, boisterous wind accompanied by showers, with occasional thunder. The sun shone brilliantly when Their Majesties actually arrived at the Stadium, but rain descended later. Nevertheless the attendance is estimated at nearly 100,000. Mr. J. R. Clynes (Lord Privy Seal), Mr. Arthur Henderson (Home Secretary), Mr. J. H. Thomas (Colonial Secretary), Mr. Noel Buxton (Minister of Agriculture), and Mr. F. W. Jowett (First Commissioner of Works) represented the Cabinet.

In spite of the cold and showery weather, the British Empire Exhibition again attracted throngs of visitors last week, culminating in an attendance of over 150,000 on Saturday alone. The week's visitors included various Royalties, overseas Governors, Foreign Ambassadors and other prominent people from various countries, thus aiding in the cosmopolitan note which is a feature of Wembley.

The King and Queen, who have already seen the Show several times, will pay another visit to it on Wednesday, accompanied by the King and Queen of Italy. The Royal party will visit the various buildings, after which there will be an official reception and a luncheon at the British Government Pavilion.

All parts of the Exhibition are attracting attention. The Hongkong market is in full swing, and the pavements of its miniature street are daily crowded with sightseers. The philosophic detachment of the Chinese shopkeepers heightens the illusion of the street, which is not merely a part of the Exhibition but part of Hongkong itself.

The beautiful Malaya Pavilion, with well-arranged rubber, basketwork and other exhibits, completes the picture of the East.—Reuter.

GREAT BRITAIN'S BUDGET

Further Economies Forecast to Finance a Scheme of Social Reform

London, May 27.

The Finance Bill was read for a second time, without a division, in the House of Commons to-day.

Mr. Philip Snowden, Chancellor of the Exchequer, replying to the debate, said he hoped that he would be able next year, by further economies, to finance the Government's social reform programme without, at any rate, a heavy increase in taxation. He believed that the present Budget provided a sound economic basis, on which next year the Government would be able to build an even more satisfactory structure. (Ministerial cheers).—Reuter.

THE ANGLO-ITALIAN ENTENTE

Visit of King and Queen of Italy to England: Hearty Reception in London

London, May 24.

In view of the forthcoming visit of the Italian sovereigns to England satisfaction is expressed in both countries at the official announcement of the decision to conclude an agreement with regard to the vexed question of Jubaland, whereby part of the Jubaland province in Kenya colony will be added to Italian Somaliland on the lines laid down by Viscount Milner at Scialoja in 1920. The details will be settled in London by British and Italian experts immediately.

Reuter's correspondment in Rome states that Italy is pleased with the agreement, because it re-establishes close Anglo-Italian friendship and constitutes a friendly compromise auguring well for a prompt agreement by the experts —Reuter.

London, May 26.

The King and Queen of Italy arrived in London to-day.

There were striking scenes at Victoria Station on the arrival of their Italian Majesties, whom the Prince of Piedmont and Princess Mafalda accompany. King George and Queen Mary, the latter wearing an exquisite ostrich feather cloak, were on the platform, accompanied by the Duke of York, Prince Henry, the Duke and Duchess of Connaught and other members of the Royal Family. The distinguished assembly included the Prime Minister, Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, and the Home Secretary, Mr. Arthur Henderson. The Prince of Wales accompanied the Royal visitors from Dover.

Huge crowds cheered as the Royal party came in view. The King of Italy and King George inspected the guard of honour of the Guards and also 50 blackshirted Fascisti from various parts of Britain, who gave the Roman salute. Crowds en route gave ovations to the party as they drove to Buckingham Palace.

It is King Victor Emmanuel's first visit to England for 21 years.

Later.

The King and Queen gave a brilliant State banquet to-night in honour of the King and Queen of Italy. One hundred and fifty guests were present, including the Prince of Wales, the Duke and Duchess of York, Mr. Ramsay MacDonald and Miss MacDonald, Mr. and Mrs. Lloyd George, and Mr. and Mrs. Baldwin. The King, toasting the guests, referred to the lasting and unbroken friendship between Britain and Italy. King Victor Emmanuel, replying, expressed the hope that the traditional ties would be strengthened.—Reuter.

Visit to the Cenotaph and Tomb of the Unknown Warrior

London, May 27.

Their Italian Majesties and the Crown Prince and Princess Mafalda this morning visited Westminster Abbey and the Cenotaph. King Victor Emanuel laid a wreath on the tomb of the Unknown Warrior and also placed a wreath at the base of the Cenotaph in the presence of representatives of the Navy, Army and Air Force. A large crowd cheered the Royal visitors as they drove back to the Palace.

Later.

The Italian Sovereigns, the Prince of Piedmont and Princess Mafalda received an enthusiastic welcome in the City to-day, when they were presented with a golden casket at a luncheon at the Guildhall, where the scene was brilliant. Twelve members of the British Royal Family, the Premier and members of the Cabinet, distinguished soldiers and sailors and other prominent personages, including the Maharajah of Kapurthala, were present. The banqueting hall was profusely decorated with pink roses and British and Italian flags.

Replying to the Lord Mayor's toast, King Victor Emanuel expressed his warm thanks, specially to the Prince of Wales for attending the ceremony. He declared that the Italians would warmly appreciate the Lord Mayor's tribute to Italian co-operation in the war. Italy desired to proceed, united to the noble British nation, along the paths of progress and civilization. —Reuter.

Italian Press Comment

Rome, May 27.

The visit of their Italian Majesties to England has been made the occasion for copious articles by the press.

The "Idea Nazionale" attributes credit to Signor Mussolini for solution of the Jubaland question which, it says, has been poisoning relations between Britain and Italy.

The Fascist organ, the "Impero," declares that the happy solution to the Jubaland problem will doubtless be the starting point for more complete understanding between Britain and Italy. The journal adds that Italy is anxious to reconquer an Empire and is looking with faith to Signor Mussolini, who began with Jubaland. Italians must persevere in Africa and Asia.

The "Tribuna" says that Italy greeted joyfully the advent of Labour into power in Britain because continuance of Marquess Curzon's foreign policy would have rendered an agreement with regard to Jubaland impossible, while the enlightened mind of Mr. Ramsay MacDonald has found a settlement. —Reuter.

THIS PICTURE AND THAT IN RUSSIA

M. Zinovieff's Optimistic Views on the Domestic and Foreign Situation: M. Kameneff's Satisfaction with the Progress of Proletariat

Moscow, May 25.

M. Zinovieff, addressing the Congress of the Russian Communist Party, said that he was justified in viewing the domestic and foreign situation of the Soviet optimistically. Recognition by a number of countries had undoubtedly consolidated the international position, but the problem of debts and claims was difficult. The Soviet earnestly desired to cultivate lasting ties with Britain. The chief aims of the Government were to regularize the home market and promote co-operation. There was no question of limiting the new economic policy or of abolishing private trade. Strengthening of co-operative societies was the only means of combatting private capital. Private capital now controlled 64 per cent. of home trade and the State 36 per cent. Russia during the present trade year had only exported 200,000,000 poods of grain, but in the coming year would export 400,000,000, as compared with 2,000,000,000 before the war.—Reuter.

Riga, May 25.

In a speech discussing the tasks of the Congress of the Russian Communist Party, M. Kameneff said that the party was in no danger from the activities of the intelligentsia and the spreading of their ideals. The party's proletarizing campaign was making such sweeping progress that it was unnecessary to institute any special clearing measures against the intelligentsia. Moreover, the non-Communist elements had already been removed.

The latest reports from Petrograd state that the Soviet authorities are not only depriving the intelligentsia of facilities for securing higher education by forbidding them to attend higher schools, but are expelling proletarian students who exhibit initial signs of a tendency towards non-Communist ideas, hoping thus to prevent anti-Communist intelligence from developing.

Alleged Economic Espionage

It is announced from Moscow that a mine-manager and engineer named Jacobson has been sentenced to death at Omsk on a charge of economic espionage. He had informed the former owners of the mine, residing in England, of the condition of their property.

Seventeen persons, including two women, have been sentenced to death at Jitomir.—Reuter.

Moscow, May 27.

M. Trotsky, in a subdued speech at the Communist Party Conference, affirmed his solidarity with the rest of the party. He said that he regarded himself as a private soldier, and discipline was necessary in the stand against their enemies. His former attitude was dictated by the bureaucracy's threat to enter the Communist party and separate it from the workers.

M. Uglanoff fiercely attacked M. Trotsky and said that he did not regard him as a private but as a commander. He declared that they looked to him for leadership and they could not have confidence in him if he only brought confusion in their ranks.

The Conference unanimously passed a resolution approving the policy of the Central Committee.—Reuter.

Bureaucracy's Threat to Communist Party

Riga, May 28.

A telegram from Moscow states that the only supporter of M. Trotsky's defence of the opposition at the Communist Congress was M. Preobrazhensky, who protested against the purging of the party, which, he said, should have come after the Congress. He said that the struggle with private capital, which had begun, was demanded by the opposition.—Reuter.

Kameneff on Russian Internal Commerce

Moscow, May 28.

M. Kameneff's report on internal commerce says that the crisis in 1923 has been succeeded by a period of development of commercial transactions. Thanks to the reform of the currency, the Government would no longer have recourse to inflation. The Government's main aim in internal commerce was consolidation of the co-operative societies, regulation of State markets and supply of articles cheaply to the peasants, thus combating the domination of the retail trade by private capital, the rights of which would remain unchanged.—Reuter.

THE ANGLO-SOVIET CONFERENCE

Wide Differences of Opinion as to Settlement of Pre-War Debts and Property Chaims: Britain Intending to Present Counter-Proposals: Russia's Plea of Crippled Finances

London, May 27.

A divergence of views with regard to the satisfaction of claims against Russia is revealed in the communiqué of to-day's proceedings of the Anglo-Soviet Conference. The British delegation declared that it was unable to accept the statement made by the Soviet delegates at the meeting on June 20 to the effect that Russia could not undertake to pay the pre-war debts in full, with back interest. The British delegates at the same time disclaimed any desire to be unreasonable and did not propose that the debts should be paid fully and immediately.

The Soviet delegates, emphasizing the crippled state of the finances of Russia, pointed out Russia's great efforts in the Great War and her subsequent trials, including famine, Respecting the money claims by private persons, the Soviet delegates suggested that both Governments should determine a lump sum for the settlement thereof, and that simultaneously Article 10 of the Trade Agreement of 1921 should be repealed and the property rights of the Soviet in Great Britain come into force.

Private Property Holders.

The Soviet delegates further proposed the postponement of the question of the claims arising from the nationalization of private property, in view of the belief that the negotiations proceeding with the former owners with regard to granting them concessions of the property would materialize satisfactorily.

The British delegates said that, although progress had been made towards a settlement of various questions, it could not be ignored that there were still rather wide differences of opinion on the subject of pre-war debts and property claims.

The British delegates would present counter-proposals to the Soviet for incorporation as articles in the proposed Treaty. It was insisted that the British Government was not adopting an uncompromising attitude, but was anxious to consider reasonable modifications. The present Government still entertained the goodwill to the Soviet Union, which was expressed on its assumption of power by the act of recognition of the Soviet.

The Soviet must remember that the British Government was not in a position to carry through extravagant measures. The British delegates believe that the Soviet Government would consult its own interests in endeavouring to meet the British view.

The Soviet representatives deprecated the pessimism with which it had been attempted to surround the Conference in some quarters, and insisted on Russia's inability to accept burdens which were incompatible with her resources.—Reuter.

Moscow, May 27.

M. Zinovieff, in a speech at the Communist Congress, declared that the payment of debts was an impossibility. Referring to the recent agitation within the party, he said that iron solidarity was a thousand times more urgently needed, while freedom of grouping was inadmissible.—Reuter.

Motion in the House of Lords to Conclude Negotiations as Soon as Possible

London, May 28.

The Earl of Mayo, moving for the immediate discontinuance of the Anglo-Soviet Conference in the House of Lords to-day, said that he considered that flirting with Bolshevism did not commend itself to the Empire.

Lord Parmoor, the Lord President of the Council, said that the Government hoped that the Conference would continue until an arrangement satisfactory to both countries was reached. He thought that there was no reason why this result should not be obtained, if outside partisans abstained from interference. The Government were endeavouring to speed up the negotiations, but there were a very large number of issues involved, several of which were of great importance. The Government regarded the attainment of agreement as most important to Europe.

Marquess Curzon declared that the Conference communiqués had been negative, ambiguous and obscure. He did not wish to be unfriendly and harsh, and therefore suggested a modification of the motion, expressing the opinion that the Conference should be brought to as early a conclusion as possible..

The House agreed to this modification.—Reuter.

RESIGNATION OF GERMAN CABINET

Due to Failure of Negotiations as to Coalition Between Nationalist and Middle Parties: Herr Marx Reconstructing the Ministry

Berlin, May 22.

Negotiations between the middle parties and the German National People's Party with regard to the formation of the Government have failed owing to the latter's insistence on their right to appoint the septuagenarian, Admiral von Tirpitz, the new Chancellor. The other parties refused to discuss a personal question of this nature until the policy of the future Government were settled, whereupon the negotiations broke down.—Reuter.

Berlin, May 26.

The Government has resigned.

Later.

President Ebert has accepted the resignation of the Government and has requested the Chancellor, Herr Marx, provisionally to carry on.

Later.

Obviously referring to the experts' report, the German Nationalists' reply to the Middle Parties admitted that a certain continuity of the policy of the resigning Government must be maintained, but "the Party cannot place German negotiators with tied hands in front of foreign countries." The Middle Parties responded by adhering to the policy of accepting the report as a whole, with reservations which the experts themselves made regarding the execution of the same.

May 27.

The resignation of the German Cabinet was due to the breakdown of the negotiations between the National and Middle parties for the formation of a coalition Government. The Nationalists to-day unexpectedly put forward Admiral von Tirpitz as their candidate for the Chancellorship, declaring that they would afterwards be prepared to discuss the prospective Government's home and foreign policy. Thereupon the leaders of the Middle parties promptly called upon President Ebert and tendered the resignation of the Government. There is reason to believe, however, that the resignation is only formal and it is expected that Herr Marx will reconstruct the Ministry with few changes and then submit its policy, especially with regard to the experts' report, to the new Reichstag, leaving the House to approve or reject it.

Extreme Nationalists' Programme

Later.

The Extreme Nationalists, who number 32 members in the new Reichstag, at a meeting last night formulated their programme, which demands, inter alia, the immediate election of a new President of the Republic, repeal of the law for the protection of the Republic, an amnesty for all who took part in the Munich and Kustrin revolts, the trial on a charge of treason of all who took part in the revolution of November 1918, the expulsion of all Jews who have entered the country since 1914 with partial confiscation of their property, and special legislation for the Jews.—Reuter.

An Uproar in the Reichstag

Berlin, May 27.

Entrance to the Reichstag was only possible by means of permits when the Reichstag re-assembled to-day, but this did not prevent tumultuous scenes within. The 50 Communist Deputies created pandemonium by clamouring for the release of their colleagues in gaol. When the uproar quieted down, a roll call was taken, but the din broke out again when General Von Ludendorff's name was reached. The General's supporters responded with cheers and shook their fists at their opponents. The General himself, who evidently expected the onslaught, merely leaned back in his seat and smiled at the Communists.

At the conclusion of the roll call the Communists submitted a motion demanding the release of the prisoners, in the course of which there was another outburst, coupled with the singing of the "Internationale," to which the other parties responded with "Deutschland Uber Alles." The noise was so great that the President of the Reichstag put on his hat and walked out.—Reuter.

SOVIETS' BREACH WITH GERMANY

Warsaw, May 22.

The Soviet Legation here has ordered the local Soviet Trade Delegation to refrain from purchasing German goods. It appears that a similar order, doubtless due to the recent incident in Berlin, has been given to all other Soviet trade delegations.—Reuter.

AMERICA'S EXCLUSION OF JAPANESE

New Immigration Bill Signed by President Coolidge for Political Reasons Despite His Disapproval of Failure of Congress to Postpone Effective Date

Washington, May 26.

President Coolidge has signed the new Immigration Bill.

Despite the provision in the Bill making the exclusion of Japanese effective as from July 1, which was inserted in spite of the President's vigorous opposition, he decided to give his executive approval because of certain other considerations of which the chief was that, as the present Immigration Law expires on June 30, his veto might have made it necessary to rush through an emergency measure during the closing hours of the session of Congress. Such a step, the President felt, would not be practicable in view of the tangled legislative situation and the certainty that any emergency provision would be met by many attempts at amendment and would possibly be blocked altogether. As soon as he signed the Bill, however, the President began to prepare a statement expressing his disapproval at the failure of Congress to provide a longer delay in the date for making Japanese exclusion effective.

Later.

President Coolidge has issued a statement in which he says that, in signing the Immigration Bill, he heartily approves of its main features, put regrets the impossibility of severing therefrom the exclusion provision affecting Japanese. The President gladly recognizes that the enactment provision does not imply any change in the American sentiment of admiration and cordial friendship for the Japanese people, which will continue to have abundant manifestation, and says that the Bill rather expresses the determination of Congress to exercise its prerogative of controlling immigration by legislation instead of leaving it to international arrangements.

The President points out that the Bill makes many exceptions. But he is of opinion that it would have been much better and more effective if they had continued to invite the co-operation which Japan was ready to give and thus have avoided ground for misapprehension by unnecessary statutory enactment. In conclusion, he says that, if the exclusion provision had stood alone, he would have disapproved of it unhesitatingly, but the Bill was comprehensive and therefore he was compelled to consider it in its entirety and the imperative need of general legislation.—Reuter's American Service.

Special Deliberation by Japanese Cabinet

Tokio, May 27.

The Cabinet will sit in extraordinary session to-morrow to discuss final action with regard to the Immigration Bill, which it is generally believed, will take the form of a formal protest against the Bill on the ground of violation of the America-Japan Treaty of Commerce and Navigation.

It is expected here that Mr. Hanihara, the Japanese Ambassador in Washington, will now ask permission to resign.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Formal Protest Lodged by Cabinet

Tokio, May 27.

In an interview with press representatives to-day, Baron Matsui, Minister of Foreign Affairs, with reference to the passage of the U. S. Immigration Bill, said, in part:—

That the new Immigration Bill of the United States is about to be put in force as from July 1 as a result of the President's signature is to be greatly regretted. The Imperial Government of Japan has decided to hold an extraordinary Cabinet meeting to-morrow, when some concrete counter-measures will be decided upon. It is the intention of the Japanese Government on the one hand to ask for the American Government's reflexion, and to point out the unreasonableness of such a law in view of the Japanese-American treaty of commerce and navigation, and on the other hand to study measures to be taken in connexion with the Gentlemen's Agreement. The Japanese Government will, as soon as some concrete counter-measures have been decided upon, give telegraphic instructions to Mr. Hanihara, Japanese Ambassador in Washington, requesting him to lodge a strong protest with the American Government. It is expected that the Japanese Ambassador will return home when all his other business has been settled.—"Eastern News Agency.

Tokio, May 28.

The Cabinet to-day decided to file a protest against the immigration legislation on the ground that it was in violation of the "Gentlemen's Agreement" as well as the America-Japanese Treaty.

It was further decided to allow Mr. Hanihara, Japanese Ambassador in Washington, to return home.

The President's signature to the Immigration Bill evoked again a storm of criticism not only against America but also against the Government's alleged diplomatic failure. Though signature was generally considered inevitable in view of America's domestic political situation, the news that it had been done was received with very deep disappointment.

The "Jiji" voices alarm as to possible grave consequences unless prudence and sincerity characterise the efforts of both nations for wise adjustment and counsels for Japan "patience and ceaseless appeal to the American conscience."

On the other hand, other papers declare that lodging protests is sheer waste of time. Thus the "Nichi Nichi," while appreciating President Coolidge's efforts for Japan, asserts that it is no use resorting to arguments and that it is time for Japan to do something and act with very firm resolution if she thinks she has any honour to protect.

The "Yamato," in a more bellicose vein, declares that the inevitable impression of Japan must be that America does not regard the feelings of others seeing that she could have reached the same ends without hurting anyone. The journal declares that Japan has never been faced with a more serious crisis in her history, justifying her protecting her prestige at all costs.

Later.

Japan's protest against the Immigration Law, mentioned earlier, has been sent to America.

The Japanese Government deeply regretted the enactment of the exclusion provision in the Immigration Law in spite of its frequent representations since the introduction of the Bill into the House last December and in spite of "vigorous repeated endeavours on the part of the President and Secretary of State Hughes to prevent inclusion of the discriminatory provision," says Baron Matsui, the Foreign Minister, in his official statement. "The Japanese Government remain unshaken in their opposition against the discriminatory legislation against Japanese and have instructed their Ambassador in Washington to lodge a solemn protest with the American Government in that connexion."

Representatives of the two Houses and the Diet to-day passed a resolution strongly protesting against the exclusion legislation and pledging their best effort for restoration of amity of the two nations by effecting withdrawal of the measure which, it is believed, would clearly represent the wishes of the general body of public opinion in America.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

EFFECT OF THE NEW ACT

* It would be unwise yet to comment on the effect of the passing of the Immigration Bill, for the best informed people out here cannot give a definite statement regarding its provisions. It has been considerably altered since first brought up, and, so far as can be ascertained, a draft as finally amended is not available here. It is proverbial that a coach and four can be driven through any Act and the President, according to one of the messages above, draws attention to the fact that many exceptions are made.

So far as can be ascertained the Act bars the immigration of all people not qualified to take out American naturalization papers, which means any coloured people except those native to the country. Thus, many other races are affected besides the Japanese, but it is understood that practically all others already are covered by other laws or agreements. The Japanese, therefore, will be the only ones particularly affected by this new Act. As no law of the United States is retro-active, Japanese already domiciled in the United States will not be required to leave, but no others will be admitted, unless, as presumably is the case, exceptions are made for privileged sections, such as students, authorized delegations, etc. The Act will come into force on July 1, at the end of the fiscal year.

The Gentlemen's Agreement, which has been so freely referred to in the debates over the new Act, was a mystery to the man in the street until quite lately, as its terms had been kept secret. It appears to have been a sort of compromise in the matter, Japan undertaking not to permit the immigration of large forces of labourers, not only into the United States, but also all the adjacent countries, such as the Philippines and Canada, and also to impose limitations upon the number of passports issued to any class of Japanese for travel to the United States. There was, however, nothing to enforce such restriction. —Ed.

THE ANGLO-TURKISH NEGOTIATIONS

Deadlock as to Mosul: Turks' Demand for Unmodified Frontier Line

Constantinople, May 26.

The Anglo-Turkish negotiations, proceeding here since May 20 relative to the disputed territory of Mosul which is at present incorporated in Iraq, have reached a deadlock.

Fethi Bey, on behalf of Turkey, demands the rendition of the whole district, while Sir Percy Scott, on behalf of Britain, insists on the present frontier with slight modifications. The speeches at the four meetings held were practically a repetition of the old arguments exhausted at Lausanne, and, in spite of the friendly atmosphere prevailing, no progress has been made, as shown by the fact that a map handed to Sir Percy Scott yesterday morning merely established the frontier-line which the Turks claim in an unmodified form.

It is understood that Sir Percy Cox has asked the Government for instructions and meanwhile no fresh meeting has been arranged. Failure to agree will mean reference to the Council of the League of Nations, as provided in the Lausanne Treaty, which, it is believed, the Turks are anxious to avoid.—Reuter.

LAUSANNE BLUNDERS

Canada Objecting to Sign Treaty With Turks When Not Asked to Conference

London, May 27.

A singular Imperial problem is revealed by the publication of the much-discussed correspondence between the Colonial Office and the Canadian Government relative to the Treaty of Lausanne.

It shows that, in contrast to the treaties with Germany, Austria and Bulgaria, which were signed by the representatives of the Dominions, Canada objected to appending her signature to this treaty, contending that the procedure adopted at Lausanne differed from that adopted in negotiating the treaties abovementioned, and, as no invitation had been extended to Canada to participate in the Lausanne Conference, she could not have been believed to have as direct and immediate interest in the negotiations with Turkey as she had in the Conferences at Versailles and Washington.

It was then agreed that the Treaty of Lausanne should be signed only by the British plenipotentiaries, to which Australia, New Zealand and South Africa agreed. Canada was subsequently asked to concur in ratification of the Treaty. She replied on March 24 that, on the foregoing grounds, she could not recommend the Canadian Parliament to approve the Treaty and, without Parliamentary approval, she was not warranted in concurring in ratification. Her Ministers, however, "will not take exception to such course as His Majesty's Government may deem advisable to recommend."—Reuter.

FLIGHT OVER NORTH PACIFIC

American Aviators' Description of the Terrible Battle with Snow and Wind: Groping Through Dark: Hopes of Now Making up Lost Times

Tokio, May 22.

With their longest day's flight of their journey thus far behind them the American aviators are resting at Kasumigaura to-night. Between dawn and dusk they covered 720 miles, only stopping briefly at Minato for fuel.

Leaving the sub-Arctic chill of the Kuriles in the grey of dawn, late this afternoon their pontoons broke the placid surface of the beautiful lagoon in the gracious sunshine of Japan's May-time. Thousands of watchers along the waterfront raised cheers when the planes appeared as tiny specks in the distant afternoon haze. The landing was perfect. Japanese planes overhead, day rockets and other fireworks added to the picture.

The men and the planes are in excellent condition, although the flyers are weary and showing the strain of the last week's battle with the elements. They are remaining at Kasumigaura for a week, changing the engines and overhauling. The men are coming on Saturday to Tokio, where a series of festivities is scheduled.

To-day's flight was made under good weather conditions. They twice encountered fogs, which, however, were not serious.

Among those present to greet the flyers were Lieut. Gen. Yasumitsu, Chief of Army Aviation, who congratulated them in the name of the Army. The American Military and Naval Attachés were also present.

Since their start the aviators have made 6,575 miles in 90 hours flying time.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Tokio, May 24.

"We knew that the trans-Pacific leg of our flight would be the worst part of our journey, but it was 10 times worse than we had expected, with its unceasing battle against the most terrible weather and continuous effort to preserve the planes from damage."

Thus the airman, Lieutenant Lowell Smith, briefly summed up the trip so far accomplished. He explained that the direction from east to west was more difficult, because it was contrary to the direction of the storms which, he said, had handicapped the planes by an average of 300 miles a day.

Lieutenant Smith declared that Squadron-Leader MacLaren would have an advantage in this respect, but, still, for all that, he did not envy him his experiences across the Pacific.

No Route for Commerce.

The leader of the American aviators said that he did not believe that the Northern Pacific route was practicable for commercial flying with the present type of machines, though he paid a tribute to the Douglas planes, which have arrived in splendid condition, as well as the Liberty motors, which he declared were "the finest in the world."

Lieutenant Smith described the jump to Sitkase as the worst section of the flight. They had had to battle against snow and wind throughout and had been unable to see the water, guiding their planes by following the line of breakers. Attu he declared to be the bleakest place of all, with the worst weather.

"From the air this section of the world presents a weird picture; all white and blue snow-covered islands and deep blue sea." He did not see any icebergs but passed over many large glaciers.

The Bolshevik Boor.

Lieutenant Smith narrated how when riding out a snow storm on May 16 on the waters off Rehring Island, the Russian authorities put out from the shore and informed the airmen that they were not allowed to land and must leave Russian territorial waters immediately, because, presumably, they were not welcome as Russia and America had no treaty relations. Lieutenant Smith replied that he was not there for pleasure and that he would be mighty glad to leave as soon as possible. That night the airmen rode out the storm in darkness. They were six hours on board their planes, and hopped off at eight o'clock the next day for Paramushiru, which, with the U. S. S. Ford, was one of the most welcome sights he had ever seen.

The leader paid a very generous tribute to the "splendid courage and fortitude of his companions, each of whom has given everything he had in this enterprise, in which all are brothers." He deplored the accident which had robbed them of Major Martin's leadership.

Warm Welcome in Japan.

He expressed very warm appreciation of the aviators' reception in Japan and the co-operation of the military and naval authorities as a great contributing factor to their success, as well as the lavish hospitality and accommodation at Kasumigaura, where everything had been sidetracked for their convenience. He described the joy of flying down the Japanese coast with its scenic beauties.

Lieutenant Smith expressed confidence that they would succeed in circling the world for, after the experience they had already gone through, "the rest of the trip should by comparison be easy sailing."

This morning the American airmen, who are curtailing their stay here in order to attempt to make up time, had left Kasumigaura for Tokio, where for the next two days they will be busily occupied in a series of congratulatory receptions and entertainments. To-day, after paying offical calls, the aviators will be the guests of the War Minister, General Ugaki, at luncheon. This evening they will attend a reception and ball, while to-morrow they will be the guests at a function at the University and a dinner by the Chief of the Aviation Section of the War Office. After the dinner, they will return to Kasumigaura. While they are here, they will be the recipients of commemorative tokens of their achievement in first crossing the Pacific by air.

Present Plans Uncertain

The airmen's future plans are uncertain until the new motors are tried out, but it is expected that they will hop off for Kushimoto on Wednesday or Thursday.

Later.

The luncheon, given in honour of the airmen by the War Minister, was a brilliant affair and was attended by Members of the Cabinet, the highest naval and military officers, and other prominent personages. General Ugaki and the American Ambassador, Mr. Woods, paid tributes to the courage and endurance of the airmen. General Ugaki said that their feat was unparalleled in history, and by it Japan had greatly benefitted in the stimulation of her own aeronautic enterprise. The visit further strengthened the ties forged by Commander Perry 70 years previously.

Mr. Woods declared that the bridging of the Pacific by air was instinct with hope for the future. The airmen in overcoming the most formidable obstacles has set an example to those who were at present attempting to conquer the difficulties now besetting America and Japan.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Tokio, May 29.

The American airmen are expecting, weather permitting, to hop off from Kasumigaura on Saturday, making Kagoshima the same day, only stopping at Kushimoto to refuel.

They are at present busy testing out new engines and effecting necessary repairs.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

U. S. Navy's Offer of Help to Convey New Plane

Tokio, May 26.

Pending more complete details of the damage done to the British plane at Akyab, Colonel Broome has arranged tentative plans to rush a complete break-down plane from Hakodate to Akyab. It was first intended to assemble the plane at Hakodate and fly to Akyab, but this was disregarded when Commander Abbott of the 43rd United States Destroyer Division, on learning of MacLaren's mishap, offered to Colonel Broome the use of an American destroyer to transport the plane from Hakodate at full speed as far as Hongkong. The offer is contingent on the approval of the Admiral of the Asiatic Fleet, which is probable.

Colonel Broome accepted the offer gratefully and communicated the details to the British Admiral and is now awaiting a reply. Approximately two weeks are required for the plane to reach Akyab. Colonel Broome told Reuter's representative that Commander Abbott's offer exemplifies sportsmanship of the highest type. —Reuter's Pacific Service.

Machine Waterlogged Owing to Heavy Rain

Akyab, May 26.

Squadron-Leader MacLaren says that the mishap to his machine was due to its being water-logged owing to the heavy rains at Akyab. The machine, refusing to stay in the air, dropped and was completely wrecked. It will be abandoned. His plans are uncertain, but he has cabled to England asking that a spare machine should be sent from Tokio. Meanwhile, he will probably remain at Akyab.—Reuter.

U. S. Navy's Offer Accepted

Tokio, May 27.

Colonel Broome has accepted the American offer to transport an aeroplane to Akyab for the use of Squadron-Leader MacLaren. The destroyer John Paul Jones will leave for Hakodate immediately to pick up the aeroplane. The destroyer will proceed to Hongkong, where the aeroplane will be trans-shipped to another destroyer for Akyab or any other designated place. It is expected that the fliers will have the aeroplane in 15 days. Mr. Davis, of Messrs. Vickers Ld., who is now in Hakodate, will accompany the machine.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Tokio, May 29.

It is reported from Hakodate that the American destroyer with the British plane for Squadron-Leader MacLaren will leave for Hongkong to-night. The destroyer will arrive at Hongkong on Monday morning.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

ALL-INDIA MOSLEM LEAGUE REVIVED

Demand for Provincial Autonomy: Need for Hindu and Moslem Co-operation

Lahore, May 25.

The All-India Moslem League, which had suspended its activities for the last few years, has been revived. Mr. Jinnah, a Bombay barrister, presiding at a large meeting of the League here to-day, deplored the dissension between Hindus and Moslems in India, especially in the Punjab. He declared that, if Hindus and Moslems only co-operated wholeheartedly, India would be able to force the British Parliament to grant her a responsible Government.

Mr. Jinnah dissociated herself from the Swarajist policy of wanton destruction, but declared that, if the British Government did not respond satisfactorily to the national demand, they must as a last resort make government through the elected Councils impossible. He urged the scrapping of the existing Constitution and the immediate grant of provincial autonomy, otherwise the results would be dangerous.—Reuter.

Framing a Constitution

Lahore, May 26.

The Moslem League has concluded its session after passing a resolution urging the continuance of communal representation to overhaul the Government of India Act with a view to early attainment of Swaraj. The League has appointed a committee to frame a constitution in consultation with other communities and has appealed to Hindus and Moslems to take steps to settle communal differences and abstain from aggressive activities. —Reuter.

THROWING AWAY INDIA

Disruption of Civil Service by Elimination of British Now Advocated

London, May 27.

A big step forward in the direction of the Indianization of the superior Civil Services in India is recommended in the report of the Royal Commission, presided over by Viscount Lee, which has been touring India. The Commission urges that the Indian Civil Service should comprise 60 per cent. of Indians, compared with 39 per cent. as at present, the Police Service 50 per cent. instead of 33 per cent., the Forest Service 75 per cent. and the Engineers 60 per cent. The Commission also recommends improvements in pay, pensions and concessions in regard to passages home for officers and wives.

The Commission further recommends that the educational, agricultural and other services shall henceforth be recruited and controlled by the local Governments instead of by the Secretary of State.—Reuter.

Condemned Unanimously by Native Press

Simla, May 28.

Service circles and the Anglo-Indian press express the opinion that the report of the Royal Commission, presided over by Viscount Lee, favouring the Indianisation of the superior Civil Service in India, offers a satisfactory solution of the question of the position of the Services, but doubt the success of the experiment of recruiting for the Services in the provinces by Indian Ministers and their rapid Indianisation.

The Indian press unanimously condemns the report on the ground that it gives overwhelming and uncalled for concessions to the Services. Indian Members of the Legislative Assembly are also hostile. They propose to move a resolution in this connexion.—Reuter.

ITALY FOR PEACE WITH DIGNITY

King's Opening of Parliament: Arms not to be Laid Aside While Europe is Armed

Rome, May 24.

The King, accompanied by the Queen and the Royal Family, today opened Parliament in the presence of Signor Mussolini and the members of his Cabinet, Senators and Deputies and members of the Diplomatic Body.

In the speech from the Throne, His Majesty said that the tasks begun by the Government must be continued determinedly. Juridical and administrative reforms were necessary. Military problems must be solved according to the economic situation of the country and the demands of foreign policy.

Italy was unable to remain unarmed among armed nations. She was unable to run the great risk of being taken unawares.

Italy's foreign policy must be peace with dignity. Italy was ready to direct all her energies towards reaching an equitable solution of the reparations questions, which would eliminate threatening dangers, and she was ready to make sacrifices in order that peace might be guaranteed provided that her legitimate fundamental interests were safeguarded.—Reuter.

CAMPAIGN AGAINST M. MILLERAND

Extremists in French Chamber Clamouring for President to Resign Office

Paris, May 27.

The campaign against President Millerand, which was at first considered an after-the-elections cliff, is now regarded very seriously.

Not only the Socialists but all the more extreme followers of the respective Premier, M. Herriot, are clamouring for the resignation of the President. The four principal Radical-Socialist organs are daily imperiously calling for a change at the Elysée, though there is reason to believe that M. Herriot and the more moderate Radicals deprecate the campaign, seeing that a Presidential crisis, following upon the Ministerial crisis, would be calculated not only to produce political disruption at Home but to delay the settlement of the Reparations question and prolong the state of uncertainty in Europe.—Reuter.

M. Poincare's Rallying Call

Paris, May 28.

A problem of the first magnitude which is at present transcending that of the personnel of the new Ministry itself, is the fate of President Millerand, whose resignation is demanded by the Left parties. They urge that the President's abdication should be forced by the refusal of any Left leader to accept the Premiership from his hands, while the Right and Centre parties are equally insistent that the President's consitutional duty is to remain at his post.

Meanwhile the last has by no means been heard of M. Poincaré, whose recent speeches have been in the nature of a rallying call to his supporters to close their ranks and form an Opposition phalanx which he intends to lead.—Reuter.

THE ANGLO-FRENCH ENTENTE

Publication of Correspondence Between M. Poincare and British Premier

London, May 28.

The Foreign Office to-day issued the correspondence which was exchanged between Mr. Ramsay MacDonald and M. Poincaré at the middle of the month with reference to the proposed visit of the French Premier to Chequers, which was later cancelled in consequence of French political circumstances.

The letters were framed in exceedingly cordial terms.

Mr. MacDonald in his first letter, dated May 14, asked if, in view of the uncertain political situation then existing, it were not possible to pursue an exploration of the problems arising from the Dawes Report, at least tentatively for the time being, his object being to save time.

M. Poincaré's reply, dated May 15, definitely declared the impending resignation of his Cabinet, but expressed the opinion that the conversations could quite well continue in a preliminary form.

In the meantime, the French Premier had written a long letter on May 14, which crossed Mr. MacDonald's, expressing his belief, from the accounts he had received from the Belgian Ministers of their conversations with Mr. MacDonald, that there was every ground for hoping that a final agreement could be reached without difficulty. M. Poincaré also recapitulated his Government's attitude in respect of the Dawes Report, as already known. "You were good enough to tell MM. Theunis and Hymans that in the event of a breach of the undertakings contracted by her, Germany would find herself confronted by England, Belgium and France inflexibly united as they were during the war. It seemed to you to be difficult, however, to foresee at the present moment the nature of the guarantees which in such an eventuality we might be led to take by common agreement." The letter added that there did not seem to be any doubt that Germany was deliberately violating the stipulations of the Treaty of Versailles and reconstituting her war material and military formations.—Reuter.

NEW CANDIDATE FOR U. S. PRESIDENCY

Senator La Follette Willing to be Nominated Independently of Other Parties

Washington, May 28.

Senator La Follette has announced his willingness to run independently for the Presidency, if neither of the two great parties at the coming Conventions shows ability and willingness to purge itself of the long domination of evil influences. At the same time he denounces the Communists, whom he charges with seeking to obtain control of the Farmer and Labour Progressive Convention meeting at St. Paul on June 27.—Reuter's American Service.

* The Senator from Wisconsin has always been a big factor in American politics, not because he was elected from one of the populous States like New York, Pennsylvania or California, but by reason of his unadulterated support of measures which to his mind should help the common people, rather than the corporations. As a proponent of the rights of the populace in his own State as far back as 1900, he gave the ordinary voter such a feeling of confidence by his initiation of bills designed to negate what seemed rash measures by the railroads, that they elected him Governor after he had served many terms in the State Legislature. This office he filled for over five years, being re-elected twice and then resigned upon going to Washington as U. S. Senator in 1905. His constituents, the farmers and workers (solid) in the cities, have returned him to that office three times since and now he is in his 19th year in that body. Even his pro-German attitude before America entered the War could not kill his popularity in Wisconsin.

La Follette has had presidential aspirations before and in 1908, the year in which William Howard Taft received the Republican nomination and was later elected to the Chair, La Follette was given 25 votes in the Republican Convention. This year he was nominated in the Wisconsin primaries, but telegraphic reports fail to state that he has further support in other parts of the country. In view of the assertion by the Coolidge managers that the President now has the definite support of 825 delegates (Republican) at the Cleveland Convention to be held next month (but 556 are necessary for the nomination) La Follette comes out with the above announcement.

Many politicians at Home consider this but a threat to force the Republicans to incorporate into their official platform under which Coolidge (almost certainly) will run in November, planks the purpose of which will be to give farmers further relief in the nature of credits, or assistance in general to the Middle States.—Ed.

"THE DEATH RAY"

Briton's Invention Probably Open to Purchase by Foreign Powers

London, May 22.

In the House of Commons to-day, Mr. W. Leach, the Under-Secretary of State for Air, told questioners that his attention had been called to claims made for an invention which was known as "the death ray" and that the Air Ministry was in touch with the inventor, Mr. Grindell Matthews, but it was not advisable at present to make a full statement concerning this. He could not answer an inquiry if the invention was first offered to the British Government.

May 23.

Considerable significance is attached to Mr. W. Leach's reply in the House of Commons yesterday with regard to the "death ray," because Mr. Grindell Matthews is at present in France, being civically welcomed by Lyons, where a French company has placed a laboratory at his disposal. It is stated that the company has offered to purchase all Mr. Matthews's inventions, including the death-ray, which is reputed to kill people, explode ammunition, and disable an aeroplane motor at a distance of several miles. He has also invented means of controlling submarines by wireless, which were successfully demonstrated during the war. Mr. Matthews's journey to France provoked an outcry in the British press against allowing possibly valuable warlike inventions to go abroad.

Later.

Mr. Grindell Matthews, the inventor of "the death ray," is returning to London for a further interview with a Government agent.—Reuter.

Demonstration Witnessed by Government Officials

London, May 26.

Representatives of the Government to-day witnessed a private demonstration of Mr. Grindell Matthews's so-called "death-ray" in the latter's laboratory. A representative of Mr. Matthews told a pressman that they had delivered what was tantamount to an ultimatum. If a satisfactory reply were not received to-morrow, Mr. Matthews on Wednesday would fly to Paris, where a contract was awaiting his signature.

Later.

It was stated at the Air Ministry to-night that Mr. Grindell Matthews gave certain demonstrations to representatives of the Admiralty, the War Office and the Air Ministry to-day and that as a result proposals for a simple but more conclusive test of the apparatus had been made to Mr. Matthews.

Going to France

May 27.

Mr. Grindell Mattews declared in an interview that he had no alternative but reluctantly to reject the offer of the Air Ministry. He said that he could not wait longer, and was going to Paris to-day.—Reuter.

Claim by Other Parties to a Controlling Interest in Invention

London, May 27.

As the aeroplane which was taking Mr. Grindell Matthews, the inventor of the so-called "death ray," to France was departing, the solicitor and one of the parties to an action in the High Court dashed up to the Croydon Aerodrome in a motor-car just too late to inform Mr. Matthews of an interim injunction, which Mr. Justice Greer had granted one hour previously, preventing him from selling or contracting to sell his invention without the consent of three parties, who claim that they are entitled to a 52 per cent. ownership in the invention.

Failing an undertaking from the French company which is negotiating to purchase the invention, to await the result of the proceedings, action will be taken in the French Courts to protect the invention till a new or revised offer has been made by the British Government to Mr. Matthews.

An official at the Air Ministry stated that numerous inventors are making claims to similar rays.

Demonstration not Decisive

Later.

The Air Ministry in a statement says that it had offered Mr. Grindell Matthews a number of opportunities since last February to give a demonstration of his apparatus, but he did not make arrangements until interviewed by Air Vice-Marshal Sir Geoffrey Salmond, Director-General of Supply and Research at the Air Ministry, on Saturday last. The demonstration, actually proposed by the inventor and shown yesterday, consisted of lighting an electric lamp and stopping a small motor-cycle engine by a ray from a distance of 15 yards. The inventor provided and arranged all the apparatus. The representatives of the Department were shown nothing to bear out the press statements with regard to the possibilities of the invention and it was impossible to form any definite opinion with regard to the value of the device.

Mr. Matthews was, accordingly, offered an immediate opportunity to demonstrate stopping a small petrol motor provided by the Government. He was not asked to disclose any information regarding the rays and he was to be paid £1,000 immediately if the test were successful, the only condition being that he should allow the Government a fortnight in which to consider a basis for further financial negotiations for the purchase and development of the invention. The statement says in conclusion that Mr. Matthews refused the offer.—Reuter.

More Questions in the House of Commons

London, May 28.

The question of the so-called "death ray" was raised in the House of Commons to-day. Replying to Commander J. M. Kenworthy, Liberal Member for Kingston-upon-Hull, Mr. W. Leach, Under-Secretary of State for Air, emphasized that Mr. Grindell Matthews had been offered and had refused the opportunity to demonstrate his invention under conditions which would satisfy a scientist or business men. Every facility had been offered to him to give a demonstration which would be satisfactory to himself and to the Services.

The Departments had been placed in a difficult position in dealing with Mr. Matthews, partly owing to the vigorous press campaign which was being conducted on his behalf (Opposition cheers) and because it was not the first occasion on which he had submitted schemes for which extravagant claims had been made. Consequently, the Departments had been unable to accept Mr. Matthews's statement in regard to his invention without a scrutiny which, apparently, he was not prepared to face.—Reuter.

British Government's Contract with Airship Guarantee Company

London, May 27.

The draft contract with the Airship Guarantee Co., in connexion with the Government's intention to initiate a comprehensive programme of lighter-than-air research and experiment, provides for the construction of an airship conforming to the requirements of the Air Ministry on the principles of airworthiness laid down by the Aeronautical Research Committee. The prescribed trials will include tests in Britain and a voyage to India.

The price of the airship will be £300,000, of which £100,000 will be payable immediately the contract is signed. A further initial payment of £50,000 will be made towards the contractors' capital expenditure. The sum £250,000 will be repaid if the ship, before the flight trials are held, fails to satisfy certain vital conditions. Should, however, the ship satisfy these, but not carry out the flight trials successfully, the remaining £50,000 will be withheld wholly or partly, according as the performance approximates the requirements. The company may subsequently repurchase the airship for use on an approved British airship transport service at £150,000.—Reuter.

Government Estimates Passed in Commons

London, May 28.

In the House of Commons to-day Mr. Wm. Leach, Under-Secretary for Air, moving the Committee Stage of the supplementary estimate of £350,000 in connexion with the Government's airship scheme, said that the prospect of reaching India in five days and Australia in 10 to 12 days justified the taking of a few risks (cheers). If the scheme were successful, he was confident that it would have tremendous possibilities. Three years was the outside period expected to elapse before they would be able to make the journey to India, but he was confident that it would be less.

The Government proposed to begin research at Cardington and to proceed at the earliest possible moment with the building of an airship of five million cubic feet capacity. He was not authorized to say that the Government intended to run a passenger service to India, but they purposed first giving contractors the option of doing it themselves.

The vote was agreed to.—Reuter.

TAXATION OF FOREIGN IMPORTS IN CHINA

Breach of Treaty Obligations: Need for Prompt and Effective Action

London, May 26.

The "Times" City Correspondent in notes dealing with the serious concern of British houses trading in the East at the provincial taxation of foreign imports to China in defiance of treaty obligations, declares that the evil calls for redress.

Referring to the suggestion that the Legations should assist the Peking Government to maintain the treaties by recognizing Chêkiang's declaration of independence as a justification for indulging in fiscal retaliation against her, the "Times" remarks that action of this sort proved effectual a few years ago at Canton when that province attempted to flout the authority of the Central Government, but, whatever course is adopted, the need for prompt and effective action cannot be gainsaid. There are more than enough artificial barriers to trade already.—Reuter.

SATURDAY'S TELEGRAMS

UNEMPLOYMENT IN GREAT BRITAIN

Triangular Debate in House of Commons: Conservative Motion—Practically a Vote of Censure—Defeated: Liberals' and Mr. Asquith's Indecision

London, May 29.

The Prime Minister, Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, and not the Minister of Labour, Mr. Tom Shaw, took charge of to-night's debate in the House of Commons on unemployment, when Sir William Joynson-Hicks (Conservative) re-introduced his motion to reduce the salary of the Minister of Labour by £100.

It had been a day of intense political excitement, with talk of a possibility of a dissolution and the Ministerialists were urgently whipped up for the division.

Mr. Asquith presided at a meeting of the Liberal party this afternoon to discuss tactics, an inconclusive result showing that the Liberals are still acutely divided on the question of supporting the Government.

Door Mat or Horizon.

Sir Robert Horne (Conservative) opened the debate. He declared that the country's patience was exhausted. The Government's record was one of hypocrisy and dismal failure. Mr. MacDonald's gaze was so fixed on the foreign horizon that he had stumbled over his own door-mat (Opposition cheers).

Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, who was given an ovation by the Ministerialists, expressed regret at Sir Robert Horne's tub-thumping. He agreed that the opinion of the country was changing, but it was against the Opposition and in favour of Labour. The Prime Minister concluded by declaring that Sir William Joynson-Hicks's motion was a vote of censure. If it were passed, he assured the Opposition that he would do his best to meet them on the platforms of the country (prolonged Ministerial cheers).

The Premier's Remedies.

Mr. MacDonald declared that the last Government had left the present one with bare cupboards in the solution of the problem. He stated that unemployment schemes were inextricably involved with the problem of local rating and Imperial taxation. The Government was proceeding with certain large arterial roads, payable out of central funds, on which, he hoped, men would be shortly employed. He insisted that haste must not be unduly applied to intricate problems. The Prime Minister dwelt on the importance of developing national schemes, such as hydro-electric production and afforestation, but preliminary investigations and the acquisition of the necessary powers took time. He asserted that afforestation was bound up with the land settlement scheme, and expressed the opinion that the Government ought to plant at least 30,000 acres a year.

At the conclusion of Mr. MacDonald's speech, the Liberals trooped out of the House to hold a party meeting with regard to what attitude to adopt on the vote.

Consequently exceptional interest was attached to the speech of Mr. Asquith a little later, when he indicated at an early stage that the Liberals were prepared to give the Government a little more time to turn round.

Mr. Asquith's Willingness to Wait and See

Mr. Asquith said that his willingness to give the Government time was contingent on the understanding that the vote under discussion should be kept open in order that the Liberals should be fully enabled to obtain a perfectly independent scrutiny of the results of the Government's proposals. He regarded the Premier's statement as a considerable addition to the House's previous knowledge of the Government's programme. He was for fair play to the inexperienced new Government. (Ministerial cheers). He had no reason to love the Labour Party, but was not so anxious to pay off old scores as to contribute whatever was possible towards a settlement of the unemployment problem.

Mr. Baldwin said that the Government's suggested schemes would not prove a positive remedy for unemployment, with regard to which the Labour Party were as far off as when they assumed office.

Later.

In view of Mr. Asquith's speech, it is generally accepted in the lobby that the Government is safe to-night.

Later.

Mr. Baldwin declared that the Conservatives were ready to meet Mr. MacDonald's challenge in the country whenever the Government threw it down.

Sir William Joynson-Hicks's motion was rejected by 300 votes to 252.

One hundred Liberals voted against Sir W. Joynson-Hicks's motion, and 30 abstained in response to Mr. Asquith's appeal to non-supporters of the Government policy, while eight voted with the Opposition. The debate on the main estimate has been adjourned sine die.—Reuter.

Deep rooted Mistrust of Japan the Prevailing Motive in Washington

RUSSIAN ISSUE OF 1913 LOAN

Bondholders' Interests in Danger from Chinese Embargo

The "Times" says that the Chinese Government's ruling that the Russian portion of the bonds of the Chinese 1913 Reorganization Loan will be exchanged for new bonds only where the holders furnish a statement of the history of the bonds from 1917 has placed the holders in a very unfortunate position. The ruling, if rigidly maintained, will mean that a number of bondholders will totally lose their investment. The Chinese Government's attitude certainly seems to call for reconsideration.

Meanwhile, it is understood that the bondholders whose interests are jeopardized will make an organized effort to obtain modification of the conditions.—Reuter.

FROM THE FOUR WINDS

LIANG SHIH-YI SPEAKS IN LONDON

A Scholar of the Old School on China's Lack of Power and the Responsibilities of Her Young Men

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

London, April 25.

This week the Central Union of Chinese Students in Great Britain and Ireland gave a banquet at the Connaught Rooms in honour of Mr. Liang Shih-yi, ex-Premier of the Chinese Republic. It was also hoped that Sir Robert Ho Tung would be present but he had to absent himself at the last moment on account of a royal invitation.

There was, however, a very good attendance which included the Japanese Minister, Baron Hayashi, Sir Charles and Lady Addis, Sir James William Jamieson, Viscount and Viscountess Kano, Mr. Fred Bramley, Secretary to the Trade Union Congress, and Mrs. Bramley, Mr. and Mrs. Hallifax, Sir Gregory Foster, Provost of University College, and Lady Foster, Professor Gutteridge, Mr. and Mrs. Malone, Dr. L. Giles, Mr. and Mrs. F. Ashton-Watkins, Mr. and Mrs. S. Doyle Penrose, Mr. T. Tajima, the Japanese ex-Secretary and Minister of Home Affairs, Mr. K. Nishida, and Mr. Chu Chao-hsin. Mr. T. K. Lee presided.

In proposing the toast to the guests, Mr. Chu Chao-hsin, the Chinese Chargé d'Affaires in London, spoke in part as follows:—

"It is hardly necessary to recommend to any gathering of Chinese or of British with Far Eastern experience the claims to respect and admiration of His Excellency Liang Shih-yi, who is now on a visit to this country. Mr. Liang Shih-yi has been over 30 years in Government service, being a high official under the old régime as well as under the Republic. He has acquired experience in so many branches of life that it is very difficult to recapitulate them all. Perhaps his chief claim to our gratitude and admiration in China is in connexion with public finances and means of communications. In fact, the construction of the railways in the northern provinces has been largely due to his efforts.

"He has been Minister of Finance and Minister of Communications. He was ex-President Yuan Shih-kai's right hand man in the capacity of Chief Secretary for a number of years. He once held the highest office as Prime Minister.

Scholar and Financier.

"His early literary ability indeed marked him out for a distinguished career. During his early days he passed the highest literary examination in China, and secured the most distinguished degree we have, namely of Hanlin. This is a very much harder degree to obtain than any of the degrees our modern students secure abroad, and those who know our old examination system will realize both the strenuous efforts he must have made and his brilliant ability in performing such a task.

"He is a man well known as possessing both old and modern knowledge, while I have already alluded to his wide experience in the different departments of Government Administration. His achievements both in financial and economic enterprises have won for him great fame, and he has among our countrymen acquired the nickname of 'God of Wealth.' Let me, however, in saying this, make it perfectly clear that he himself is not a wealthy man. He acquired his nickname by his ability, and by the distinguished services which he has ever rendered to the country. In short, his successes are to be sought not in his own personal position to-day but in the records of a grateful nation. We should be proud of him and China is fortunate in possessing him. It is specially fortunate because our country possesses unlimited resources which are awaiting development. Such development may need capital, but it also needs men of ability to use it, and in Mr. Liang you find an ideal statesman.

Diplomat and Business Man.

"There are with us a number of financiers and business men who are interested in China. I came into this country as a diplomatist, but I am rapidly beginning to believe that I am more properly a business man, for I am always preaching the commercial potentialities of China in a way which perhaps will make some people regard me as a sort of Publicity Agent in Advance. Still, I have always felt on very safe ground. I have met many people who lament the temporary unrest in our country owing to its effect on trade, but I have never yet met anyone who did not realize that, given suitable conditions, there was an immense field for commercial and economic development in my native land."

In responding, Mr. Liang Shih-yi delivered the following address; though as he does not speak English it was read for him and it was very well received and considerably applauded:—

"Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen. and my young friends who are to guide the destiny of our country. I have always been most attached to the younger element, especially those who are cultivated and educated like yourselves; therefore it has given me very great pleasure to receive on the very first day of my arrival in England an invitation to dinner from your Union.

Knowledge is Power.

"You asked me to give you some advice as to your studies and future careers. I was educated in an old school and I must confess I have never had a modern training, therefore I cannot presume to give you any advice on your individual studies. But during the 30 odd years of my public life, I have learnt to realize that knowledge plays a very important part in every walk of life and it is upon knowledge, not luck, that our success depends. Our ancients had the same idea when they considered that to learn how to govern a state one must start from the investigation of things. I am not trying to give a lecture on education tonight. but only wish to express an opinion which I have formed after my own experience.

"How is it that we with a population of 400,000,000 people, larger than any other country has, have not yet been able to keep pace with other great Powers? The answer is, I think, that we are still somewhat behind in scientific knowledge. 'Efficiency rather than numbers' was a military maxim among our Ancients, and is in my opinion a maxim that my country and students should remember, the present world being only a large battlefield.

Combine the Two.

"What is the most desirable kind of education? seems to be a question which affects the whole world after the War. Before the war, there seemed to have been two great schools of thought with regard to education: one was to develop individualism like the French, and the other co-operativeness like the Germans. Experience in the last war seems to show, however, that both were one-sided, and the present tendency is to favour a combination of the two, i.e. to develop individual character as well as the spirit of co-operation, because every person is a private individual and at the same time cannot stand aloof from others. It is perhaps due to the natural influences or tradition of the country, that our culture has been more for the development of individual character, and that has formed the civilization of the East for 5,000 years. But when intercourse between the different parts of the world is so easy like the present, when the civilization of the East may soon be blended with that of the West to form a new civilization for the whole World, we cannot but follow the tide and modify our own culture. My opinion is that in Ethics we can teach others and our students need not go abroad for that. But in Science and democratic ideas, we have much to learn from the more advanced nations of the West, and it is to these subjects that our students should devote themselves, because our most urgent need is to develop our industries and to advance our democracy.

Breadth of Mind.

"A general knowledge is as important, because whatever profession one is in, one's business is not confined to those of his own profession. For example, if one wishes to start a factory, the technical knowledge of a mere engineer is not enough: he must have a knowledge of finance in order to be able to make use of his capital to the best advantage; he should also know something about natural sciences in the selection of raw materials, and he should also have a knowledge of commercial geography as well as of human nature to find out the needs and the best market for his goods. In a word, the factory could not hope for much success without due regard for all such things. General knowledge is particularly desirable in our country at present, because we have not yet enough men for a full distribution of labour, and returned students have had to take up several appointments at the same time, or to be put in positions in which they cannot do full justice to their training. It is, of course, not a happy situation, but these are facts and are not yet avoidable.

"I don't think there is any need for me to make further remarks on other educational questions, such as 'how to look after your health,' etc., which must be only too familiar to you all.

China's Old Civilization.

"I have only one more remark to make, that is, while you are taking in the civilization of the West, you should try to give out a little of our own, because there is much in our own civilization which surpasses that of other nations, and even among the modern inventions which constitute modern civilization, there are things which were known to our forefathers. That such facts are not realized by other nations is perhaps due to our natural reluctance in boasting of our merits. Nor have we ever tried to force our civilization on others. We have, it seems, gained a better position in the world after the great war, and when other nations are having more respect for, and are more interested in, our country, we need not hesitate to make our old civilization better known to the world, and that is a duty which devolves on you students."

CHRISTMAS ISLAND TRAGEDY

Suicide of Phosphate Co.'s Officer

It is only now that the facts have become generally known of a tragic occurrence that took place on Christmas Island early in March, says the "Straits Times." For some time reports were current here that a tragedy had happened on the island but details were not available and it was impossiblee to publish the facts earlier.

It appears that Mr. Howard, who had a fine war record, came out about three years ago to join the service of the Phosphate Company, which, as is well known, have extensive works on Christmas Island, and, at the time of his death, was foreman in charge of No. 3 quarry. The deceased, on the morning of the tragedy, was in the engine room at the quarry—it was about 7.30—and as soon as the coolies had left for their meal, he shot himself through the head with his own revolver, the act it is said having been committed as the result of some private trouble.

Mrs. Howard, missing him, went out in search of the deceased, whom she discovered lying dead in the engine room. The gloom caused by the affair was naturally intensified among the community by the smallness and comparative loneliness of the island.

The deceased was very popular there, and every European assembled at the funeral, the service at which was read by Mr. W. E. Rigby, District Officer.

The widow of the late Mr. Howard, passed through Singapore recently, homeward bound.

An inquiry was conducted by the District Officer and the proceedings, as is usual in matters of this nature, are reviewed by the Government of the Colony.

NEW TYPE OF BRITISH HOLIDAY

Exit Paterfamilias and Sand Castles: The Modern Craze for Rushing About

BY OUR LONDON CORRESPONDENT

About 1914 there died the last Paterfamilias who maintained that he had always taken his family to the same sea resort, stayed at the same boarding-house, frequented the same beach and vegetated in the same fashion as in the past year when he paid his initial visit with one child—he finished with ten. He has had no imitators. Probably a public advertisement would not bring out more than a score of people who had ever in six successive years frequented with their families the same seaside resort. Blackpool may perhaps be excluded and doubtless there are single men who regularly prefer certain centres for their unattended diversions.

It is not so much nowadays that the parents "hustle" as that the children are restless. The cinema inspires an addiction to "something new," as often as possible. Parents, it is true, share this feeling. It may be most unfairly styled "a craze" but there is nothing reprehensible in it. Variety puts a keen edge on experience and travel broadens judgment. Possibly if the tendency in holiday taste had not much to recommend it, the seaside resorts would none the less cater for it, but as it is they can make of necessity a supervirtue. Hence none of them expect the visitor to their homes to sit daily on the seashore in soporific and inactive indolence. They facilitate contrariwise his movements in all the entire round-about-lying districts, with centralization on their own town.

The charabanc industry, in its latest development of comfortable travel and perfect reliability, is the greatest asset any corporation ever possessed. In some districts such, for instance, as Hastings, which is exceptionally endowed with surroundings replete with romance and picturesqueness, it is possible to assert that for an entire fortnight the charabanc traveller will never for long take the same route, never visit the same place twice. Other seaside towns put forward somewhat similar claims; there is not one which does nothing in this respect. Moreover all visitors of any status use the up-to-date charabanc. The time has passed when the guest in any fashionable hotel felt it incumbent on him to apologize to his friends for recourse to those vehicles. Why need he? He uses a bus in town.

But this development has killed the self-contained seaside holiday and it will never come back again unless for the very young and the very old. Still there need be no regrets. In the United States there are universally displayed advertisements "See your own country first." The British public is beginning to take this maxim to heart, though hitherto it has been a little uncertain as to whether there was anything special to see. Nowadays the seaside holiday is largely used as a jumping-off ground.

OFFICERS AND NAVAL BENEFIT SOCIETIES

A Lower Deck Grievance

Orders have been given by the Commander-in-Chief, Plymouth, to the Commodore, R. N. Barracks, Devonport, to detail Naval officers to attend the private meetings of petty officers and men at the port, known as Lower Deck Benefit Societies.

The management of such organizations by the men of the Navy on their own behalf is in accord with the policy of the Board of Admiralty, who have intimated that they fully recognize the great advantages that have accrued to petty officers and men by the formation of the societies, which have the full support and approval of the Admiralty so long as they confine themselves to their original and legitimate objects.

The present Orders, no doubt, arise out of a memorial recently drawn up at Portsmouth and circulated in the Press. There is reason to believe that this memorial was not discussed at Devonport, and that the distribution to the Press had not the consent of the societies at Devonport.

The societies at the port have not controvened the spirit of the Fleet Order, under which they act; the business usually carried on is strictly private; and several are registered under the Friendly Societies Act. The action taken by the Naval Commander-in-Chief is entirely without precedent or justification. Further, similar action is not being taken at the other Home ports.

Under present circumstances, petty officers and men may not show their confidence and respect for their officers by inviting them to social functions on shore, but are ordered to receive them at their business meetings. The officers are said to be present in an "advisory capacity," but as it is generally impossible for them to "advise" upon the subjects discussed, their presence cannot be helpful.

There is a strong feeling locally that the Orders given in this connexion should be annulled, and the societies put upon their honour with regard to breaches of Admiralty instructions as to the limits within which discussions are to be confined.

A CARRIER RAY FOR ELECTRIC POWER

Mr. Matthews on Principle of His Invention: "To Make War Impossible"?

The principle of the new electric ray, which he said had been described as a terrible engine of destruction, was explained by its inventor, Mr. Grindell Matthews, speaking on April 15 at a Foreign Press Association luncheon at the Trocadero, London.

Mr. Matthews said:—After many months of work I have produced a new form of vibration which has many similar properties to that familiar form of vibration which we call light. In the same way as light, for instance, it can be refracted and reflected. But the outstanding property for which I have searched is that this ray must be a partial conductor. My aim was to produce a link along which I could project electrical energy to any point, which would be confined within it, and also to be always under control.

What I have now is a means of actual transmission of power from one point to another, either or both of which may be rapidly moving. I am glad to say that my work has been so far successful, and I feel confident that in the near future I shall be transmitting power over considerable distances. I hope to be able to make arrangements for continuing my experiments on a large scale in the open country, where conditions will be more suitable for carrying out long-distance trials in secrecy and safety.

It has been said that with such a terrible engine of destruction armies would be wiped out in a few seconds. I do not know, and I am not going to argue about the possibilities for ill of my invention. Indeed, I am more tempted to hope that this power will make war impossible. Then would I feel that I have accomplished something for the greater glory of my country and of mankind if ever the days come when we and members of all nations go hand-in-hand in the fields of progress towards a happier world.

Mr. Van der Veer, the president of the Association, had, in introducing Mr. Matthews, said that some time ago the Germans tried to scare us with the news that they had invented a ray which would stop the motors of engines high up in the air. If he understood correctly, Mr. Matthews had invented something more powerful—a ray which could stop human engines and so prevent us from being worried by an unseen enemy high in the clouds.

Mr. J. de Maysiac, who also spoke, referred to the work of Mr. Matthews during the war, and said that he had succeeded in developing instruments for the location of submarines up to 9,000 yards with considerable accuracy, and had invented mines which could be exploded by wireless. Since the Armistice he had produced a speaking film which was unique in its way, and his last invention had seemed to the speaker unbelievable. When he saw it in operation first he looked for hidden wires. He need not have worried, however, for Mr. Matthews had never faked. Furthermore, Mr. Matthews would never advertise or come forward in any way.

OUR AUSTRALIAN LETTER

The Country Party's Opportunity: British Naval Squadron's Visit: Boards of Sugar Cane Refuse: Robbery under Arms: New Silver Mine in Queensland

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Melbourne, April 24.

Mr. S. M. Bruce, Prime Minister, is supposed to have been seeking a modus vivendi as between himself, the Nationalists, and the Country party, which holds the balance of power in the House of Representatives. In actual fact the Country party can claim 44 votes in a House of 76, while the Nationalists can count some 26. The Country party therefore holds the balance of power, which it appears determined to use for wringing advantages for the primary producers. Indeed it has been declared that, like the Labour party of old, it has announced itself as up for sale, prepared to give its support to those who will bid the most in concessions. Speeches made by the Prime Minister at the Sydney luncheon in connexion with the R. A. S. Show, and subsequently at some functions in Victoria, have made it quite clear that the Country party has been made a bid for its support. It is offered railway and shipping subsidies, export bonuses, and other help, all of which is to be paid for out of surplus import revenues. In other words unless the primary producers cease their railing against protection they cannot expect any assistance from the Government. The offer has been made now for over a week, but it is remarkable that no newspaper has taken the matter up, either to approve or condemn, and that what seems a clear-cut issue is treated with no greater consideration than the vapourings of a soap-box orator.

The New Policy.

Mr. Bruce's policy it to produce more and find increased markets. He sees in protection a method of increasing the home markets for primary products. He has in this an argument that even Chamberlain, 30 years ago, could not reasonably apply to the position then existent in Great Britain. The American figures are, however, strongly to the point. The Australian Prime Minister sees in the enormous customs receipts grounds for assuming that the primary industries are suffering as a consequence of the tariff, and therefore he tries to balance the position by using the revenues under the protective tariff for the purpose of helping by shipping subsidies and the exploitation of new markets such primary industries as are producing more than sufficient to meet local consumption. A section of the press is declaring that the policy is merely one of propitiation, while already there are those who say that the proposed expenditure will stand in the way of a reduction in taxation. Mr. Bruce may therefore satisfy himself with the reflexion that, in a democracy, there is no desire for economy or reduction in taxation, and the fiercest quarrels will rage round the issue, not of how much but of how the public money shall be spent. But Mr. Bruce has added another and unexpected squib to his policy. He insists that Government help, whether fiscally or by bounties or subsidies, will not be given where inefficiency is shown. In other words he claims for the administration the right to differentiate between industries and businesses which are carried on according to the official idea of efficiency or according to that of private enterprise. One can recall a thousand instances of cheap and inefficient production, where the acuteness of the management has counterbalanced these deficiencies. Mr. Bruce does not tell us how he will overcome this difficulty. For the moment there is a calm in relation to the Government's policy. We must await the breaking of the inevitable storm.

Special Squadron Visit.

The visit of the section of the British navy to the Australian coast is over, and the ships are now on their way to New Zealand. Despite the stupid and rather mean attempts of a section of organised labour to belittle the visitors and the visit, the whole business was a conspicuous success. Judging by the descriptions of the personel it was an excellent immigration stunt, and it may be frankly said that the speeches by the chiefs of the squadron, Vice-Admiral Sir Percy Field, and Rear-Admiral Sir Hubert Brand, only mildly reprobated the idea of immediate desertions, while advocating migration to Australia as soon as ever the crews were discharged. One of the last acts of the visitors was to attend the funeral service of the armed cruiser Australia. To the ordinary person it is by no means clear how it came about that the Washington conference seized upon Australia's one ewe lamb, or ram, and insisted that it must put hors de combat, while other nations with a whole flock of arms were permitted to keep the lot. There were many protests in the newspapers, but all were met by the official statement that the cruiser must be rendered harmless in accordance with the dictates of the Washington Conference. The Australia was only ten years old. She took an active part in maintaining the freedom of the Pacific during the early days of the war, and in helping to corner the Germans off the Falkland Islands. Later on she was in the North Sea, but unfortunately an accident involving her sister-ship, the New Zealand, kept her in dock at the moment of the historic battle which settled the fate of the German navy. The dismantled hulk of the Australia was towed to a point some 22 miles east of Sydney Heads. There she was duly scuttled before a distinguished assembly, British and Australian warships firing salutes, aeroplanes wheeling overhead, and swooping down to deposit wreaths upon the doomed ship. The passing of the Australia was made a sermon rather than an incident, and the subsequent cinema versions in on way detracted from the impression caused by the actual event.

Two Labour Conferences.

The Labour party is sub-divided into State organizations, and those of the two chief States—New South Wales and Victoria—may be reasonably said to dominate the whole. In Queensland there is a good deal of "red" talk but the Labour government has the extremists well in hand, while in the other three small States Labour has to sing very small and be very astute if it hopes to obtain office. Victoria, however, has a section of the Labour party which talks "red," and the most conservative of the newspaprs find room to report the "high falutin" which they do not fail to denounce. In Sydney the Communists actually have a footing, and it is there that labour is fighting them á L'outrance. The annual meetings of the party in the two States have just been held, and a feature is made of the fact that at each convention the Communist or propaganda crowd failed to have its own way. There is, however, another aspect of the apparent success of the moderates. We have seen them before agree upon matters one year and calmly reverse them the next. Indeed their whole programme as embodied in the platform approved by the interstate conferences is a negation of the moderation of which they now boast. They are now shouting "hurroo" because both in Melbourne and Sydney, the immoderates have been defeated, not upon questions of policy, but merely upon those of internal organization. But it is further noticeable that the majorities obtained against the Communists have been in no way discouraging to the latter. In Sydney the annual meeting of the State Australian Labour party has provided a majority of about 15 in a gathering of 300 against the intrigues of the Communists, while in Victoria the margin was rather greater. There is not much in this for the political moderates of Labour to boast about. The serious disputes in the Labour ranks of New South Wales have been easily obliterated. It is admitted that there has been much trickery and corruption, but entirely within the ranks of the party, and the all-powerful conference has condemned those reported by the executive as responsible. There the matter ends, unless the accused try to carry the matter further, but meanwhile Labour as a political party has benefited by the washing of its dirty linen in public. Its chief constituents amongst the working classes have no special objection to this form of publicity. Possibly it recalls experiences of the east end of London, or of Woolloomoolloo, Sydney, and reminds them of home.

New Silver Find.

There is naturally great interest in the apparent discovery of a new and extensive silver field in Northern Queensland. Mount Isa, as it is called, is about 80 miles from Cloncurry, and the presence of silver has been known for two or three years. More recently expert examinations have been made and to use an old digger's phrase the present statements are taken not from the prospectus but from the warden's report. Indeed the caution one usually finds in the latter document is very evident in all the reports, but the existence of many loads, running parallel over an area about five square miles in extent, with outcrops of exceeding richness, induce the Government Geologist to describe the find as "wonderful." It is asserted that it will make another Broken Hill, and some say that if the lodes will only go down the find will result in several Broken Hills. Already the Queensland Government is having inquiries made as to railway construction to Mount Isa. There is talk of using aeroplanes to have a topographical map made of the locality, and the air service from Charleville, west of Brisbane, is to be extended from Cloncurry to the new field. As matters stand at present there is every appearance that Mount Isa will be rapidly developed along the most modern and efficient lines, very different from the old slow and wearisome struggle which marked the birth of other mining centres.

The Dead Heart.

In 1906 Professor J. W. Gregory published a book on central Australia which he entitled "The Dead Heart of Australia." Apparently he could not have done the country a greater disservice. The phrase passed into an axiom, and doubtless did much to make South Australia stop her railway northwards amongst the inhospitable sand dunes of Odnadatta. It certainly has provided an army of arguments against the building of the north-south railway from Darwin to Odnadatta as embodied in the terms upon which the Commonwealth took over the Northern Territory from South Australia. But others have travelled through central Australia, and adventurous journeys with motor cars and cameras have made the MacDonnell range almost as well known as any part of Australia. For some years past small lots of mica have been sent away, but the heavy cost of camel-carriage to and from Odnadatta has made the business barely profitable. The other day it was announced that the United States would take all the mica offering, and that the Australian mineral was considered exceptionally good. It is clear that the present government is determined to continue the railway from Odnadatta to Alice Springs, a distance of about 1,000 miles. Gold has been found in the mountains of central Australia, but the conditions have been such that no exhaustive prospecting has been possible. Professor Gregory probably only saw "the dead heart" in a time of drought, but since then the reports from travellers are almost invariably of knee-high grass, and flowing rivers through gorges in the ranges which might readily be dammed for irrigation purposes. It is asserted that the Public Works Committee has recommended the building of the railway so quite possibly the matter will come before parliament during the present session. At present the Minister for Works and Railways, Mr. Stewart, is on a tour of inspection of the proposed route of the line, and cabinet will reach a final decision after it has received his report.

Industrial Legislation.

Now that the Labour ministries have been installed in South Australia and Western Australia the Country party is likely to realize what it has accomplished in its selfish pursuit of political power and the gains thereof. If there is one thing that party wishes to accomplish it is the abolition of legal interference in the wages and conditions of work on farms. In others words they object to compulsory arbitration and the making of awards, with the power of enforcement behind them. More particularly do they object to the Commonwealth Arbitration Court having jurisdiction, which the workers' unions play off against their own State industrial courts or wages boards, squeezing each body in turn for better terms. Practically all the States, except Queensland, were at one in trying to meet the views of the primary producers, and various proposals were afoot to simplify the position without altering the constitution. It was to be a matter of mutual arrangement between the Commonwealth and the States, and finality almost appeared to be in sight. Then the Country party with entire oblivion of consequences, due to its political inexperience, pursued a policy of antagonism towards the governments which were trying to give them as much as possible of what they wanted, and placed Labour in power. It is hardly necessary to say that the two new Labour governments will cooperate with Queensland in maintaining the present position, so entirely satisfactory to the rural works. Representative Hill, a leading member of the Victorian Farmers' Union, declared in parliament that the industrial legislation was a baby left on the doorstep of the farmer for him to take care of, and he protested vigorously. Doubtless he re-echoed the feelings of many farmers, but none the less he is quite prepared to repeat in the Federal constituencies the same folly that has destroyed all hope of the baby being taken off the doorstep in South and Western Australia.

Celotex Factory.

It is now definitely settled that a celotex factory is to be erected in one of the sugar districts of Queensland at a cost of £250,000. There is only one factory of the sort in the world, and that is on the banks of the Mississippi. This was started a year or more ago and strange to relate was highly successful and profitable from the outset. Celotex is the trade name given to a thin board, something like what is known as three-ply veneer, and is made out of the megass or bagasse, which is the fibrous part of the sugar cane remaining over after the juices have been pressed out. It is claimed by the Celotex people that the first material shipped to Japan, after the quake, was one million feet of celotex. It is practically fire-proof, and makes excellent lining where a low temperature has to be maintained. The megass is conveyed to the factory in bales, and then pulped and treated very much the same as ordinary timber used for making paper pulp. The American business is sufficiently profitable to make the owners think of importing megass from Cuba, and a second £250,000 is now being sunk in plant. In Queensland the output of megass is about 30,000 tons a year, which would of course make an immense amount of the lumber. If the whole of it could be worked up many thousands of pounds would go into the pockets of the cane producers, while an additional income will soon be obtained by the distillation of the molasses, now wasted, which would yield about 4,000,000 galloes of power alcohol. It is possible that this would be used as a fuel to take the place of the megass, which at present chiefly supplies the sugar will furnaces. Throughout the sugar districts along the Queensland eastern coast the regular monsoonal rains have fallen, and such districts as Bundaberg and Mackay, which for two years have had dry weather and poor crops, at last have cheerful prospects to raise the drooping hearts of the growers.

The Hanging Cure.

The Victorian State government adhered to its determination despite the fiercest of attacks in a section of the press, and the protests of the Trades and Labour Council, and hanged Angus Murray for murder. The case was very simple. A bank manager was making one of his periodical visits to the head office carrying a bag or suit-case in which was a quantity of notes. On the ramp of the suburban station a man met him and demanded the bag. The banker started to draw his revolver when his assailant promptly shot him full in the chest, grabbed the bag and made off up the ramp and to a waiting motor-car. The alarm was quickly raised and pursuit started before the man had reached the car. It was then that Murray appeared and with a revolver threatened the pursuers and held them back, eventually getting away in the car with a driver and the man who had done the shooting. This last man went into "smoke" or concealment, and has not yet been found. The police raised a house where they believed he was and caught Murray instead, and held him as an escaped criminal. After much delay, always in the expectation of getting the other man, Murray was charged with murder, and convicted as being accessory to the fact, and in short a conspirator with the other man to rob with violence if necessary. Because he did not do the actual shooting it was thought that he would not have to suffer the extreme penalty, but he was a notorious criminal, and was actually under sentence for robbery under arms, and had escaped from gaol. The missing man is alleged to have escaped from the country and to have reached the Pacific coast of America, but this may be merely a story put about to induce him to put his nose outside his hiding place. In Sydney the State government has definitely decided to hang the man Williams who cut the throats of his three children in order that they might go to heaven and not develop the taint of insanity which was in their mother. The two cases, as will be seen, are very different in character, and one can hardly believe that the cure should be the same in each.

DANGER IN THE FOUL PIPE

"Tobacco Eye" Unknown To Cigarette Smokers

One of the foremost British opthalmic surgeons, commenting on the reported increase of cases of "tobacco eye," stated that while the complaint might be spreading in local areas, the experience of Harley Street and other specialists was that there was now a considerably smaller number of cases than a few years ago.

Women Who Suffer.

In an interview, he said: "The cause of the disease is undoubtedly the heavy consumption of strong pipe and cigar tobaccos, and the worst and most frequent cases are among habitual foul pipe smokers. There is not a case on record of a cigarette smoker having been affected, and it is significant that the malady is unknown to the Turks.

"Quite a number of instances have been reported from eye institutions and by surgeons of women contracting this form of blindness, and a particularly severe case became known only last week, when the wife of a North of England industrialist came to London to be treated for failing vision.

Red and Green Confused.

"She concealed the fact that she had been a pipe smoker for nearly 30 years, but when tests revealed that her colour perception had become confused and it was impossible for her to recognize red and green, she admitted the life-time addiction to nicotine."

"Tobacco amblyopia," the scientific name of the disease, the specialist added, was invariably distinguishable by loss of eye power followed by a blurring effect when bright objects were looked at, and ultimately by an inability to separate one colour from another, red and green particularly being difficult to discern.

The trouble was very rare among young smokers, but the excessive use of strong tobacco before the age of 30 would make easy victims before middle age was reached.

Complete recovery was possible if the disease was diagnosed and dealt with in its early stages, but the sufferer had to abstain totally from the future use of tobacco. If the affection was allowed to run the effects were serious and permanent, and in a chronic case the victim was scarcely able to find his way in an open roadway.

ESPERANTO scores a victory. Geisha are learning the language at Beppu Hot Springs, hoping that it may help them to converse with visitors from abroad. This is at least an inducement to the visitors to see what the international language is like, remarks the "Japan Chronicle."

BLEACHING THE RED FLAG

I. L. P. Conference at York

BY OUR LABOUR CORRESPONDENT.

Manchester, May 1.

The news value of the 32nd Annual Conference of the Independent Labour Party, held in York last week, was somewhat overshadowed by the more interesting accounts of the opening of the Wembley Exhibition. This diminished advertisement of the party's activities was not unwelcome to some of its leaders. For 31 years they have been denouncing the older political parties' "pettifogging attempts to bolster up a corrupt and oppressive capitalist system," and now, after four months of office, they are somewhat conscious of the notable gap there is betwixt their large professions and their small performances. During the last few months their mocking critics have derived no little amusement from the party leaders' desperate attempts to deflate the high hopes of the rank and file. The once imminent millennium now proves to be as far off as ever. Mr. MacDonald, the idol of the pacifists, has increased the navy instead of disbanding it. The unemployed, who were to be employed on work of national importance, are still on the "dole." Industrial strife is as rife as ever.

The Diet of Words.

As the Government has a predominantly Independent Labour Party complexion, most of its members belonging to that unlovely organization, there has been much curiosity as to the outcome of this year's conference. Would the rank and file tamely accept their leader's apologies for following in the beaten track of history and Coalition predecessors, or would they revolt? Happily for MacDonald a 31 years diet of words has made his followers incapable of expecting anything else. They missed the usual opportunity of passing the usual resolutions, asking the government to do this, that, and the other. Their orators also missed the opportunity of making the customary denunciatory speeches. Unfortunately, the delegates found that when the conference was bereft of its hot air there was very little left. It used to be the seasoning which made the annual hotch-potch palatable. Lacking it, the conference was as tame as a Dorcas meeting.

There were 481 delegates. To the uninitiated this might seem to indicate that the I.L.P. is a numerically vast political organization. As a matter of fact there are only 20,000 paying members, although there are more than 30,000 names on the books. From these figures it will be seen that there are not many more than 40 members for each delegate. If all these members were energetic Socialist propagandists, the I.L.P. might still be a very formidable political organization. They are not. For every worker in a branch there are three hangers-on, who belong to it because it is registered as a club and supplies intoxicating liquors during otherwise prohibited hours. Here they can get beer in congenial company of the "down with everything," variety. The average I. L. Peer is characterized by no passionate love for his fellow man. The bond of brother-hood is a common hatred for the man who is materially a little better off.

A Visit to a Branch.

A fortnight ago we had occasion to visit one of these branches. We desired to purchase one of the invaluable research publications of the Labour Party. It was a flourishing branch boasting more than 300 members, and their club house was a doublefronted shop in the main road of a Manchester industrial area. The windows were painted over, and the shop premises had been converted into a small meeting room at the back of which was a squalid drinking bar. The room above had been converted into a billiard hall.

Asked for the publication we required the potman pointed to a locked glass case containing Socialistic literature, and informed up that the key was in the possession of the "literature secretary," who was not in. The case, it was explained, was kept locked because when it was left open the "comrades pinched the books." Asked for a copy of the "New Leader," the well-known I.L.P. weekly, the same comrade said he hadn't one, and wouldn't give twopence for a dozen of them; a somewhat rancorous criticism of a Socialist periodical that could easily be much worse. We inferred that it was lacking in the "down with it" element. Inquiring about conditions of membership we were informed we could join by signing a short statement of agreement with I.L.P. aims and paying a monthly subscription of a few coppers. A member of the branch informed us that the propagandist activities consisted of one out-door and one indoor meeting every week, open to all comers. The time of the committee, he told us, was more taken up with devising a scheme to prevent the steward and barman embezzling money received for beer, than in planning schemes to convert Manchester to Socialism.

Drunk on Beer and Words.

We attended a meeting the same evening addressed by a local Labour Councillor. The audience numbered about a couple of dozen, and twice during the address stewards were sent upstairs to quiet the clamour of billiard players in the room above, whose quarrels made the speaker inaudible to the stoics who sat through his address. Gloomy as this picture of political squalor may be, it is comparatively bright when contrasted with the rival political clubs in the district. All of them are drinking dens haunted by woolly minded individuals who vary their usual custom of getting drunk on beer by occasionally getting drunk on catch phrases. The only difference between them is the circumstance that the Socialist pays for his billiard tables and chairs out of his own pocket, while the Liberal and Conservative get better ones for nothing from wealthy politicians nursing the constituency.

To get back to the stucco front of the Labour movement and away from its cellars and back entries. Mr. Clifford Allen, the President of the Conference, in his opening address recalled how, a few years ago, Mr. MacDonald was the most hated man in Great Britain and many of his followers were in prison. He doubted if any party had ever progressed so quickly from exile to office. It should, he said, be an encouragement to them and a warning to their opponents. They must, however, now realize that they had entered a new stage. They must adopt a realist outlook. They must realize the limitations imposed on every Government.

Things to Be Passed over.

Not content with pouring this cold douche of water on the delegate's hopes he went on to characterize the Liberals as a party of pacifists, who believed in making war with inadcquate armaments. He discreetly omitted to mention that for the first 31 years of its existence the I.L.P. had been in favour of abolishing the Army and Navy altogether, and had only relinquished that iconoclastic ideal on arrival at Downing Street.

He continued by urging his audience not to become suspicious of the Labour Party because it was taking a few months to prepare the application of its principles to the problem of unemployment. They were engaged in thinking the matter out scientifically, instead of attempting to appease the multitude by hollow pretences. This must have been very discouraging to the Socialist enthusiasts, for it was generally understood that the best minds of the Party had been grappling with the problem since the end of the war.

Yet Labour in office, Mr. Allen said, must not be timid, or its enemies will gain confidence. It had the world at its feet as no other party ever had. National machinery, composed of all the interests concerned, was wanted to watch over and anticipate wage problems and safeguard our national resources. A new morality was required established on a love for scientific truth. To think scientifically and act accordingly was the new morality of the future. The Labour Government could not tackle any of the problems of poverty and unemployment unless they attacked the system that caused them. If anyone were to reap the disaster of attempting unreal temporary measures of alleviation let it be the other people. Their policy was the application of Socialist principles to the reorganization of industry and our economic life.

Contradictions Swallowed.

That the delegates accepted these contradictory statements without protest is sufficient commentary on their limited intelligences, for it is obvious that if the Government is to be realistic it cannot be Socialistic—the other political parties will not permit it. And if it is not to initiate temporary measures of alleviation, it will leave undone the one thing it is able to do. As a matter of fact it is doing this as fast as it can, despite Mr. Allen's warning that it will mean disaster. The whole speech was a clumsy attempt to play up to both the out-and-out Socialists in the I.L.P. and the practical opportunists. As there is no section of the community more adept through long practice at shutting its ears to unpleasant facts than the doctrinaire Socialists of the I.L.P. and their pacifist confreres, it was quite successful.

Mr. MacDonald's contribution to the Conference was an extraordinary statement to the effect that he saw no reason why Labour should not remain in office for two or three years.

Delegates from Birmingham protested against Germany being forced to rebuild the devastated districts in France. That it should have to do so "bolstered up the pretence of Germany's sole guilt for the war," said the mover of the resolution. He received considerable support, despite the fact that it was pointed out to him and his seconder that the German Socialists were against him on this point.

A Pretty Hypocrisy.

The only other debate of interest took place on the problem of disarmament. The motion was that, "the Labour Members in Parliament should oppose all votes of supply for Army, Navy, and Air forces." The I.L.P. have made this a main plank in their political programme for years. Seven years ago, when their own skins were in danger, their unanimity on it was wonderful to witness. All armies were bands of legalized murderers and ought to be disbanded. Now all is different. Conscription is forgotten. Fighting is a job for the other man. To refuse supplies would put the first Labour Government in jeopardy. After a long discussion they soothed their consciences by resolving, "that the I.L.P. should press its disarmament policy on the Government, but allow freedom of action to all members of the Party."

After this pretty piece of hypocrisy the delegates spent the rest of their time in handing bouquets to each other. The only jarring note was struck at the conclusion of the long speech of Mr. Oswald Mosley M.P., the son-in-law of Lord Curzon, and the newest recruit to Labour. The ambitious proletarian element in the Socialist Party is beginning to feel peeved at the way jobs are found for recruits from the Liberal and Conservative parties, while the genuine horny-handed go empty away. Instead of the thunderous applause Mr. Mosley anticipated at the conclusion of his 'testimony' there were cries that this wasn't a lecture room. This exhibition of base ingratitude marked the finish of the tamest I.L.P. Conference that has ever been held. The stalwarts who hoped to see Mr. Ramsey MacDonald stick a red flag out of the first floor window of number 11 Downing Street showed a due appreciation of changed circumstances. They tried to sing the "Red Flag" but the old gusto was gone. If Labour is still in power the 1925 I.L.P. Conference will conclude with "Rule Britannia."

WALK ACROSS CONTINENT AT 74

Detroit, May 2.—John William Walter, 74 years old, was a "guest" of Detroit charitable institutions, after walking from San Francisco to "see Henry Ford about a job." Penniless and without relations in this country, Walter said he had heard of the wonderful possibilities in Detroit and came here.

When asked as to what kind of a job he sought, he replied that he wanted to "talk that over with Henry Ford." Walter said automobilists helped him along the journey. He began his hike Feb. 25 and arrived here yesterday.

Walter was born in Germany and was in San Francisco at the time of the earthquake, when, he says four of his children were killed.

OUR SCOTTISH LETTER

Jock Tamson's Bairns: "Cost of Living Still 12s. 6d. a Bottle": A Chinese Picketed at Wembley

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Edinburgh, Apr. 16.

One of the pleasant things about the Scottish members of Parliament is the spirit of friendship that exists between them, although in their politics they may be widely separated. This, says Parliamentary gossip, is particularly manifested when they find themselves discussing matters relating to Scotland or the Scottish people. On these occasions, as a rule, they are all Jock Tamson's bairns, Scottish debates in the House of Commons usually drive English members out of the Chamber. Only a very few of them seem to be interested in Scottish problems, or else, realizing how successfully the Scotsmen exert their influence on general questions, are fully content to believe they can look after their own affairs. If ever a Southerner does attempt to intervene in a Scottish debate he hears about it.

Members of the Clyde contingent are often among the first, when an M.P. springs a latin or French quotation on the House, to demand a translation, but when they themselves indulge in braid Scots they look with scorn and disdain on anyone who fails to understand. Some of the Scotsmen seem to delight in exaggerating the Doric, greatly to the confusion of the official reporters, and even sometimes to the Speaker, who has more than once admitted his inability to follow some Northern M.P.'s.

The Grippie Aberdonian.

A new literary venture has been made in Scotland, "The Scots Magazine," and it promises well. It aims at meeting the "clamant need for a high-class literary periodical devited entirely to Scotland and things Scottish." Many distinguished Scottish writers figure in the list of contributors, and the contents are pleasingly varied in nature—serious and humorous, historical and fictional. It contains an article by A. M. Williams on the Aberdonian, which contains some titbits which are far too good to be left in the retirement of a mere magazine. We therefore take the liberty of "lifting" some extracts.

The fondness of Glasgow for reflexions on Aberdeen grippiness is explained by a little incident in the history of the city as to which its historians are strangely silent. The contractor for Glasgow Bridge was an Aberdonian, and, after the contract has been completed, the Corporation decided to have a bridge twice as broad. When the contractor was asked how this would affect the cost, he said "Well, naturally a bridge twice as broad will cost twice as much;" and only after the Corporation had agreed to this did it dawn upon them that the wily contractor had done them. Nor was this the end. The bridge was completed well ahead of scheduled time, and the contractor said, "What about it?" The Corporation proposed to take over the bridge right away, but the contractor declined to part with it before the appointed time, and he erected barriers and took tolls!

It has been remarked that we bear with great fortitude the misfortunes of others, and that our own are lightened when others share them. Thus the Aberdonian in Glasgow finds himself in the same condemnation with Fifers and Paisley buddies, and is solaced by the common burden of Glasgow "gagging." He hears Paisley, for instance, chaffed in this way. A man dreamed that he was in a vast wood, where all the trees were bare, when there descended on him a terrible tempest of wind and rain. Sorely buffeted and drenched to the skin, he at last found shelter in a hollow tree, and there quite exhausted fell asleep. When he awoke the storm was past, the sun was shining, the birds were singing, but to his horror he could not get out. Faced with death, he reviewed his bygone life, and in memory went back till he saw himself once again a little boy in Paisley, and, when he recalled that he had been born in Paisley, he felt so small he got out quite easily!

At a funeral as the mourners followed the coffin, the local blacksmith lingered behind and there and then proposed to the buxom widow. "Eh, Tam," she said, "ye're ower late; the jiner spak afore they lifted."

Such events are treated in the North in a matter-of-fact way. One bitter winter day two mourners were in conversation in the kirkyard after a funeral, and one said, "Did ye nottis Mains? He's lookin' afa ill." "Ill!" exclaimed the other, "the man's deein'; the fac is, a winner he thinks it worth his while to gae hame."

The Calumniated Haggis.

The haggis is regarded as fair game for Sassenach humour. The English pretend to believe it is an animal, if not an item of costume, and yet if they were familiar with the classic novels they would have an inventory of its contents at their finger ends. I have just been dipping into the 18th century Smollett, and find that one of his characters—a Welsh squire— described the haggis in detail. "A mess of minced lights, livers, suet, oatmeal, onions, and pepper, enclosed in a sheep's stomach, had a very sudden effect upon mine, and the delicate Mrs. Tabby changed colour; when the cause of our disgust was instantaneously removed at the nod of our entertainer." So writes Smollett's Squire Bramble of the chief of puddings.

Innocent Chinese Blackleg.

Not least, surely among the wonders told us about the building of the new city at Wembley is an incident which is related to me from the history of the strike. When "down tools" was sounded a Chinese was perched high on some scaffolding, engaged in painting the beauties of his land on something larger than a fan. As the rest of the labourers were deserting their work, a great party of them spied this ignorant Celestial busily daubing, and went over to bid him come down at once. He turned round, saw below him a fast and menacing throng of foreign devils who shouted at him in strange words; and, without waiting to satisfy himself about details, he slid down a ladder and made for the East. He was last seen (from Wembley) rapidly disappearing over the oriental horizon.

By the Way.

It was a debate on the index figures of the Board of Trade, and a Scot present closed the matter with the remark, "Official figures or no official figures, the cost of living remains at 12s. 6d. a bottle."

Sir Robert Horne lectured on one occasion from his father's pulpit. A lady expressed the opinion to his sister that "if he had his father's brains and his mither's tongue he widna be last." This remark has remained in Sir Robert's mind—so he told some friends the other night. For Scottish economy in praise and carefulness of statement it would, he thinks, be hard to beat.

Speaking at a recent dinner, a well-known Sheriff, in referring to modern tendencies, said he had heard of one man who had caught the habit of saying, "I am getting younger and younger." He said this so often that at last he turned into a brewery.

An Aberdonian told me this story the other day. A golfer from the Granite City had arranged for a day's golf away from home. On arriving at his destination the Aberdonian found that owing to weather conditions golf was impossible. He, therefore, determined to take a look round the town, but did not like the idea of carrying his golf clubs about with him. He was much perturbed at the idea of leaving his clubs in the left-luggage office at the railway station, because of the large charge of 3d. A bright idea struck him. He went to the pawnshop across the road, pledged his clubs for half-a-crown, returned in the evening, paid the extra halfpenny and redeemed them, and thus saved 2½d.

SUBMARINE K 26, the biggest submarine in the world, with a tonnage of 2,300, recently arrived in Bombay harbour on a testing cruise under tropical conditions. While on her outward voyage in the Red Sea she encountered the pilgrim ship Frangestan, which was then burning furiously. After standing by 24 hours, Commander Thomson received orders to sink her, as she was a danger to navigation.

OUR PARIS LETTER

Rumanian Royal Visit: Nation Encircled by Foes: a Map of Columbus's Day

From Our Own Correspondent.

Paris, April 30.

It was [illegible] Queen of Rumania, who arrived in Paris to-day on the first official visit they have paid to any foreign capital since the war, should have a very cordial reception. Parisians have not forgotten that the King, though a Hohenzollern, refused to join in the great conspiracy of 1914, and that the Queen, in addition to being a beautiful woman, rendered any amount of personal service during the war. At the present moment, too, France and Rumania are drawn closer than ever by the unfriendly attitude which two other Latin States, Italy and Spain, have taken up towards Rumania. This attitude has led to the abandonment of the visits which the King and Queen were to have paid to Rome and Madrid, and ostensibly Rumania remains on good terms with only France, England and Belgium. She needs both financial and political support, in view of her relations with Russia.

The maintenance of the treaties signed after the war is of vital importance to her. She is surrounded by enemies all on the look-out to recover what they were obliged to surrender to her. Hungary had to give her Transylvania, Austria ceded Bukovina, Bulgaria made restitution of the Dobrudscha, and finally Bessarabia was separated from Russia and given to Rumania. Though the province is chiefly populated by Rumanians, the Soviets have never agreed to the cession. Chicherin made a vehement protest when the French Parliament ratified the convention. He uses the Bessarabia question as a permanent grievance and a means of putting his word into international debates. It is very likely that, for the sake of peace, Rumania would pass over the behaviour of the Bolsheviks in keeping the gold and jewels, worth £40,000,000, which King Ferdinand sent to Moscow, for safety as he thought, at the time of the invasion of his country by the Germans and Austrians. The Soviets can pick a quarrel with Rumania whenever they please over the Bessarabia question, and there can be no security for Rumania without some definite pledges from her Western allies, in addition to such reliance as she may be able to place on the other members of the Little Entente. As M. Duka, the Rumanian Minister for Foreign Affairs, is accompanying his sovereign, it may be taken for granted that, in the intervals between public appearances and official festivities, the situation will be very thoroughly discussed and decisions taken which may have great influence on the future of Europe.

The General Election.

Large boards placed outside the town-halls and other public buildings in France give the first warning of the general election, which is to take place in the middle of next month. These boards are intended for the coloured posters on which candidates of all shades of opinion announce the great reforms they will strive to bring about if they are elected, and indulge in withering sarcasms against their adversaries. Once upon a time the bill-stickers were allowed to plaster these proclamations over every bit of wall from which they were not specifically warned off by "Defense d'afficher" painted in big letters and followed by a threatening allusion to the law which would be invoked in case of need. Even the Louvre and the historic churches of Paris shared in their disfigurement, and as it was nobody's business to remove the posters when they had served their purpose, they hung in a torn and bedraggled condition for months after the election was over. A special Act of Parliament had to be passed before the nuisance could be stopped, and election placards are now confined to the boards provided for them at the expense of the taxpayers. The law still requires them to be printed on coloured paper, white being reserved for official announcements. The practice of leaving placards exposed much too long is by no means confined to the election period. In the "tube" stations one frequently sees theatre and concert posters that are weeks out of date.

A Map of Columbus.

A map of the world, apparently recording Christopher Columbus's notions of geography on the eve of the discovery of the American continent, has been accidentally discovered in the National Library in Paris by M. de La Roncière, which [illegible] the King of Egypt [illegible] to Africa [illegible] Middle Ages. [illegible] classified as a Portuguese document of the 16th century when he happened to notice that, though the outline of the African coast as far as the Cape of Good Hope, discovered in 1488, was shown, there was no mention of the results of Columbus's voyage in 1492, which would certainly have been included if the map had been drawn in the sixteenth century. M de La Roncière further observed that the name of the Cape Verde islands was written not in Portuguese but in Italian. A note on the map mentioned that these islands were first located by a Genoese. The place of Genoa on the map was marked by an excellent sketch of the harbour, and Seville was indicated by a drawing of the Giralda. M. de La Roncière concludes that the map must have been the work of a Genoese who knew Spain. The handwriting strongly resembles that of notes signed by Christopher Columbus. Though there is no such thing as certainty in these matters, it seems reasonable to suppose that the map was the work either of Columbus himself or of his brother Bartolomew.

Exit the Bare Arm.

"No more bare arms" is the latest ukase of the Paris fashion dictators, who have made up their minds that, for the time being, only evening frocks are to be worn without sleeves. This was clearly demonstrated on Sunday, when Longchamp began another spring racing season and gave an opportunity for a remarkable display of the latest dress novelties. The mannequins' parade showed that the really chic walking costume is characterized by simple lines and elaborate embroidery. A dress which stood out as the most prominent specimen of the new style was in black. With closely fitting sleeves down to the wrist and frills hanging over the hand, and with its plainly pleated skirt, it would have been almost too severe but for its tunic of many colours. The tunic, which was white, was embroidered almost like a tapestry with a floral design in red, gold and purple.

With different colour combinations, this kind of frock was certainly in the majority, but all, without exception, had long sleeves. The hats were all of the small cloche type. They were mostly of fine woven straw and of the brightest of hues. The scarlet hat so fashionable two years ago was to be seen on all sides. Red is certainly one of the colours most favoured for scarves, ribbons and all forms of dress ornament. Many of the straw hats seen at Longchamp were gay with flower trimmings, such as pink roses and marigolds, and there were others with long ribbon streamers, some weighted with roses like those on the hat—a pretty novelty, very becoming when used with discretion but probably destined to be overdone.

LEGAL LIGHT ON SOLOMON

One has long suspected that some of the most famous legal decisions of history, or fiction, or drama would not stand the test of the modern Court of Appeal; and here is Judge Parry, in his introduction to a book of famous trials, ("The Drama of the Law") not merely confirming that suspicion, but questioning even the most famous judgment of Solomon himself.

It was the case about a baby, claimed by two mothers; and Solomon, you will remember, settled it, at least to his own satisfaction, by calling for a sword and proposing to divide the baby equally between the suitors. It was the willingness of the real mother to be non-suited if "he would in no wise slay it" that enabled Solomon to arrive at his decision as to the real ownship of the infant.

To-day "these Grand Guignol effects are frowned upon in the highest judicial circles." But at the time the effect of the case was to gain for Solomon a great reputation. Israel Judge Parry remarks liked the sporting character of the judgment; "but in fairness to our own judges, many of whom are probably at least as good as Solomon, we should remember that under the modern rules and procedure of our Courts any such judgment to-day would be reversed in the Court of Appeal on the ground that the alleged mother's last statement was [illegible] evidence."

From a strictly legal as well as [illegible] point of view, Judge Parry [illegible] more interested for the Trial Scene in "The Merchant of Venice" [illegible] does so on the [illegible] that legally Antonio is a contemptible character; "for what can be more insignificant than a judgment debtor who who has run his head into bankruptcy by signing a deed without the advice of his solicitor? You cannot make a hero of such a one."

And, discussing the Trial Scene, Judge Parry declares that the Duke, as acted by Henry Howe, is "a judge after the Chancellor's own heart," though:—

> At one moment he puts your heart into your mouth and you think the whole trial may suddenly collapse when he tries to settle the case and asks Shylock, "How shalt thou hope for mercy, rendering none?" Had Shylock jumped at this idea, and taken the opportunity to withdrawn a juror there would have been no trial. . . . The audience breathe freely when they hear Shylock, a typical obstinate plaintiff, decide to go on with the case, sure of victory, and determined to ask for costs on the higher scale.

As for those who have blamed Shakespeare for allowing Portia—a brilliant young "special" from the Padua bar—to talk bad law, and the judge to act upon it, Judge Parry declares it was just what would have happened.

> Here we have a judge of first instance: the court itself I take to be some kind of Quarter Sessions Court, and very likely the Duke is the unpaid chairman. Had the counsel been a member of the local bar he would have advised the court that Shylock was in right. But down comes this brilliant young "special" from Padua, backed with a letter from old Bellario—the battonnier of the Italian joint authority. What, I ask you, could the Duke do but listen to it with grave outward respect?

None of the many famous cases in real life recalled by Judge Parry—interesting as they all are as examples of drama—is more interesting than his reconstruction of the famous case of Shylock v. Antonio.

GREAT MATHEMATICAL GENIUS

A Mental Marvel and a Vegetarian

Mr. Somesh Chandra Bose, the great Hindu ascetic and 'Mental Wizard' whose genius and mental marvel created a sensation in England, America and France returned after 22 months, to Calcutta, recently. The "Pioneer" admitted the Hindu genius as a 'human calculating machine.'

In one of his exhibitions in New York, Mr. Bose multiplied two numbers of 60 digits each in 45 minutes. The answer proved to be correct, although those who worked out the problem on paper laughed but turned out to be in error. Some of his records go to prove that he worked out a cube root of 18 digits in 2 sec., 5th root of 16 digits in 2 sec. and 7th roof of 35 digits in 3 sec.

In Paris Mr. Bose was asked by a Professor of Mathematics to find out the total number of seconds from December 24, 1873, up to 10 a.m. of February 26, 1924, the answer of which he declared, to the surprise of all present, only in 27 sec.

He astonished the doctors by living only on milk and occasionally on pea-nuts and grapes and thereby gaining in weight and he had no sickness for the last 22 months.

Mr. Lloyd George, while sailing from U. S. was, we were informed, 'mysteriously followed by an Indian' and this man as has been admitted by the "World" was Mr. Somesh Ch. Bose the Hindu 'Mathematical marvel.' He was not allowed to sail on the same ship with Mr. Lloyd George as he was alleged to have chased Mr. Lloyd George throughout his American trip and was regarded as a 'dangerous person' to travel in the same ship with Mr. Lloyd George.—"Servant."

A RELIC OF 1874

First British Locomotive

"It is announced that the first locomotive ever made in England is to be sold," says the "Daily Telegraph." "This is the steam carriage which William Murdock built, about 1784, at Redruth. What it was like the curious may see from the copy at South Kensington. The original now for sale was long exhibited in the Birmingham Art Gallery. It is a little thing, driven by what was called a grasshopper engine, because its beam action was supposed to resemble the kick of the insect.

"Murdock and his friends were much impressed when it would 'travel a mile or two' and he could 'make it carry the fire-shovel, poker, and tongs.' He tried it by night on a smooth path leading to Redruth church, and it shot away from him, and the vicar and his wife coming home in the dark were much alarmed to see 'some mysterious object snorting and zigzagging' in front of them.

"This was not indeed, the first locomotive ever built. Isaac Newton had a notion of one in the 17th century. Cugnot, a French military engineer, built one in 1763. Murdock had the advantage of the work of Watt in developing the steam engine, for he was in the service of the great Boulton and Watt firm, and it was while looking after the many pumping engines which the Soho works built for the Cornish mines that he made his locomotive. It might have been supposed that holding an important post in the employ of men who were eminent for inventive genius and practical ability, Murdock would have the best opportunities for making the most of his invention.

"We cannot accuse either Boulton or Watt of prejudices against new ideas. It seems almost incredible that the men who had had so large a share in the transformation of industry by the application of steam power should have been blind to the possibilities of applying their steam engines to locomotion. There is hardly a more striking instance of the limitations within which even far-sighted and able minds are bound.

"For Boulton and Watt did everything in their power to discourage Murdock. It was not that the employer wished to have the profit of the employee's inventions, or that the employer resented the employee giving his time to private affairs. For they made no difficulty about assisting him in his other great invention, the use of coal gas for light. They were simply unable to believe there was any future for steam carriages. Watt is found wishing Murdock 'could be brought to do as we do, to mind the business in hand, and let such as Symington and Sadler throw away their time and money hunting shadows."

SIR AUCKLAND GEDDES

From Diplomacy to Business

Sir Auckland Geddes, who early this year resigned his post as Ambassador to the United States, which he had held for three years, has entered business life, having become a director of the Liverpool, London, & Globe Insurance Company. Sir Auckland, whose tenure of office at Washington covered the Washington Conference and the Anglo-American debt settlement, suffered from ill-health during his last year in America, his eyesight being seriously affected. When he returned to England he said that he would have a few months' rest before taking up any new work, and his health is now fully restored.

Sir Auckland was one of the War Ministers. He was Professor of Anatomy at McGill University, Montreal, when the War broke out, entered the army (he had held a commission in the Highland Light Infantry in the South African War), and rose to be Brigadier General in charge of recruiting, 1916-17. He then joined the Government as Minister of National Service, became successively President of the Local Government Board, Minister of Reconstruction in 1919, and President of the Board of Trade. In 1920 he was appointed Principal of McGill University, and the same year went to Washington as Ambassador.

His brother, Sir Eric Geddes, also left politics for business after the fall of the Coalition Government.

THE TRUTH ABOUT BORES

I have for long suspected, and I now am satisfied, that the bore [illegible] with guilty knowledge, that [illegible] accepted here well knows himself to be such, and, indeed, derives [illegible] perverted form of pleasure [illegible] witnessing the havoc which his [illegible] pearance creates.

I was watching, from an armchair in the smoking-room at the Eleet to-day, the entry of our recognized bore, and I realized that as he swam into the room, slowly turning his head from right to left in search of a victim, there was definite blood lust in his eyes. The havoc he caused was no more than normal, but undoubtedly he was enjoying every moment of it.

Major-Gen. Blunderbuss, whose eyes were momentarily disengaged in the act of raising his glass of sherry, crashed the glass down untasted, and hid himself behind a copy of the "Architectural Gazette" that lay handy. Old Sir Ferdinand Tawny, who has not set his left foot to the ground for three decades, abandoned his stick and favourite armchair and covered the distance to the door in level time. Lord Broadacres realizing too late his isolated and vulnerable position, had no time to make a plan, and it was instinct which prompted him in the nick of time to seize a Bradshaw and call loudly to a passing waiter for a telegraph form. Its arrival enabled him to break away.

The Egoist

A bore is, of course, nothing but an egoist, one who believes that his affairs, his views, his voice are supremely and universally worth hearing. He is not of necessity without brains.

A wrangler, an inventor, an explorer of forbidden Tibet may be, and often is, a bore. A man who has a story to tell becomes a bore if in the telling he cannot divorce his own ego from the fact or news-item he has to relate. That is why we are all of us capable of boring our friends—because in moments of self-pity (following influenza) our ego swells and dwarfs our cosmos. The recognized or throttling bore is one whose ego looks down, a menacing, permanent Albert Memorial, on a square no bigger than a backyard.

Golf is a selfish game; success depends very largely on your own efforts. That is why golf shop is always boring. Roulette shop, on the other hand, may be quite the reverse. On the whole the crown of boredom is reserved for those sportsmen who tell you about the lions they have shot and those snobs who tell you about the lions they have met.

After dinner speakers are bores, almost to a man. The reason, I think, is that after dinner speeches appear to demand anecdotes, and anecdotes are gone out of fashion. Gone, too, is the patient endurance that enabled human beings to sit for long periods on a hard dining-room chair. The race of listeners is indeed emasculated. Gone are the heroes of old who listened to Macaulay and applauded Sydney Smith, or even Chauncey Depew. The American expert public diner is beginning to find his best market closing to him.

Guilty Knowledge

People are apt to class stupid or uninspired persons as bores This is wrong. The bore is invariably active, the test being the existence of guilty knowledge. Whether or not stupidity, which is largely preventable, should be punished with imprisonment, I am not prepared to say. About 80 per cent. of the population of these islands are criminally stupid. The bore, however, should unquestionably be punished with death, and the bodies of the criminals should be handed over to hospitals for scientific research. These would yield on dissection (in addition to the abnormally enlarged egos) a great quantity of the thickest hide, which could be put to a variety of useful commercial purposes.

It is a bitter reflection that sufficient vitality and driving force to ensure life success to half-a-dozen normal persons must go to the making of every bore. If the bore were not an incurable criminal, some form of Borstal treatment for young offenders might be attempted. I well remember such an attempt. . . but I fear I bore you.

BRITISH EMPIRE EXHIBITION OPENING

Wonderful Spectacle: The Scene at the Stadium: Radio Triumph: King's Speech Heard by Millions: Truly British Ceremony

By Hugh Martin in the "Daily News."

There are various ways of saying "How British!" and we heard them all at Wembley.

There is the way foreign visitors were saying it when they saw for the first time the restraint and solidity—what we are pleased to call the dignity—of much of the architecture. It was said with a kind smile. There is the way they said it when they had had time to appreciate the marvellous variety and astonishing richness of the contents of this Empire Store—the way in which you speak about a very able business man.

Magnificent Setting.

And there is the way they said "How British!" at the Stadium when, towards the close of an hour's pageantry, they had begun to glimpse, through the perfection and gravity of great ceremonial, that spirit of self-confident reserve, of purposeful endeavour, of instinctive selection and omission which is of the essence of the national character.

This opening in the Stadium stuck me as wonderful, largely because of what it left out. Like the Exhibition itself, it was scornful of mere drama.

It said what it had to say plainly, powerfully, cleanly. Power was the keynote. Anyone is entitled to prefer style to power, but nobody is entitled to demand that power shall also be "stylish," Beautiful it can be through control, and here we had the very perfection of that beauty.

The concrete Stadium might have been designed to demonstrate power, and the Army, which had charge of the arrangements, made exactly the right use of its theatre.

Climbing to my seat just before half-past ten, I looked down upon an oval of green lawn so smooth, and, even under the grey sky, so brilliant, that it might have been a stage backcloth. Round it a broad, spotless cinder-track, with amphitheatre seats and terraces sloping up from the outer edge.

Scarlet, Purple and Gold.

Already many tens of thousands must have been present. To the right, at the far end of the oval, facing the Royal Dais, a prodigious bank of white surplices, enclosing a lake of scarlet, was evidently the massed choirs, with their accompanying military band. The conductor had a tall red pulpit down on the cinder track.

The canopied dais itself, severe in outline, struck one as incredibly brilliant considering the lack of sunshine. Just scarlet, purple and gold; no flummery of ornament, but a massive crown above the centre. Two thrones below the crown, vacant as yet, and the gilt chairs around rapidly filling with all sorts of important personages, top-hatted, turbanned, uniformed, frock-coated, even lounge-suited.

Yeomen of the Guard, in scarlet and gold—portentous, mediæval—were on a sort of apron stage. Gentlemen-at-Arms, in plumed hats, stood beside the thrones. Then to right and left of the dais soldiers and police, in all colourings of skin, from the Dominions and Colonies. Dim memories of Queen Victoria's Diamond Jubilee, when the Empire, as we know it, was still almost a novelty, came floating, a trifle pathetic, curiously questioning. . .

And from the high ranges of the amphitheatre another questioning—the starling-chatter of thousands of school children who will live to help write another chapter of Empire history which we elders should very much like to read.

The youngsters had a great time all the morning. Their cheering was a tonic. Nothing mechanical about it, but the sheer joy of delight in a jolly spectacle.

At half-past ten to the second the programme opened, and thrillingly, too. Say what you like about the bagpipes, they do stir the blood. Just as their white-spatted feet touched the track the kilted pipers of the Scots and Irish Guards loosed wailing music on the air and swung off playing round the arena. Immediately behind came the massed bands of the Brigade of Guards —Scots, Irish, Welsh, Coldstream, and Grenadier—in scarlet coats and mountainous busbies.

Back to Childhood.

Forming up across the greensward, six lines deep facing the dais, they began to play when the pipers had ceased, and they played all that vast multitude back into childhood and beyond. Surely they played tears into more eyes than mine with their "Voice of the Guns" and their "On to Victory." "Thank God," you felt sure a great many from every corner of the Empire were saying to themselves, this is just a show; we'll never hear them play like that again for the boys marching away. . . ."

Presently they played—in the Guards of Honour—the Navy with "Hearts of Oak," the Marines with "Life on the Ocean Wave," the Army with "British Grenadiers," the Air Force with "The Royal Air Force March."

Five drum-majors stood before them as they played, and the trombones—in and out! in and out!—were a front line right across the Stadium, and the men marched just as stiffly as toy soldiers ought to, and the conductor conducted by nodding his bearskin like abaton, and the children danced with delight, and all of us would have liked to do the same. What a lark! If this is Empire let's have more and more of it! Come and play at soldiers, you Britishers, from all the ends of the earth!

A mulberry-coloured motor-car, driving slowly round the track at ten minutes past eleven, brings us back from the land where there are no internal combustion engines.

The Prince of Wales is in the car, so it raises a wind of cheering as it half-circles and comes to a halt before the still-empty thrones. All the wooden soldiers and sailors, line upon line along the emerald turf, spring to life for a moment, saluting; then are wood again.

THE KING'S ARRIVAL

Roar of Welcome from Vast Gathering.

Next, seven golden-coated trumpeters on seven tall horses, entering abreast, take up the tale, blowing a ringing fanfare on seven silver trumpets. They are announcing the approach of the King and Queen. Everything moves like clockwork; the outriders are in the Stadium at 11.25 precisely.

Three State coaches drawn by four chestnuts apiece come first; then a dozen Horse Guards caracoling on black chargers, and—to a roar that goes round and across the amphitheatre—King George and Queen Mary, with the Duke of York and Prince Henry, all in a great pink-satin-lined coach, swaying behind a team of six postillioned bays.

The flutter of handkerchiefs is like foam on the crest of a great wave rolling with leisured stateliness along the Stadium cliff, booming as it goes.

Though they are mere midgets in this stupendous setting we can just see that the King is in Admiral's uniform and the Queen in silver grey, with her gloved hand on a grey rolled-up parasol. What a picture if the sun had been shining; but still, what a picture!

King and Queen pass to their Thrones. The Commonwealth of Nations stands at attention. The Royal Standard bellows heavily out from the masthead.

President's Greeting.

Welcome to the King in the name of the Exhibition has been extended by the Prince of Wales, its President, and now we hear the Prince's voice, prodigiously magnified by the five megaphones in the turret above his head, but unmistakably his down to the smallest detail of enunciation.

He points out to the King that here at Wembley is to be found "a complete and vivid picture of all your Empire," which should suggest to the world that "the most powerful agency of civilisation has its heart set upon peaceful aims and the good of mankind."

The King's voice in reply is louder still, and every word must be as clearly heard by each one of the multitude as though the two were together in a small room.

Again, there is not the smallest distortion in the vocalisation, nor is there any appreciable echo, at any rate at my point of hearing.

A characteristic passage runs:

> Co-operation between brothers for the better development of the family estate can hardly fail to promote family affection, and we hope further that the success of the Exhibition may bring lasting benefits not to the Empire only but to mankind in general.

While he reads, the King emphasises each noteworthy phrase with a vigorous beat of hand and arm, tiny gestures seen from far off that contrast quaintly with the giant voice.

Bishop's Prayer.

The Bishop of London prays:

> As we have mastered nature that we might gain wealth, help us to master the social relations of mankind that we may gain justice and a world of brothers. Make us determined to live by truth, and to found our common life on the eternal foundations of righteousness and love.

He then says the Lord's Prayer, audible to all with the help of this mastery of nature about which he has just spoken.

The singing by the massed church choirs of Blake's "Jerusalem" is most beautiful, and remarkably near vocal perfection, considering the physical difficulties. You can even catch, across the arena's huge space, the words:

> I will not cease from mental fight,
> Nor shall my sword sleep in my hand,
> Till we have built Jerusalem
> In England's green and pleasant land.

Salute of the Guns.

Afterwards the King, with no word that is audible, opens the Exhibition. A fanfare of trumpets, the first thunder of a salute of 21 guns, fired outside, the breaking of the Union Jack and the Dominion and Colonial flags from 300 flagstaffs, and the enterprise is launched upon its career.

On the greensward the massed bands of the Guards are executing stately manœuvres, with mathematical precision, to their own music, first "trooping" the Colours slowly, then quickly—a fascinating stage show.

Messenger Boy Who Delighted the Crowd.

While they march and play there is an incident that delights the crowd.

A uniformed telegraph messenger enters the Stadium and walks across the arena to where the King is seated, 200 yards away. A trying ordeal, but the lad goes through with it bravely and delivers his message to the King in person. There is great laughter and clapping as he returns, and near the great doors he breaks into a run, to everyone's delight.

The message was a cable sent round the world by the King himself, and it girdled the globe in 1 minute 20 seconds!

The wording simply ran: "I have this moment opened the British Empire Exhibition," and it had been handed in by an equerry at the Stadium Post Office.

Now we can see a figure in green —Miss Thomas, daughter of the Colonial Secretary—advance to the Queen and present her with a bouquet, following which the King is presented with a gold model of the globe. Then there are presentations on the dais, among them those of four workmen (Messrs. Mortimer, Lowth, Sheddon, and Meale) who have done fine service in getting the exhibition ready.

There follows more good music—Elgar's "Imperial" march by the massed bands; the same composer's "Land of Hope and Glory," by the massed choirs; and finally, "Rule, Britannia," as the King and Queen drive out.

A finely conceived and finely executed ceremony, British through and through, and proud of it!

NIGHT SCENES

Amusement Park First Favourite: Flood Light

The Canada building stands out to-night in a glory of flood light—a massive and noble building seen from across the lake. It is the only building which is lighted by the flood light, which later will illuminate the principal palaces in the grounds.

The avenues are lighted by pale blue arc lamps, but it would be untrue to say that to-night the grounds are brilliant.

In the Amusement Park some of the side shows are carrying on without lights at all, and there are dark roads and corners where you pick your way warily over uneven ground.

Far From Crowded.

There are several thousand people in the grounds to-night, but the Exhibition was far from being crowded. It is not possible to give exact figures, but I understand that up to 4 o'clock this afternoon only 75,000 people had paid to come through the turnstiles.

The crowd in the Stadium this morning is estimated at 50,000 most of whom probably passed through the gate and not the turnstiles. To this should be added a few more thousand visitors this evening, bringing the total to well over 100,000.

This is far from breaking a record, but the explanation may be found in the fact that most people know that the exhibition is hardly ready and prefer to arrange their visit for a later date, when things are rather more under way.

A amusement Park has been the best patronized section tonight.

The dance hall opened at 7 o'clock and was well filled by 9 o'clock. The only spectacular amusement in full swing was a roundabout.

Electric Car Tour.

I boarded an electric car, driven by a very polite young man, who took an obvious delight in his new job, and drove through the Amusement Park. There were many promenaders, but little to amuse them.

The crowds in the Palace of Engineering and the Palace of Industry were rather disappointed. There were too many empty spaces. But we can afford to overlook that; it will all be remedied in a day or two.

The crowds themselves were full of interest. Here and there you met Indians and obvious Colonials.

No one need fear any difficulty in the matter of transport. The railways and bus companies dealt with to-day's crowds with ease; and although Messrs. Lyons have not opened all their numerous restaurants they were able to-day to serve over 80,000 meals.

NIGHT TURNED INTO DAY

What Selenium May Accomplish in the Near Future

"If anyone were to strike a match on the moon, we could discover the fact on earth by means of selenium, even with out a telescope. And that feat could be accomplished in one second."

That is one of the many extraordinary powers of selenium revealed by Dr. E. E. Fournier D'Albe, an international authority on the subject, in The Moon Element: An Introduction to the wonders of Selenium.

Dr. Fournier d'Albe thinks that an instrument may be devised on the basis of the properties of selenium, which will, in effect, turn the night into day so far as visibility is concerned.

During the war, the author, in conjunction with Mr. Grindell Matthews, constructed a motor-boat which was controlled by means of a searchlight.

Before Lord Fisher, Mr. (now Lord) Balfour and leading experts this motor-boat was manœuvred on the Penn Pond, in Richmond Park, in December, 1915. For the first time the author tells how, obedient to the beam of light, the boat careered about the pond.

The day after the test Mr. Grindell Matthews received a deposit of £25.000 from the Government.

STATUE OF WILLIAM BLACKSTONE

American Gift to London

It is announced that a statue of William Blackstone, whose famous "Commentaries on the Laws of England" is still a standard legal work, is to be erected in London.

Blackstone was born in London in 1723. and the statue is the gift of America, whose laws have been founded on his "Commentaries." The design and execution of the statue have been entrusted to Mr. Paul W. Bartlett, the well-known American sculptor, who is now engaged upon the work in his Paris studio. The statue is to be in bronze, and, including the base of plinth, will be eight feet in height, the figure of Blackstone being life size.

So far no decision has been reached in regard to the site of the statue, which it is hoped will be publicly unveiled next July, when the conference of American, Canadian, and English lawyers will be held in London.

The American Committee responsible for the scheme comprises all the living ex-Presidents of the American Bar Association, with the Chief Justice of the United States, Mr. William Howard Taft, as Chairman.

MISS HO TUNG IN LONDON

Her Gown That Is Summer: A Girl of Modern China

Miss Mary Ho Tung, a slender and fascinating representative of China's modern young womanhood, has come to London with her parents, Sir Robert and Lady Ho Tung, for the opening of the Empire Exhibition, writes a London correspondent.

Sir Robert's title was conferred in 1915 in recognition of his educational and patriotic work in Hongkong.

Sir Robert is the son of Ho Si-man, and has been described as one of the greatest and most generous of merchant princes.

Miss Ho Tung powders her pretty nose just as we do. She wears drop earrings, jade beads, and French heels. But she prefers the somewhat austere Chinese national costume to our London and Paris fashions.

Under Lady Ho Tung's advice, however, Miss Mary bought a hat, her first—in Hongkong—"to 'do as Rome does' when I arrived in London," she laughingly explained to me.

"It hurts my head, so I do not intend to wear it any more.

"Father likes me to wear Chinese costumes," Miss Ho Tung added, in her nicely-pronounced English.

"The Very Latest."

Presently this almond-eyed maid of the Orient came tripping down the stairs of the very Occidental house that Sir Robert has taken at Northwood, carrying the tray of her quite 1924 travelling trunk.

"That one I should wear to a dinner party, perhaps," she said, fingering an exquisite satin in soft deep blue, lightly patterned.

"But this," she exclaimed, "is the very latest"—showing a wonderful Chinese silk patterned and coloured like an English flower-garden in midsummer, even including the butterflies and blue sky.

"Shall I put it on for you?" was the next rather surprising question.

Miss Ho Tung took exactly 20 minutes to change into the "function frock" of China.

With it went black high-heeled slippers and fine silk stocking, and I noticed that pearl earrings and a little fresh powder had been added to complete the effect.

"At My Wedding."

The costume (like the half-dozen others) was made in the regulation jacket style, with an inch-and-a-half collar-band and a three-quarter-length kimono sleeve.

The (separate) skirt was 1¾ yards round the hem.

"We do not wear low neck and sleeveless dresses in China," said Miss Ho Tung.

"But some of our young women have bobbed their hair, some smoke cigarettes, and most of us love modern dancing."

Miss Ho Tung wears a beautiful solitaire diamond engagement ring.

"I want to wear white on my wedding day—like London girls," she said.

"Of course our mothers-in-law prefer scarlet or pink for brides, because white is worn at funerals in our country.

"My fiancé studied engineering and architecture in London University, and"—this shyly—"he proposed in the European way——

"Yes, I shall wear white for my wedding!" she decided.

THE GREAT DECISION

Sermon Preached to the S.V.C. in Holy Trinity Cathedral, Shanghai, by the Rev. A. N. Rowland, on May 18, 1924

"Choose ye this day Whom ye will serve." Josh. 24. 15.

There is nothing that searches a man more closely than the appeal for moral decision, and nothing that satisfies him better when he has made his answer. But can it be [illegible] made up his mind in religion seeing there are so many conflicting claims, so many churches and doctrines, such a variety of standards and standpoints? What can a man do with all these. Why should he not wait until the churches are agreed, and the controversies settled and all Christians perfect. And meantime drift? There is a better answer than that. Let a man put all these questions on one side, and concentrate on the one issue that really matters. "Choose Whom ye will serve." It is a personal loyalty that makes religion a reality.

In the Cambridge Boat that broke the spell of Oxford's victories just before the war half the crew were keen Christian men, and one of them was Kenneth Gordon Garnett. Mountaineer and mathematician, a man of unusual gifts and charm, he won the M.C. and the Croix de Guerre and fell in 1917. In a brief memoir of him it is written "He hero-worshipped his Lord and had no doubts or difficulties about doc- [illegible] sonal loyalty and your particular learning may settle themselves.

[illegible] there may be a hundred standpoints on the rim of a wheel, but all on one axis, and so the old waggon moves on. That is just how the world advances. Its future rests on [illegible] various standpoints but are all related to Christ by faith and obedience, loyalty and service, which may be called the spokes of the wheel. Decision for Christ fixes your life on its true centre, makes you part of the wheel that can carry the burden, and makes you capable of bearing the strain. Whether God gives you much or little to carry, whether your load be one of responsibility or obedience, opposition, loss or success, life cannot buckle or break if it rests on Christ. "Choose Whom ye will serve."

II

I suppose in the long run we all admit this. There is not a man who would say it is not true, but many act as if it were not urgent, and plan for a "good time" first. But who told us our life would be long, or if it were that we should retain our present powers of weighing things? The passing of time does not leave us unchanged, and we have to pay out for all experience. [illegible] "Choose Whom ye will serve." It is a personal loyalty that makes religion a reality.

A brilliant French book published just before the war tells of a young officer who was sick of the "good time" he had extracted for himself from the pleasures of Paris, and he took up a command in the French provinces of North Africa, where he was confronted with Mohammedanism and its mark on social life. The thought pursued and at last captured him that he, as an officer of the French army, was representative of a Christian flag and a Christian standard, and he must change his heart and his ways and he was to fulfil his trust. It is a burning thought for us who have come from Christian homes to a non-Christian land.

III

One glance at the last word before I have done. "Choose Whom ye will serve. God's will is a service. Salvation in the Christian sense is not securing a berth for heaven, but as John Masefield put it, it means "to brother all the souls on earth." I leave the distinction sharp because it is a heresy to put the gospel selfishly. Whatever we are rescued from—and only God knows that, our mind is to be on things above as a power for things in front, that we may serve our day and generation with all that Did you read of the cadets that were recently put on board a ship by the Chinese Government, that they might learn good seamanship under foreign direction and become of service to their country? They refused to keep time in their rowing or to haul up the boat until they had had their chow. "We came on board to be "captain,'" replied those young men, "not to take orders but to give them," and they went on in their contemptible way. And by contrast we think of "His Majesty's Service" with its traditions and discipline and responsibility which are the pride of our race. We think again of the feudal motto under which our monarchy has come to its place of security and honour—"Ich dien"—I serve. That secret of our public life came from Christ, whose programme never was to please Himself or be waited on, but to "minister to others and to give His life a ransom for many." "Therefore God hath highly exalted Him that in the name of Jesus every knee should bow." "Choose ye this day Whom ye will serve."

OF BALLET DANCERS AND WISE MEN

By Nora Toeg.

The three Children were waiting their turn in the drawing room of the Theatre. They were Ballet Dancers and all were fair and very beautiful.

[illegible] are born, not made. They live in a world of their own, and although at times they condescend to come into ours and are always very welcome, still they make no secret of the fact that [illegible] theirs. Its whereabouts is not exactly known, and they themselves are very silent on the subject, but it is believed to be in the clouds.

A Ballet has a Soul, no Ballet is complete without it, for the Soul of the Ballet is in the Music, in the deep slumbering magic of its Sound.

And now having introduced the Children we would introduce to you the Wise Man, the man from Our World.

He enters the little drawing room and bows gravely to the Children.

"How do you do?" said the First Child. "How do you do?" replied the Man. He wore glasses [illegible] his very mild beard and hair, and his voice was very nice and kind, so that the Second Child [illegible] and said, though somewhat breathlessly: "Won't you sit down?" "Thank you" said the Man, and made himself comfortable in a big arm chair.

[illegible] the Man thought he should start a conversation with the Children though he was at a complete loss as to what he should say, it having been many years since he was himself a child. And while he was still ruminating the First Child spoke. "Do you like dancing"? she asked

"Well—er to be frank" he replied, "I do not. I made an attempt at it some time ago, but was obliged to abandon it. It gave me palpitations. I cannot say that I am particularly interested in this kind of—er pantomine, nor in the more serious form of Classical Dancing I believe you call it, it may be that I have no 'artistic sense,' but the execution of such—er acrobatic evolutions appears to me merely ridiculous."

"He is a Cynic" said the First Child.

"What is a Cynic"? inquired the Youngest.

"A man who has lost his sense of humour."

"How do you know?" asked the Second Child.

"Daddy said so."

That seemed to settle the question. So they said "Oh" and looked at him pityingly. They did not quite understand what it was he had lost, but he had lost something and they were sorry for him.

The "Cynic" however continued the conversation, ignoring their remarks. "From earliest times, in every land, the world over, dancing has existed and will never cease to exist. The barbaric instinct of giving expression to the feelings by the performance of certain antics, according to the national characteristics of races and people, is natural, but carefully trained movements produce far more pleasing results."

"He is a very Superior Man" spoke the Second Child.

"What is Superior?" asked the Youngest who was of an inquiring turn of mind.

"Conceited" said the First Child sweetly.

"For example," continued the Superior One, who had become fascinated with his subject, "We shall find that among the Ostyak tribes, the Kinnowits, the Gonds, the Kamchadales, the Coast Negroes, the Bushmen, the Hottentots and the Zulus, the object is to imitate the gambols of wild beasts, hunting scenes, fights and war dances. Religious dances are also a great feature among the savages. Among the civilized nations there are the traditional folk dances and ball room dances. The Ballet is more or less modern but was first produced in Italy and later became popular at all the European Courts. It is the representation of Classical Mythology, by dancing, gesture and pose."

The Children were completely bewildered, and had ceased even to appear gravely interested. Then stealthily and mysteriously there penetrated into the room the dreamy strains of a violin, and obeying an impulse, the Youngest Child began to dance, sublimely indifferent to her surroundings, with the calm assurance of the perfect artist.

She believed in Fairies and Witches and Things. She heard their voices in the music, calling to her in soft silvery accents, but she knew that she could not go, so she held out her arms to them, soft shapely arms, and smiled at them, displaying dimples. She entreated them to leave her, and now she danced after them, and now she danced away from them, but they returned and this time their voices rang louder, more insistently, and once she thought she heard a sob . . . it was only a chord really. And if you were watching you would have noticed something indescribably sad in the wistful brown eyes, in the pose of the slender baby form that swayed with all the delicate grace of an exquisite flower. But the end was always sad, for she had played with the fairies and now she could only hear their voices faintly in the distance. . . . would that she too had been a fairy and could play with them for ever. . . .

The Children looked round for the customary applause, but there was none, the Man was asleep.

They crept up noiselessly and peered at him, they were very very Young Things after all, and the Man from Our World was no doubt bored.

"He is asleep," they said. "He was certainly a very nice man but he was too wise to understand." And then they were called away and complete forget about him.

IMPRESSIONS OF CHINA

An Act of Friendship

By George E. Sokolsky.

A picture was missing from the Exhibit. One name was omitted from among the exhibitors. One person was not there to enjoy the praises of his friends. Hit by a beam when the earth was trembling, far from his friends, dead in a moment, he whose future was so brilliant, who saw so much to do and did everything so well. Jules Madsen would have been enthusiastic over the exhibit of pictures by the China Society of Sciences and Arts. But Madsen could not be present. Not even one of his many pictures was hung. Perhaps his name was not even mentioned. Yet, Madsen in his way did much to enliven an interest in art in Shanghai. His own little exhibits surely reminded us that men live not by bread alone, even in this city. Perhaps another exhibition might be held one day to which some kind soul will send a picture signed, Jules Madsen.

Frederick Ward

A seaman, an adventurer, a fighter, an organizer, he saved the China of his day. "Chinese" Gordon put the finishing touches to the mad Taipings. Ward put a period to their onward march. Thenceforth it was retrocession for them. What makes a man like Ward? Why will such people wander the world in search of romance and adventure? Many a sailor boy in Yankee Massachusetts in those days of the whaling ships, when Martha's Vineyard was a place and Salem counted on the map, looked seaward to bringing Spanish dollars to China and returning to Boston Harbour or New York with tea and silk. And many a youth in search of gold in California found himself drunk and stupid in a miserable vessel, shanghaied for China. Here they joined the imps and the Taipings, whichever would pay, and fought until the life blood flowed no more. Ward's little mound in Sungkiang is but one; there should be more for gallant foreign boys who gave their lives that China might not be ravaged by fanatical madmen. They fought because they loved the fight: but China gained the victory.

Sun Chung-ying

When the Emperor Yu stopped the floods he engraved his name upon the grateful memory of 30 centuries. He brought to suffering peoples, comfort and prosperity. But China's floods continue. The Yellow River, scourge of a nation, moves its erratic way, leaving in its wake hunger and death. The Huai inundates a countryside and some say keeps a quarter of the entire nation in poverty. What better work can any man do than to devote the grey years of prosperity to the control of this reckless stream, to bringing millions of piculs of rice out of the soil, to lessening poverty for a nation. A native of the Huai country, scion of the merchant princes of Yangchow, where once Marco Polo governed and art and literature flourished, Sun Chung-ying does not accept the ease his age and wealth allow him. He gives to China what strength remains. Of him it will some day be said: "His heart was like unto that of Yu. He loved his people and he laboured for them."

Humiliation Day

The aged one was tending to his affairs. Entered Student enthusiastic, fountain pen prominent, white hat à la Beatty, fire in his eye.

"And are you not celebrating Humiliation Day?" he asked of the aged one.

The sire scratched his head. He looked this way and that. He sought a calendar which had not been brought up-to-date. He looked into his hat.

"Ai-i," he said. "I put it inside my hat-band last year, so I remembered to celebrate. But I sold the hat and bought a new one. It is forgotten, both the hat and humiliation day. It is too bad."

Sun Wen

To kill Sun Yat-sen by press cables is not to make him dead. Nor yet can parliament make him a saint and enroll his name in the history of the republic, and make him dead. Assassination is the tool of fools, for one springs up where one goes down. Tyrants and good men, wise men and fools, statesmen and dunces, are always with us, like the rich and the poor. Is Sun Wen alive or dead? He says he is [illegible] others say he is dead. Alive or dead, it matters little, for the work will go on. And therein lies the only strength he ever had. For Sun Yat-sen represents not a man but a practice of government. The man may disappear, he may blunder like a child guiding a dreadnought, he may show genius in statecraft like a Talleyrand. Whichever it is, the result will be the same: the result is that China having once sought a Western hue requires but the time to make the garb fit the person. Is Sun dead or alive? Ask Tsao Kun and Wu Pei-fu. Ask Tuan Chih-jui and Chang Tso-lin?

An Act of Friendship

The return of the remainder of the Boxer Indemnity to China by the United States, is, according to the preamble of the Bill passed by Congress, an act of friendship. The original bill contained the same phrase in its preamble. Friendship, however, is reciprocal. A friend must be a friend to someone. He must accept friendship from someone. A stylite cannot be a friend. A hermit cannot have a friend. A grouch does not encourage friendship. A slap in the face does not develop great friendship. The United States has returned these funds which are hers by treaty as an act of friendship. The United States has not adhered to the letter of her rights in the matter. Because she wanted to be China's friend, because she wanted China to be her friend, she disregarded her rights. Yet, at this moment many questions pend between China and the United States which involve a possible lessening of that friendship. The illegal tax on American goods cannot make for friendship. It sort of indicates that China does not want to be the friend of the United States. It is a negation of friendship. The sticking to the letter of agreements where the spirit, the intention, is so much bigger, the road around the Settlement, the refusal even to discuss the Trade Mark question, the petty difficulties American traders and missionaries meet in the interior, are not indicatons of a desire to be friendly. They indicate, in a way, that perhaps the friendship is slightly one-sided, that the American people love, admire and respect the people of China, but that the officials of China only utilize this affection to annoy the lover. This is of course not true of the Chinese people. But how can those who do not live in China, who cannot distinguish between the will of the people and the doings of the officials, know they they are not one in spirit?

A SONG OF MAY

Oh, may I sport my new felt hat,
My latest suit of tender grey?
I think—the sun is shining—that
I may.

Oh, may my gloves of pearly kid
And new white spats now see the light?
I thought just now—indeed, I did—
They might.

But sunny moments quickly pass
The rain pours down, the skies are grey—
For you're a fickle month, alas!
O May!

Tokio Municipal statisticians estimate that although Tokio inhabitants, who sought refuge out of the city after the September earthquake, have been rapidly returning, the population is still about 900,000 less than before the disaster. The present population is said to be about 1,600,000. According to an investigation made last November the population was 1,520,000. The next count will be made in October. The authorities expect the population will be increased to 1,750,000 by that time.

Mr. J. Hedley Drummond writes to a Home paper: "For the second or third time within a brief period the cablegrams report an attempt by Chinese pirates disguised as passengers on a British ship. The game is as familiar as the confidence trick, and much older. When will our Board of Trade take a leaf from the book of the Portuguese Government of Macao? Portuguese ships in the Far East only carry Chinese passengers below decks, and such passengers are, to all intents and purposes, in a cage. Further, all Portuguese crews are armed, while Chinese are searched for arms on embarkation. No [illegible] is ever attempted in a Portuguese ship." Before rushing to print Mr Drummond should have familiarized himself with his subject.

SHANGHAI—THE WONDER CITY OF ALL ASIA

I.—Export Trade at a Glance; Produce Man Knight of China Commerce; Shanghai's Principal Exporting Activities; Figures for Recent Decades; Tremendously Fascinating Topic.

By "Scrutator."

To my way of thinking, the export man in China is able to sense real romance in his work. He who sells manufactured goods from Home countries cannot conjure up many romantic visions—he has to sell, and when his goods are sold and he has collected his bills, well, he has to do the same thing over again and keep on doing it. But the export man has a very different mission. He makes the far confines of China Far West, Kansu, Mongolia, Yunnan and all the Eighteen Provinces his field of vision, and may still claim to be a pioneer. He takes his silk, his seeds and beans, his skins and furs, his oils and fats, his braids and grasses, his hair and wool, his ores and sundries, his dry cargo and wet cargo, and can follow them, from regions where the story of the world's youth is still being sung, over the seas to the industries of the West where so many of our kind spend their lives in pulling the same old levers. The export man can look out from his desk and visualize the collecting of his cargoes: he sells and ships: collects his taels: and then these same commodities are to a great extent brought back again to be sold to the Chinese in manufactured form in due course of time by his colleague the importer. Yes, the real export man is the Knight of China Trade.

And, indeed, true export men, those who sense the pleasure of their trade, are in a class by themselves.

Over 200 Commodities

I find on refernce to the "Far Eastern Products Manual" that some 200 miscellaneous commodities find their way to foreign countries from the port of Shanghai, which handles practically all China products. This does not by any means imply, however, that the successful export man gives any attention to a majority of them. Perhaps he does not handle more than five per cent. of them, perhaps not that percentage, for the true exporter touches only that which he knows. In the old days an export man was a one-commodity being. The tea man was a tea man all his life, and his is a class that has not changed much. Similarly, the silk man knew nothing about anything else, and he lived, slept and had his being in silk. The same with hides and skins and furs, and some of the other staple lines. The old export man was of that type who put his best years into China. He studied maps, knew the geography of the country—an art no longer worshipped—and he had to know and did know a very great deal regarding usages and practices of buying and selling in various parts of the interior, of adulterations and malpractices, and was worth his weight in gold every season to the hong happy enough to retain him. But in this trade, too, changes have come over the scene. Many firms nowadays try to handle everything, and as a consequence have to face claims that were unheard of in the old days, due of course to ignorance—for the Chinese is not the paragon of virtue some misguided persons believe, and if there is a possibility of "putting one over" (as our American friends say), then that "one" will be put over.

What Shanghai Handles

Briefly the commodites that are handled in Shanghai may be briefly grouped as follows:

For Manufacturing.—Raw silk cotton, hemp, jute, furs, copper, platinum and other metals, skins, gums and greases,

For Food Purposes.—Vegetable oils of all kinds, tea, eggs and egg products, and many other agricultural and animal products.

Manufactured Articles.—Silk textiles, laces, embroideries, carpets and rugs, hairnets, bagging and matting, and a great list of other articles of this character.

Perhaps I can do no better than to quote figures of Shanghai's total export trade. The comparison is spread over a long period, with the view to showing the advance that the port has made:

	To Foreign Countries	To Chinese Ports	Total
1844—	20,137	17,062	37,199
1874—	25,541	29,946	57,488
1894—	26,603	32,576	59,179
1904—	45,440	47,092	92,432
1914—	80,187	107,966	188,153
1924—	84,763	148,039	232,803

General View of Trade

I fear that the person who expects to get anything further in this article than a cursory view of Shanghai's export trade will be disappointed, for if I were merely to quote full statistical tables space at my disposal would be insufficient. I propose to show, however, certain groups of commodities, dealing with them as intelligibly as I can, and hope that my efforts will induce those who take some interest in the present transitional state of China as a whole really to study her export trade. There are several reliable guides published, and it may also lead the student on to making money. I have known several cases during the last 10 of 15 years of men building up quite respectable fortunes who can base their success on their first studies.

In what follows I deal with the latest figures available—for 1922—and the amounts quoted include re-exported values.

Metals and Minerals.—Pig iron claims 1½ million haikwan taels in this class. Antimony (crude, oxide ore and regulus combined) come close to the million mark. Lead, manganese, zinc and other ores amounted to about 750,000 taels, and there is a large list of general metals which rarely go beyond 50,000 taels.

Cotton Yarn and Cotton Goods.—Nearly 87 million taels' worth of yarn went through Shanghai in 1922, representing nearly two million piculs, 1.8 million of which went to various ports in China and 26,000 to Hongkong. About 13⅓ million taels' worth (2,323,598 pieces) of sheetings and 3.3 million taels' worth of drills passed through the Maritime Customs. Also 7 million worth of nankeens. The whole group accounted for nearly 114 million haikwan taels.

Tea.—The year 1922 figures showed a good advance over the previous year, particularly in black teas (146,000 piculs as against 48,000 in 1921). The export of black amounted to 3.7 million taels, green to nearly 10 million, scented getting on to the million, leaf three-quarters of a million, and smaller amounts for brick, tablet, dust and stalk. Production of tea is still far below the per-war average.

Eggs and Egg Products.—I take it that the counting is correct, but whoever did it made the number of preserved eggs passing through the port as 12,970,130, and they were worth a paltry 154,710 taels. But when we come to the fresh, the staggering picture of 383,846,000 eggs in one pile awaits us—just imagine the hens too—and they cost something like 4.1 million taels. The port sent out frozen and salted eggs to the tune of 870,000 odd taels. Shanghai also sent out 4 million taels worth of albumen and 4.7 million worth of yolk (moist and dried). So this trade is booming.

Hides.—This is a staple trade, of course. 1922 showed a good increase of four million taels value over the previous year. Exports include cow (Hk. Tls. 5 million), buffalo (three quarters of a million), ass and horse hides.

Oils.—This group includes bean, camphor, castor, cottonseed, groundnut, linseed, rapeseed, sesamum, shrimp, tea, wood and dross. Wood oil is a grand leader. How one who konws China can imagine the movement of this wood oil, which accounted for over 10 million taels—from far away in Kweichow and Yunnan and the south-western provinces, down the Upper Yangtzse to Hankow and the seaboard. Groundnut followed in point of value with nearly two million, bean next (329,000 taels), camphor and castor (110,000 taels each), cotton seed (71,000), and the others in much smaller quantities. Of wood oil 683,378 piculs were brought in and no less than 683,244 piculs re-exported.

Cigarettes.—A gigantic trade. Hk. Tls. 70 million in 1922, 60 million of which went out of Shanghai to Chinese ports and the remainder principally to the Straits and Java and down that way.

Silk.—Everybody knows the importance of China's silk trade. I have no space to deal with it statistically. The difficulties besetting the path of the foreign exporter, however, are getting more and more complex, as he has to buy ahead in a highly speculative market.

Seeds.—Shanghai exports apricot seeds, cotton, lilyflower, linseed, melon, olive, rape, sesamum, soap and tea. I was surprised to find that all seeds exported only amounted to about eight million taels.

Million Tael Value Commodities

There are scores of other commodities of quite considerable importance, yet they find themselves relegated unceremoniously to "sundries." It may appear a very astute thing to be able to do, but I find that I am in the position of imparting information regarding most of these, and set forth below a list of those taken out in ships' bottoms in 1922 to the tune of one million haikwan taels and over. This is the list—there are many that run over half a million:

Beancake (1.1), beans (black, broad, green, red, white, yellow—4½), printed books (1.7), bran (1.7), bristles (3.8), carpets (1.4), cereal (5), raw cotton (10.6), hemp (1), ramie (3), flour (10½), grasscloth (5.7), groundnuts (kernels—6.1), hairnets (2.8), intestines (1.4), lace (4.1), cow leather (1.9), mats (straw and rush—1.2), medicines (3.4), paper all kinds (4½), seed cake (cotton—1.2), goat skins (untanned—5.2), strawbraid (1.4), tobacco (4.4), varnish (1.6), wool (sheep's 3.4).

What of the Future?

A very strong case can be put up to show that in the future China will become the world's principal producing centre for the supply of commodities for industrial countries. Certain it is that she is now occupying a very significant economic position, but if China only had any decent communications there would literally be no limit to output thereby enabling her to increase her national wealth to enormous proportions. China is not selling abroad a fiftieth part of what she could if she could get them down to seaboard in good condition and with no fear of molestation by the rabble now infesting inland parts of the country. It must be apparent to the casual onlooker that in some directions China's agricultural resources are without limit, for in agriculture she stands in some sense as a beacon light to the whole world. Foreign countries need increasing supplies of dozens of the products of China, and I feel that it is fairly safe to predict—no, one cannot predict! With certain modifications one would be able to make a statement; so it is better to say that one does not know.

I might close however, with the repetition of the truism that needs little proof that all the financial difficulties in which China finds herself to-day could be obviated and all obligations met if only the resources (hidden principally in the ground) could be properly tapped. When that time will come it is certainly not within the power of any man in China to-day to prophesy. It is well that life is built up on hope. Under decent conditions there would be hope for a great boom in China's fascinating export trade.

REMINISCENCES OF A TRAVELLER

Interior Travel in China and Its Fascinations: How I Laughed Myself Out of Danger: Moral of the Unexpected

By Scrutator.

I often wonder why foreigners so rarely go up the Yangtsze when their leave falls due instead of down, for then they have time to travel. When an old traveller is drawn out at a Bubbling Well dinner party to yarn of his experiences the ladies gasp, the men puff carelessly away at their smokes and say, "By Jove, that's the life. . . That's what I'd like to do"—and know they don't mean a word they say. On the morrow they go to their bank, or their hong, or wherever they have elected to spend half their lifetime in either ekeing out a living or making a pretty fortune, forgetting entirely their expressed wish of the night before that they would like to see China from within. And in due course, with their shekels in their bags, they retire with scant knowledge of the country and the people among whom they have lived, only regretful of the wasted days. It's good to be an Idler now and then, for an idler aften learns the art of life.

Of course, I am one of the fortunate. It was many years ago that I essayed, all unaware of hazards and audacious to a degree, to cross China from the Pacific, see Eastern Tibet, and come down to Bhamo (in British Burma) en route to the sea for Home. I did it. And you see, I am still in China! Those were the wonder years of my life; but that is another story.

Whether I would do that again today, travelling several years in China's glorious Far West, often for months and once for 263 days without hearing a foreign voice and seeing no people other than the natives, I do not know; and if I personally would (being given still to some adventure), I would probably hesitate in advising others to try it should fear possess their hearts. For China is to-day a country of free-booting banditti, of disputatious soldiery and undisciplined military pillagers. One may be held for ransom, or undergo a dozen equally or more uncomfortable experience. In my day, however, all went well. I should literally have lost my life a dozen times, but my star was ever in the ascendant, and I came to no harm other than breaking my arm, suffering from dysentery, snow-blindness and a sunstroke—ills that only the experienced traveller avoids. In the course of time one settles down and learns the way of travel, and for ever after places upon such knowledge (bought dearly as it seems at time of purchase) a high esteem, for it ever directs one along a safer pathway. On one occasion, too after two kindly souls had befriended this weary traveller and feared his early dissolution, my coffin was made ready, and enterprising scribblers blazoned out before the world the highly exaggerated report that I had crossed the river, surprising me and paining others.

In inland travel in China, however, travel is easy if you toil on, endure as much as you meet and never turn back; and thus I was able to come to myself again under circumstances that I shall now relate.

We had done a long day's tramping, and weary was my caravan. Tomorrow, then, should be an easy day. As we gazed over the river to the range, up whose slopes we were to strain our weather-beaten way, we caught a glimpse of the tiny haven which would house us men and horses at night. We had been in a Scotch mist for days—drenched through, bedding wet, horses fagged and lame, bearers churlish and malavolent. At midday on the morrow we had pulled up to rest all animals, bipeds drinking dirty tea and delivering foul invective, the quadrupeds picking at scrub and thinking hard. Suddenly a telegram messenger arrived, the message for me. I was to change my course, according to its reading, as the people in the village were planning our quick and final disposal. But I disregarded the advice and gave the fellow a few cash for bringing it to me. Instead I made my way up the hill, shouting back my wishes to my men to harness up and follow, which after considerable hulloballoo they deigned reluctantly to do. Then the toil began. There was no road, no pathway, and recent rains had made the going hard. Just at sundown, weary and very heavy-laden, I rounded a bend in the mountainside and happened upon the tiny haven in the hills above referred to.

But what a kettle of fish! As quick as a flash, several loutish male specimens of those wild hill folk pounched down upon me, waving huge bamboos and shouting "Da, da (strike),". . . this, then was the end.

I had no weapon of any kind. Defenceless and by no means brave about the business (let me straightway confess it), I walked a foot or two on the flat "village green" that had been hacked out of the steep hillside, out of which also right-angles dug out at regular distances formed two walls of the dirty hovels in which the people lived.

Here I sat down on a big stone—and laughed in their faces.

Why I laughed I cannot tell to this day. Perhaps I was hilarious, or hysterical, or laughed in sheer fear. Anyhow, I laughed, suffering no interruption even when an old woman—an awful old hag with a four-inch skirt covering her tottering limbs—came upon the scene and exhorted her worthies to get on with their ill-natured business. Then she caught sight of me laughing.

"Hi," she shouted, waving her bony indicator towards me, "look, he's one of those lousy foreign devils. . . he's got a slate loose. . . rats in the upper story. . . a bee in his bonnet. He's a plain idiot."

Meantime I laughed, riveting my attention upon her.

Meantime also my men had arrived, with the loads and ponies—and how they lied! I hate to split on them, for they were decent souls. But they didn't know me, had only met me at the foothill and were merely carrying my things for me. We had travelled together for many days, however. I laughed on, my eye still on the old lady. But she would have none of it.

"To the business in hand," she roared to the man with the stoutest bamboo, and just as they raised their rods to execute her corybantic orders, a sprite of a girl about nine swept past them all, shouting defiance in the old hag's ear.

"No," cried Little Precious Pearl (that was her name literally translated), "it cannot be, it cannot be," and, pointing to me, showed clearly how a fellow with a spirit like mine would hang round there and invade them for ever. And she carried the point. The importance of this did not enter my consciousness, however, until the old lady, wiping her opthalmic-stricken eyes and nose with the back of her skinny paw, fell slightly hypnotized under the constancy of my gaze. Still I laughed. She condescended to smile so as to show the lonely prong that hung whence her teeth formerly belonged. Then it was that I knew that the day was won. She laughed at me. I laughed at her, the hypnotic influence being mutual.

"Yes, yes," she exclaimed, confirming her snap judgment of a moment before, "yes, he's mad: he's as mad as a March hair."

Still I laughed: still she laughed. The men dropped their bamboo death-hammers and laughed too. My men laughed. Women with babies on their backs swooped out of the huts and joined in and laughed. All laughing, we surely made a merry spectacle. Perhaps 30 people, all laughing one across the other. I wanted to speak, and would waltz up to a man to deliver my message, only to burst out again into helpless laughter, for my feigned laughter had now become real. They would do the same, and did it many times.

Aha, aha,—it did not take longer perhaps to happen than it does in the telling. But when the tempest was overpast, the old lady came shufflingly forward to me, rivers of tears coursing down the real estate on her wizened cheeks, and sympathized thus—and it was music on the ear.

"Great Teacher, you must be very hungry. Come in and we will give you something to eat."

Then the floors were brushed up: the fires were kindled: buckwheat and honey, maize and dirty hot water were brought for the men, cut straw for the animals. And we had a royal evening.

I have no space; neither would there be point in telling how the women put me to bed and roused me at dawn, and how all the village—men, women and children—escorted me on my way. Neither will I tell of a subsequent visit when, having been down to Rangoon and refitted my caravan, I was passing that way again and informed my men that I wanted to pay a call or two at that tiny haven in the hills.

"What, up there—no can! They are the wild men."

"But I have frieends among them" was my simple reply.

But not a single volunteer came forward until I, the potentate and paymaster, began to strap my pulcai over my own back. Then an old man in the caravan—God rest his soul—told me his life was nearly done, and it really did not matter so much so long as his family would be looked after by me. He would go. And so, with his bed on his back and my bed on mine, we climbed the hill to call upon my friends. And—ah, such a welcome was given me as would melt a heart of stone.

We hear every now and again about Maxim Gorki, sometimes in a political way, sometimes in a literary way. The latest news about him is of a literary sort, for Mr. Philip Allan is publishing a volume of fragments from his diary. He has elaborated many of them into little sketches and stories, all portraying the typical Russian life of peasant and autocrat.

Every author one knows has the intention of writing something about the dandies of the world, men like Beau Nash and Brummel. It has fallen to Mr. Beresford Chancellor to undertake the writing, in six volumes, of "The Lives of the Rakes." We know him as an authority on the historical side of London, with a very special knowledge of the wonderful square mile which we call St. James's. His list of rakes is going to include, not only the "Merry Monarch," but my lords Buckingham, Rochester, and Sedley. There has recently been rather a boom in literature dealing with men who have known how to live merrily, and the chances are that Mr. Chancellor's volumes will do very well.

Sir Eliott saw much service as a soldier and he narrowly escaped at Khartoum for he was under orders to join his friend, General Gordon. He has been an ardent sportsman, as well as an ardent soldier, and especially he has made many voyages in canoes. And of these and other adventures he writes brightly and entertainingly.

Then the Roll of Honour in cricket is set out, likewise the averages in Test matches all over the world, and, finally, there is an introduction by that excellent cricketer, Lord Hawke.

NEW BOOK ON CHINESE LAW

Another Valuable Work from the Scranton Press

MANUEL DU CODE CHINOIS (大清律例) by Le P. Guy Boulais, S.J. Roman Catholic Mission Press, Shanghai. $20 net.

In offering to the public for the first time in French, the Chinese code of laws (and in speaking of Chinese law we refer to the laws laid down during the Manchu Dynasty, for the Chinese name for Fr. Boulais's manual literally translated, means "A Manuel of the Code of Laws of the Great Ching Dynasty") a code which has been described as, "If not the most just and equitable, is at least the most comprehensive, uniform and suited to the genius of the people perhaps of any that ever existed," the author has again demonstrated the manner in which the Jesuit fathers, once they have undertaken a research task, are capable of completing it most efficiently. In making an attempt of this nature, the author has taken upon himself an enormous task and a heavy load of responsibility, for which we should all be thankful.

Most foreigners are completely in the dark as to what and how law exists in China. Some persons whose reputation for scholarship stands high still deny the claim of the Chinese to any law whatsoever—incredible but, nevertheless, a fact. Practically no epitome of Chinese Code has appeared since the days of Sir George Staunton—a century ago, and even that laborious work at its very publication was out of date. Some portions of the law have from time to time appeared—hidden away in magazines or delivered in lectures from time to time; but no complete detailed view has been presented, however blurred, of the complete Chinese Code. Several good articles have been translated and published on sections of the Code, such as Family Law, Criminal Law, Marriage Law, Property, Bankruptcy and sprinklings of the Commercial Law section.

The present translation, which is pre-eminently the work of a scholar, shows that it has taken up many hours of laborious work and a great amount of thought, but Fr. Boulais may well be satisfied with his labours, for he has completed a work—a most difficult work—in a most able manner.

Just as his brother Jesuits have added such excellent discourses on China and the Chinese in the past, to the literary world, Fr. Boulais has contributed in the present case a valuable addition to the very small list of Chinese legal bilbliography which we have and the value of his work cannot be overestimated. Fr. Boulais, has placed us all under a deep debt of gratitude by publishing this work, which, a masterpiece of research and learning, is so skilfully compiled and simply and clearly written that it compels attention by fascinating and absorbing the mind of the reader.

A man may live in a certain neighbourhood for years without having any clear idea of the topographical features of the surrounding country, until one day he goes up in a flying machine, when he sees the whole locality beneath him like a map, and he realizes the geographical characteristics of the place with vivid distinctness. Fr. Boulais has now done for us what the aviation pilot might do for the topographer, for he has produced a book which does much to overcome the very real difficulties which have hitherto beset the path of those who have been struggling to obtain a clear and intelligent idea of the Chinese law. He has conveniently divided his material into eight books these comprising one on the Grouping of Law, and the seven others on Law in General, Public Functionaries, Family Law, the Law of Rites, Military Law, Criminal Law and Mandarial Law. Apart from the preparatory, the preface, the introduction, there are several appendices, and explanatory notes, there are nearly 150 chapters. It is a book no lawyer or student of Chinese law or of China and the Chinese can afford to be without.

W. H. C.

THE POET.

POEMS: By Francis J. Bowen. Oxford: Basil Blackwell. 3/6 net.

A new book of poems has a lure which is to some of us irresistible. When one comes for review we seize on it to the neglect of whatever else may be to hand. But how rarely do we find what we seek therein! There are publishers in our hopeful band evidently. For books of poetry are printed and circulated with a regularity that cannot but strike the experienced as a grim [illegible] as strong as it is pathetic. Of course the publisher has another reason for seeking out poetry and another test of it than ours; or at any rate other than that which we flatter ourselves is ours. For he has to gauge the taste of the public. It must be a harassing work for an honest publisher, the constant endeavour to make "what the public wants" fit what the public ought to have. Who shall judge in poetry? Heaven knows the public cannot know what it wants. No new thing in poetry can ever have been demanded. Anything new in art cannot but be a surprise. Truth and Beauty we seek, blindly, unknowingly, something hitherto unseen caught up in the vision of the eyes of youth. For we come to that acknowledgement, that you alone can show us beauties. If we seek beauty in our own lives we look back to some imagined thing of our youth, something utterly unreal that we dreamed in the gone days, bigger and truer than anything which life has since vouchsafed. All our accumulated knowledge cannot give us back the trick of it, the fashioning of beauty out of the ignorance of life.

If that is granted then one has to say that Colonel Bowen has retained his youth and, if not youth's ignorance, at all events a very happy capability of ignoring the unpleasantness of life's grim realities. In one poem he consciously pushes them aside. It is called "Shadow Land" and is one of the best in this little book of 40 pages.

"Why dost thou bid me glance adown the pages
Of history, through labyrinths of time,
In the still down of immemorial ages
To seek for wisdom for my mournful rhyme?
Small comfort is't to say to those who mourn:
"To labour and to sorrow man is born."

Yet so it is and all joy must be fleeting:
Scarce have I clasped a dear friend's hand in mine,
And hearts have glowed with warmth at friendship's greeting;
Ere we must part: scarce is the cup of wine
Raised to the lips all bright with ruby gladness
Ere suddenly it turns the heart to sadness.

* * *

Such is life's law—what is its hidden meaning?
I cannot tell to-night nor care to know,
Nor why men are forever toiling, gleaming,
Only to gather sheaves of grief and woe.
I know life is a struggle, but to-night
I feel I cannot nerve me to the fight.

Leave me alone; for music, soft, entrancing,
Though weary-weighted with a load of sorrow,—
In its wild beauty all the more enhancing Life's bitterness from which it loves to borrow
Its Spirit-stirring notes,—has touched me deep:
I can no more; I only long to sleep.

Leave me alone; I'm weary of life's passion,
Its fruitless striving and its vain endeavour:
To Life's grim law I can but feebly fashion
This poor weak soul which longs to rest forever.
Come gentle sleep to take me by the hand
And lead me forth into the shadow-land.

That is five of the 16 charming verses. They should be enough to show that Colonel Bowen has the gift. A delightful little book.

A BOOK OF KINGS.

THIS KING BUSINESS: Intimate Accounts of Royalty as a Going Concern. By Frederick L. Collins. T. Werner Laurie, Ld. 10/6 net.

Whether the word "going" in the subtitle is intended to mean prosperous or moribund is not clear after reading the book. In fact very little, if any, light is thrown upon the "business" in any way. Under such a title one expected a humorous, breezy view of monarchic role from the standpoint of one enjoying the democratic freedom of the United States of America. Instead of which the book is apparently, surprisingly, intended to be a serious review of the survival of monarchy in Europe and the near East. The "intimate accounts" referred to in the title consist in the outcome of a few of the usual, rather distressing, "buttings-in" of the ordinary American "interviewer." And they are not amusing; that is what annoys so much. It is very distressing to pick up a book with a comic title and sit comfortably at the fire expecting an amusing evening, and then to find oneself treated to a heavy, labouring, earnest discussion of matters which are not even interesting to us who have been used for centuries to being ground under the heels of princes. A very disappointing exhibition of the proverbial American love of kings and such.

THE MAKING OF TIENTSIN AND OTHER CARPETS

Combining practical utility with historical interest the magnificant publication, "Chinese Carpets and Rugs," by Adolf Hackmack, seems destined not only to find a wide reading public but also to greatly stimulate the growing trade of Tientsin in one of North China's principal products. The book, which will shortly be placed on sale by its publishers, La Librairie Francaise, is printed on thick art paper, 12 by eight and a half inches, contains 63 illustrations and a map, including 26 coloured plates, and 40 pages of large and clearly printed text describing the development designs, colours and weaving of Chinese carpets. The text is translated from the original by Miss L. Arnold.

The arrangement of the book, the lucid presentation of it contents, the clarity of its symbolism and the beauty of its illustrations make it invaluable to all who have any interest in carpets, whether they be merchants, students or private individuals. The merchant, of course, has his own information gathered in the routine of business, but in this book he will find his scattered information presented in concise and accurate form. The student will find valuable information on the history, origins and development of carpets, while the private individual, who in a sense represents the ultimate consumer, will discover the decorative values and symbolical significance of an article with which he furnishes his home.

After tracing origins of the industry, from its early introduction to Northern China from Central Asia, through Tibet and Kansu, with references to their use as prayer-rugs, saddle-clothes and divan covers, the reader is told how the Emperor Kang Hsi (1662-1722) fostered the industry by inviting artists to Peking to enrich designs for Porcelain, Weaving and Carpet Industries. His grandson, the famous Ch'ien Lung, continued this patronage, by placing large orders with native weavers, beside purchasing the best obtainable from foreign countries. "Most of the carpets in the Peking Palaces," says the author, "date from his seign and even to-day they are magnificent examples of the art.

"Owing to the increasing export trade," continues the author, "the production of carpets has increased continuously in volume during recent years, especially during the years of the Great War, when American carpet traders, hitherto accustomed to drawing their supplies from Persia, turned their attention to China. Tientsin has now become the chief export centre for the Chinese carpet. Some 500 large and small factories now make carpets there. In 1913 the value of the export trade was about Tls. 133.000 as against Tls. 420,000 in 1919, Tls. 444,000 in 1920, Tls. 612,000 in 1911, Tls. 2,532,000 in 1922 and Tls. 3,795,000 in 1923."

Dealing with designs, the reader is taken through a very interesting chapter of geometrical, Taoistic, Buddhistic, miscellaneous and ancient Chinese traditional designs. This section, allied as its subject matter is to other forms of native art, is a vast study in itself. The author tells of the meaning and application of Dragon patterns, the Thunder Line, Cloud, Water, Fire and Lightning, Mountains. "Yin and Yang," the Eight Trigrams of Divination, the Sceptre, the Eight Genii, Pheonix, Bat, Lion and a host of other significant designs. "The Chinese," the author says, "have a marked preference for symbols and employ them extensively. They consist of two kinds, either of such objects as by their very nature give the sense required, as for instance, a coin to express wealth; or of sound rebuses in which the similar sound renders the sense that is to be conveyed, such as Ch'ing, the hanging musical stone of jade for Ch'ing which means blessing."

In connexion with the distribution of this book an advance prospectus has been mailed at great expense to all parts of the world. The name of every known dealer or merchant interested at all in this sort of article has been obtained from directories of many cities all over Europe, the United States, South Africa, South America, Australia, India and other countries. This propaganda in itself is bound to have its contributory effect upon the trade of Chinese Carpets, and should do much to stimulate the exports to higher figures.

The book, which will be on sale before the end of May, will be sold at $12.50 a copy, at which price a large part of the first edition has already been booked up.

ROMANCE.

SPINSTER OF THIS PARISH. By W. B. Maxwell. Thornton, Butterworth, Ld. 3/6 net.

Here is another of the excellent reprints which this enterprising house is producing. One may assume that the publishers are choosing the works which they consider the best of the authors represented. In this instance the choice seems to bear out the contention put forward in the Book Page in an earlier review of Mr. Maxwell's work. It thercin argued that there is a misconception in the minds of many people as to the reason of the popularity of this author; that the more vocal of his admirers are in the habit of asserting that it is his truth to life, his realism, to use the cant word; but that, on the contrary, it is only when he idealizes life's happenings and his characters reactions to them that his work is satisfying. It is gratifying to note, therefore, the clear-sighted house of Thornton Butterworth evidently viewing it in the same light. For "Spinster of This Parish" is the least realistic of all Mr. Maxwell's books and it is, for that very reason, incomparably the best. The story of the love of Anthony Dyke, the explorer, and the spinster is carried forward on the romantic plane from start to finish, sheer idealism, satisfying and enjoyable in every page, with the exception, perhaps, of a few pages of the long drawn out descriptions of the country, on their great journey together. The author's enthusiasm for the grandeur of the mountain scenes has lured him here into so much description that it becomes at times the least bit tedious. It can hardly be called a fault and in another book would not be noticed. For apart from that, the novel is, as a whole and in detail, an excellent piece of work, the best Mr. Maxwell has given us so far.

THE WOMAN'S PAGE

SHANGHAI MOTHER GOOSE

The Well Dressed Woman

By Elizabeth Pepys.

There was an old woman who wished to dress well;
She went to Paris her stocks for to sell;
She went to an opening, said:
"Here is the cash.
I must be in fashion no matter how rash."
The mannequins came and the mannequin went
She admired all she saw and her money she spent.
They dressed her up gaily and then sent her back
In the height of the style with no gewgaw to lack.
When the neighbours saw her, they said "Is it true
That these are your costumes and it's really you?"
She faced them all bravely, her friends and her foes:
"It's not my complexion, but these are my clothes."

ANNOYING NOISES

"Horrible Discords—Dire was the Noise"

By Elizabeth Pepys.

"All I want is a little peace and quiet," says the Modest Asker, little knowing that his requests could be more easily attended to were he to phrase a demand for wealth untold, scintillating brilliance, or all the virtues of the Perfect Man. Peace and quiet in Shanghai that is. We understand that there still remain peaceful nooks elsewhere, "Along the Potomac," for example. Or there is always rural quiet, celebrated too enthusiastically by the poets who seem to forget the little yapping birds that wake us up at dawn. Then there are the hallowed quiets of the past, proving all too sadly that being quiet is rapidly becoming one of the lost arts.

The average Shanghailander realizes keenly the truth of Byron's saying "quiet to quick bosoms is a hell," and takes every effort to preserve himself from being ensouled to ancient "quietness" as "A.E." puts it. No, let us have the honking motor horn, the tooting whistle, the blaring band, the loud-voiced clock, the unceasing chatter of the Chinese, the incessant quip and sally of our friends, and the cacophony of jazz. Quietness in Shanghai is synonymous with dullness, and so much to be shunned that an acquaintance of mine says she always saves her bits of news, whatever they may be, to be announced in public, so that the world at large shall infer that she is a successful conversationalist.

But there is one sport which does not depend upon encouraging bands, the plaudits of onlookers or the shouts of the players themselves for its pursuit. Indeed one may not even talk while wooing the speckled beauties of the brook to their fate. Since fishes do not have ears and presumably do not hear, it would seem that this precaution was unnecessary, but it is pleasant to think that an early fisherman first invented this soothing myth and imposed it upon his fellows, thus greatly adding to the peace and serenity of life and affording a refuge for "all that are lovers of virtue, and dare trust in his Providence, and be quiet and go a-angling." Let's fish.

THE SEVERING TRAM

Partings that are not Sweet Sorrows

By Elizabeth Pepys.

No, we do not mean that the trams have ever shown a disposition to sever our thumbs from the rest of us, or that we have ever been even jammed by the implacably closing gates. But we have seen some tragic family separations as we clung to the supports of the safety island, waiting for a tram not too impossibly full to board.

Take for example Father Chinese, with many bundles in both hands, closely followed by a small son, clinging frantically to his skirts. Also Mother Chinese, with her hands even fuller, and two small children clutching at her trousers. The family attempts to hurl itself upon the tram. Father gains a ledge of safety and pulls little son after him. Mother has not been so lucky. One of her troublesome offspring hasn't been able to make the step and how can Mother be expected to lift him up, when both her hands are full. Therefore, in spite of frantic expostulations the tram moves off without the second section of the family.

From the disconsolate demeanour of Mother Chinese and her temporarily orphaned offspring one infers that the occasion is grievous. Not understanding the voluble exclamations we fear the worst. Memories of Evangeline, float through our minds, when the Acadian peasants were deported from their homes and husbands were torn from wives and children from mothers. Evangeline was separated from her Gabriel and never did find him till he was on his death bed. Can it be that we are witnessing the initial scene of such a tragedy?

Does Mother know just where Father was going, and where he will eventually disembark? Has she the necessary coppers to board the next tram? Will he wait for her at the next station, or at least the next fare-section? All these and many other perplexities surround us, arousing our sympathetic interest to such an extent that we miss our own tram. Ah me, what an emotional strain it is to travel by tram!

TASTE AND ITS BLIND FOLLOWERS

The Selective Faculty or Copy-Catism

If Love is represented as sightless, it is simply because he has a habit of bringing very incongruous persons together. But Love's eyes and the eyes of his followers are really only bandaged, and they can always peep a little underneath, if they please. Taste, on the contrary,—the sort defined as "the power of perceiving and relishing excellence"—is supposed to be exceedingly far-sighted; yet, most of the people who follow taste do so with the blindness of bats and the meekness of sheep. This is conspicuous enough when illustrated by women and the fashions, for, let a mode once find favour in feminine fancy, and, at once, fat and thin, tall and short, dark and fair, old and young, assume it regardless of suitability, beauty, or common sense. And, when it comes to the building and furnishing of new houses or the altering and refurnishing of old ones, both men and women show a grand inability to recognize not only what they should have, but even what they want, unless the choice of some cultivated intelligence has already been popularized to meet public demand.

EMBROIDERIES ARE AS POPULAR AS EVER

The ups and downs of appreciative feeling in the matter of personal effects, too, are exceedingly interesting. Rising generations, especially in democratic countries did not a few years ago attach much importance to parents' belongings (if they had any), very little to those of grandparents, and only a little more to those of great-grandparents, because a few Antique Fanciers had lately come to think them romantically quaint or quaintly romantic, to throw out old things, no matter how charming, and buy new, no matter how ugly, about represented the general swing of sentiment in those days.

And then, suddenly, people began to throw out the new, no matter how graceful and appropriate, and replace them with the old, no matter how hideous, and this about represents the general swing of the next movement. In neither case was discretion exhibited. Genuine backgrounds had been destroyed without any compunction. There had been no respect for the past as a past with associations, in the first place; and, in the second, there was no respect for the present as a present, nor any compunction about upsetting its belongings to create false backrounds—"artificial ancient," as they might be called—for newly collected old articles.

THE PLEATED SKIRT IN SOFT TILES

Live and Learn

Anybody may change with the times, and there is nothing despicable in having to learn or relearn the value of things. They may have beauty or interest of a kind not easily recognized or recognized for reasons that only an expert could explain. If they have been discarded from ignorance and can be reclaimed with knowledge, all the better; that is, all the better, if they fit properly into their new surroundings. But if they were discarded because they were really ugly or because their owners really disdained them, and if their equivalents are now sought because of some imagined fashion leading which the blind and the sheeplike are afraid not to follow, why then, all the worse.

There is something a little mean in the souls of persons who, at the supposed bidding of the mode, deliberately refill their rooms with pictures, ornaments, and furniture of a bygone sort which they do not admire. There is something staunch and fine in the souls of those who have never, at the dictates of any alien fancy, rejected possessions endeared by association and suitable to them and their lives. Character shows in amalgamated, more than acquired, backgrounds. No decade was all admirable or all abominable, and what makes true atmosphere is to bring tastefully together whatever was comfortable, beautiful, and agreeable to live with yesterday and whatever is comfortable, beautiful, and agreeable to live with to-day. The moment a householder starts to make a fixed period in a house not intended for a collector's palace or a museum, it becomes unhomelike. The more perfect the more unhomelike. We know of one gentleman who complained of feeling as if he should be stood, like an umbrella, in the corner of his own baronial hall when he entered it from the street, so foreign did he seem to its lofty 13th-century setting.

"Heirlooms" By Purchase.

Of course, collectors' houses or houses perfectly constructed and furnished to represent those of a former day hardly come into the list of those we are banning. The people who collect, the people who reconstruct are people who have studied, who have individual taste and knowledge, and the desire, very often, to leave the fruits of it to an unenlightened public. Moreover, the owners of wonderfully created or restored mansions are not really as uncomfortable as might at first sight appear. They are apt to have cozy modern apartments tucked away somewhere. No, the good ladies and gentlemen we have in our old books are the ones who sell inherited possessions without a grain of the feeling of the family old and are now, again at her orders, busily buying up those of others to replace them.

"Those's Mae," says mother (who vainly christened her child Margt), "saying she must have one of those early American rooms, and she fairly tired me out yesterday looking through the antique shops—at prices that would knock you down, too,—for a bed the moral of my grandmother's old maple one that she made me get rid of years ago. And now she's dragged two moth-eaten old hook rugs out of the garret and wants me to take up the good velvet carpet and let her spread them on the bare boards, because she says it's fashionable." Well, there it is; and this sheep-and bat-like following of what people see as "the mode" reflects a surprising lack of real character and taste. Surroundings collected gradually to suit one's habits, as well as one's fancies, are indicative of personality—not those obtained in one swoop by dauntless period-hopping. But well do the wiseacres of the material world understand their clients! They know that, if one sheep sleeps in a maple bed and one bat sips from a green glass goblet, every other will do the same.

HOME HUMOURS

Music Hath Charms.

"Won't you sing something, Miss Johnson?"

"Oh, I daren't after such good music as we have been listening to."

"But I'd rather listen to your singing than to any amount of good music."

"Sounding" the Depths.

A critic went by request to hear a certain politician make a speech.

"Well," said the politician after he had finished. "How was it?"

"Sound—very sound," said the critic.

"Yes," said the politician, and then, hungry for more, he beamed and added: "Sound—and what else?"

"Nothing else," replied the critic.

A Call to Alms:

A street preacher in a Scottish town called a passing policeman, and complained of being annoyed by a certain portion of his audience. He asked to have the objectionable persons removed.

AN EASILY CREATED FROCK

"Well, ye see," said the officer thoughtfully, "it would be deefficult for me tae spot them; but I'll tell ye what I'd dae if I were you."

"What?" asked the preacher eagerly.

"Just gang roun' wi' th' hat!"

Vanity! Vanity!

Husband: "You are the vainest woman I have ever met."

Wife: "What do you mean? Why, I don't think I am half so pretty as I really am!"

"The Little Less."

Fair Customer (in shoe-shop): "I think one of my feet must be a little larger than the other."

Polite Assistant: "Oh, no, madam, smaller if anything!"

"What's in a Name?"

Mrs. Smithson had just engaged a new gardener. One morning she went out into the garden and found him hard at work.

"How's my sweet-william this morning?"

"Nicely, thanks, ma'am," he answered. "But how did you know my name was William?"

"Spoony."

Young Larkin was boasting to his lady friend of the success he had achieved.

"Yes," he exclaimed with assurance. "I was born with a silver spoon in my mouth."

"Fancy that!" returned the girl. "And I always thought you spoke little that on purpose!"

Mixed Fare.

In an omnibus an old lady tendered two farthings and a halfpenny stamp for a penny fare.

The conductor sighed wearily and said: "Next time you come, ma'am, bring a few jam jars."

WISDOM

Now in the days of loving and wooing,
Young girl eluding, your boy pursuing
(I am remembering my own days),
Sweet the time of wooing and wedding,
But hist! the wings of Time ever speeding
(I am remembering my own days).

She shall feast her fill of his praises,
The kiss on her hair and the lover's gazes
(I am remembering my own days).
He shall attain his hour of possessing,
But all too brief is the lover's leasing
(I am remembering my own days).

Say to your girl the sands are running,
Tell her this of old wisdom and cunning
(I am remembering my own days).
That not one hour of her bliss be wasted,
No kiss ungiven, no joy untasted
(I am remembering my own days).

Tell your boy 't is his hour of plenty,
Only once is he golden and twenty
(I am remembering my own days).
Bid him build, since beyond recover
Hast the days of the loved and lover
(I am remembering my own days).

Tell them yet they shall sit and ponder
Dear delights of the lost land yonder
(I am remembering my own days).
Worlds and Time and gray Death yet threaten
The flying Youth and the head rose-wreathen.
(I am remembering my own days).
—Katharine Tynan, in "Observer."

A STENOGRAPHER-MOTHER'S PHILOSOPHY

All day I take their silly talk and make it into little signs,
And then I take the little signs and change them back to talk again.
And for this silly, silly task—and God knows why they want it done—
They pay me gold, dear precious gold, with which I buy you bread and milk.

And then you eat the bread and milk and make it into rosy cheeks.
And then I take the rosy cheeks and print a kiss on this and that.
And then you laugh and snuggle close and heaven is very near to us.
And that is why God lets men make their silly, silly endless talk.

Alysia, in "Life."

NEW LIGHT ON CERTAIN NATIONAL PERPLEXITIES

CHINA'S RECOGNITION OF RUSSIA

Restoration of Russian Property in China: Abolition of Russia's Extraterritorial Rights: C. E. R. Handed to Soviet: China's Claims to Outer Mongolia

FROM RODNEY GILBERT.

Peking, May 31.

China recognized Russia this morning.

The recognition was embodied in an agreement on general principles signed by Dr. Wellington Koo, Minister of Foreign Affairs, and M. Karakhan, the Soviet Envoy. A Treaty, based on these principles, will be negotiated later.

I understand that the agreement is practically the same as that concluded between Dr. C. T. Wang and M. Karakhan.

The signature of the new agreement has come as a bolt from the blue.

Peking, May 31.

A communiqué states that the Sino-Russian Agreement and Declarations (signed by Dr. Wellington Koo and M. Karakhan), Envoy, this morning, embody the principles which will guide the future relations between China and the Soviet, and, in defining these principles, special care is taken to confine all the provisions to the rights and interests of the contracting parties. It is satisfactory to observe, the communiqué declares, that these agreements and declarations were worked out with entire freedom on both sides.

The exchange of views which has taken place between the Soviet Mission and the Waichiaopu extended for a month and has resulted in full agreement on all points discussed. After the affixing of the signatures, the Waichiaopu delivered a Note to M. Karakhan for the immediate re-establishment of normal relations.

Extraterritorial Rights Gone.

Dr. Koo and M. Karakhan signed, firstly, an agreement in principle; secondly, an agreement for the provisional management of the Chinese Eastern Railway, in which it is understood that the Soviet practically replaces the Russo-Asiatic Bank under the 1920 Agreement, the Soviet accepting responsibility for the Railway's debts; and also seven Declarations, (1) regarding the employment of Russians on the Chinese Eastern Railway; (2) cancellation of Russian extraterritoriality; (3) restoration of Russian Government property, such as the Legation and Consulates; (4) restoration to the Soviet of Russian Orthodox Church property; (5) appointment of a Commission to administer and allocate the Russian portion of the Boxer Indemnity, which is entirely appropriated to create a fund for the education of the Chinese people; (6) a joint declaration that China will not recognize the validity of any treaty concluded by Russia since the Tsarist régime with a third party affecting the sovereign rights or interests of China; (7) Russia renounces her concessions in China and undertakes not to transfer such in whole or in part to a third power.

The Indemnity declaration says that the Soviet renounces the Indemnity, which after the satisfaction of all prior obligations secured on it, will be entirely appropriated to create a fund for the promotion of education among the Chinese people. A special commission will be established to administer and allocate the fund, consisting of three persons, two appointed by China and one by the Soviet, the decisions of the commission to be taken by unanimous vote. The fund will be deposited as it accrues in the bank which is to be designated by the said commission.

China's Right to Mongolia.

The Soviet recognizes China's full sovereignty over Outer Mongolia. The question of the withdrawal of Soviet troops will be discussed in subsequent official negotiations, for which a time limit is set.

The agreement shows that Dr. Koo won three of the main points which were put forward in his last Note to M. Karakhan.

The full texts of the Note will be given out later.

The contracting parties declare that in the future neither will conclude any treaties or agreements which would prejudice the rights or interests of the other.

The Soviet recognizes that Outer Mongolia is an integral part of China's sovereignty therein.

The Soviet declares that as soon as the questions for the withdrawal of all Soviet troops from Mongolia, namely, the time limit and the measures to be adopted in the interests of safety of frontiers, have been agreed upon at the forthcoming conference the Soviet will effect such withdrawal.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Peking's Consternation

Peking, June 1.

The news of the signing of the Sino-Russian Agreement utterly surprised nearly the whole of Peking. A hint that the conclusion of the Agreement was imminent had been given to correspondents on Friday on condition the news was not used in China, but most of the Legations and the Chinese and foreign press and public were completely surprised.

The foreign papers to-day make no comment on the matter and the Chinese papers only briefly, but the latter only received the Chinese text at 10 o'clock yesterday evening.

Reuter's correspondent is informed that only 10 Chinese officials knew that the negotiations were proceeding until shortly before the signing.

The result is generally claimed as a diplomatic victory for Dr. Wellington Koo, the Foreign Minister.

The Agreement stipulates that the Soviet takes over the responsibilities for Chinese Eastern Railway debts prior to 1918 only.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Chinese Press Comment: Danger of Bolshevik Propaganda

Peking, June 1.

The Chinese Press makes very little comment upon the conclusion of the negotiations between China and Russia. The "Ching Pao," which is very friendly to the Russians, congratulates the Minister of Foreign Affairs and the staff of the Waichiaopu on the early and satisfactory conclusion of the negotiations with Russia, which opens a new era in diplomacy by giving an example of frank and open dealing. It expresses satisfaction at the change of mind wrought upon Mr. Karakhan, as well as with the fact that the final agreement was based largely on the preliminary agreement reached by Dr. C. T. Wang who was the pioneer in this respect.

The "Chen Pao" takes advantage of the opportunity to give a warning to the Chinese Government that all the great capitalistic countries, since the establishment of the Soviet Government, have looked upon Bolshevism as a danger to mankind, and have been quick to take precautions against Bolshevik propaganda. But owing to the fact that Soviet Russia has proved its ability to stand upon its own feet, many of these great countries have seen fit to accord recognition to Soviet Russia. In opening these relations each country has stipulated that there must be no Russian propaganda carried on within its borders. This shows that they have not ceased to dislike and to fear the Soviet system. The paper then expresses the view that, if Socialism is not in the interests of mankind, no amount of propaganda will ever make it acceptable to the world, while, if it proves beneficial, no restrictions of propaganda will ever keep it out of the minds of men.

In attempting to draw a parallel the "Chen Pao" points out that since the establishment of the Republic, conditions in China have been as bad as in Russia. The Chinese militarists hold the power, and, if this goes on, the middle classes in China will soon be ruined. Thus militarism in China more than anything else is likely to turn the people to socialism. The paper hints that the Russian Legation in future may be the centre of Socialistic teachings. If the Chinese Government wishes to check Socialistic propaganda, it must take the matter in hand itself, but in any case Socialism cannot harm China. —Reuter's Pacific Service.

Hankow, June 2.

Commenting on the Sino-Russian Agreement, the "Central China Post" says that an understanding has been reached which is of grave concern to the world at large and to this locality. It will take a long time to get all the bearings of this portentous agreement, and, as neither China nor the Soviet are famed for their faithfulness in observing agreements, the journal adds, the future possibilities are unthinkable. Japan will probably be the next to link up with the Soviet in the opinion of the "Central China Post."—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Peking, June 2.

A Mandate issued at midnight yesterday says that a Sino-Russian agreement was signed on May 31 settling the problem of the Chinese Eastern Railway and other matters. Formal relations between China and Russia are thus restored.

The Mandate goes on:—"The Chinese and Russian territories meet. The two countries have hitherto been friendly, and the President is gratified that diplomatic re-

[illegible] been fully restored. Let the matter be made clear and far, be referred [illegible]

Peking is [illegible] with rumours to the effect that the Chinese and the Russian Missions will be raised to embassies, but it is officially stated that there is no ground for the same. There are also many rumours on the question as to who will represent Russia and China, but this has not been settled yet.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Moscow Much Pleased and Promising China All Sorts of Benefits

Moscow, June 3.

The official agency states that the news of the conclusion of the Russo-Chinese Agreement was received with great satisfaction.

According to the "Pravda," M. Chicherin terms the establishment of normal relations with China an event of historic importance. He says that relations toward China cannot but be friendly.

The political correspondent of the "Izvestia" considers that the Agreement will strengthen China's international position and facilitate the stabilization of her domestic situation. A Russian commercial mission will leave for Peking and Russian shipping in the Pacific will be increased. The correspondent refers to the necessity of negotiating with Siam, Mexico and Argentina.

The Commissar of Transport, M. Rudzutak, in the course of an interview said that the Agreement would lead to an increase of Russo-Chinese traffic with a consequent rise in the receipts of the Chinese Eastern Railway. Goods from East China would henceforth be sent direct viâ Ussuri and Vladivostok, not Port Arthur.

It is announced that M. Litvinoff will leave for London to-morrow.—Reuter.

Russo-Asiatic Bank and C.-E. Railway

Peking, June 4.

M. Bleuler, representative of the Russo-Asiatic Bank, handed to the Waichiaopu on June 2 a formal protest on behalf of the shareholders and bondholders in the Chinese-Eastern Railway Company against the violation of their rights by the agreement between China and Soviet Russia, signed on May 31 without the knowledge of the said shareholders and bondholders.

Copies of the protest have been given to the Peking representatives of the eight Powers who were signatory to the Washington Treaty.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

CHINA NEGOTIATING WITH GERMANY

Secret Transactions with Presidential Palace: The German Bonds which China Repudiated on Entering War: Big Profits Anticipated by Peking

From Rodney Gilbert.

Peking, May 28.

The Chinese papers which consistently attack the Minister of Finance, Mr. Wang K'o-min, the students, parliamentarians and others, who also assail him periodically, sometimes drop the Gold Franc issue as a weapon and charge him with conniving with the Germans to cheat China out of something in the redemption of the German bonds. It now develops that for some time past they have been bombarding the wrong target. Mr. Wang K'o-min has stated several times that he was conducting no negotiations with the Germans and that, so far as he was concerned, no settlement was in sight. In this he told the precise truth, for while negotiations are actually going on, the Germans are conducting them secretly with the President's office. The chief negotiator, whether with or without the President's knowledge, is the much abused Li An-ch'ing, once the President's number one boy, now his personal treasurer and business manager. Presumably for the sake of greater secrecy the conferences between the Germans and Li An-ch'ing's agents are now held in Tientsin, where it is said that an agreement will soon be reached. The Chinese involved in the transaction have been telling their friends in Tientsin that they will make from 10 to 15 millions out of the deal.

German Minister's Promise.

According to the Chinese involved, Mr. K. A. Balser, Secretary of Legation, went to Tientsin a week ago to enter into conference with Li An-ch'ing or his agents, and it is now said that a settlement awaits a decision from Germany which is expected by cable within a week to ten days. A Chinese who is interested in the negotiations has since then told the writer that when Dr. H. von Borch, Counsellor of Legation, left Peking for Germany about three weeks ago, he carried with him all the documents which have a bearing upon the German bond issue, that he proposed to shorten his journey by leaving the steamer in Italy and travelling overland to Berlin by rail and that he promised to get a decision from the German Government and cable it to the Chinese negotiators immediately after his arrival. It has so far been impossible to elicit from any local Chinese a statement of the character of the proposed agreement. The only safe guess is that the Chinese concerned are compromising upon the demands formerly put forward by the Ministry of Finance in the hope of getting ready money.

The Germans are by no means to be blamed for endeavouring to settle the case out of court as it were. Open negotiations, carried on through the proper Government organs, get the negotiator nowhere in this age, as the difficulties which have been put in the way of the Gold Franc settlement amply illustrate. The German case is particularly urgent moreover because much badly needed German property is held by the Chinese Government pending a settlement of the bond question. There has been less interest in this question in foreign circles in China than in the Gold Franc case because it is more involved and less clearly understood. The writer has heard so many persons confess their ignorance of the whole issue and ask for light upon it, that a brief review of the history of the German bonds and of China's attitude towards them probably will not be a waste of space, especially since some sort of a settlement seems imminent.

The Six Gold Loans.

From 1896 to 1913 Germany made, or participated in, six gold loans to China. None of these had been fully redeemed by China up to the time that she declared war upon Germany and Austria. Shortly after the declaration of war in 1917, the Chinese realized that if the Allies were victorious China might be in line for an indemnity from Germany and the Government felt the need of having something in hand with which to bargain when the time came. To this end it was publicly proclaimed that all Chinese bonds of the German issues were invalid. A little later, after a few reminders from the Legations, the Government came to the realization that all the German bonds were not held in Germany but were widely distributed and that the invalidation of those held in other countries would be ground for protest. They therefore notified the Legations that all bonds held in non-enemy countries could be validated prior to April, 1918, through the presentation of coupons for payment, after which date validation would depend upon documentary evidence proving that the bonds had not been purchased directly or indirectly from Germany after China's declaration of war. In July, 1925, the Chinese Government further notified the Powers that after November of the same year no bonds would be validated under any conditions. The legality of these measures has been questioned by every Power whose nationals are interested and has been the subject of a few formal protests on the ground that bearer bonds cannot be invalidated because of a lack of evidence to prove the date when they left Germany, but most of the Powers are content to await China's settlement with Germany and then protest if their nationals are not protected.

Valid and Invalid.

The position of the German loans at present is shown in the following table:—

Ch[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
	[illegible]	[illegible]
	[illegible]	[illegible]
Chinese 4½ per cent. gold loan of 1898	Total issue	3,000,000
	[illegible]	[illegible]
	[illegible]	[illegible]
Tsin-Pu Railway Loan of 1908	Total issue	3,150,000
	Validated	404,500
	Not valid	2,745,500
Tsin-Pu Railway Supplementary loan of 1910	Total issue	1,890,000
	Validated	252,120
	Not valid	1,637,880
Hukuang Railways Loan of 1911	Total issue	1,500,000
	Validated	388,640
	Not valid	1,111,360
Chinese 5 per cent. Reorganization [illegible] of 1913	Total issue	6,000,000
	[illegible]	[illegible]
	[illegible]	[illegible]

It will be seen from this that China has pronounced invalid bonds of a total value of £10,398,795 (face value). In the Sino-German agreements of 1921 Germany agreed to pay China an indemnity and China agreed to accept invalidated bonds in part payment. China has since expressed her willingness to redeem the bonds herself, if the German Government prefers to pay a cash indemnity, or to adhere to the original agreement if the German Government prefers to buy up the bonds and turn them in for cancellation. By this manœuvre, it will be observed, China has made it clear that she is willing to accept the bonds at market value and not at face value. The Germans have hitherto contended that the bonds should be turned over to the Chinese Government at face value against their indemnity to China.

The Reparations Question.

The particular reason for this German stand, according to the local Consortium bankers, is that the German Government already holds the vast majority of the invalidated bonds, including the bulk of the Hukuang issue, which is popularly supposed to have been bought out by American bankers. It is said here that the German Government, immediately after the Armistice, bought these Chinese bonds in Germany and elsewhere when they were cheap with the idea of using them as tender in payment of reparations to France and the other Allies. When they discovered that they would have to pay something to tender in payment of reparations they withheld them, knowing that they could not be turned over to the Allies at face value but hoping that China might be induced to credit Germany on her indemnity account with full value. This point up to the present has been a subject of dispute. What the Powers are waiting to see is whether Germany will be pledged to take up and turn over all the invalidated bonds or only those actually held in Germany.

American Holding Recognized.

One of the most involved features of the whole case is the unadvertised feud that is going on in Germany between the German Foreign Office and the big private companies with interests in China. The writer does not pretend to understand this situation and most Germans confess that they do not, but it would appear that the Foreign Office, in its anxiety to close the whole issue, was recently prepared to compromise with China by paying a reduced indemnity in a lump sum, leaving it to China to take up the bonds and make what profit she could. This would not only have been an excellent time-saving measure but a good stroke of business because, since Germany is the major bond holder, she could have pushed up the price and turned over a fair profit on the paper which she bought when it was nearly worthless. Private interests, however, have held up the transaction because the present state of affairs is much more comfortable than a resumption of the normal responsibilities which would come with a complete adjustment. In the sight of the big companies the revived responsibilities would more than offset the revived advantages.

In banking circles it has been reported within the past few days that Germany had rejected the latest terms of settlement from China. In view of the fact that Dr. von Borch cannot yet have arrived in Berlin to confer with his superiors, this report must be taken with a grain of salt.

As the result of strenuous protest from America, the Chinese Government has agreed to honour all the German Hukuang bonds held in that country, whether validated or not when she has the money. The Danish Minister has recently protested that his nationals who are holders of Chinese bonds of German issue must be protected. The German share of the Reorganization Loan is secured on the salt revenues and the annual payments up to date have been transfered to London and held there pending the outcome of the Sino-German negotiations. More than £1,000,000 have now accumulated there upon which the Chinese look with hungry eyes.

This is the position in general. The present negotiations may alter it materially and will therefore be watched with great interest by financial folk, if by no others.

Premier Pandering to Parliamentary Opposition

Peking, June 1.

The House of Representatives has requested the Premier and the Ministers of Foreign Affairs and Finance to attend a special meeting of the House to-morrow and give statements regarding the progress of the Sino-German negotiations concerning the German bonds question. It is reported unofficially to-day that these Ministers will not be able to comply.

Peking, June 4.

The main cause of the recent resignation of Mr. Sun Pao-chi, the Premier, appears to be his pandering to the Parliamentary opposition against the proposed Sino-German agreement. Mr. Sun did not attend the regular meeting of the Cabinet yesterday, and his absence afforded an opportunity for a frank discussion of the position.

In the afternoon, members of the Cabinet called at the residence of Mr. Sun Pao-chi, when a full and frank talk took place, resulting in a complete re-union, after which the whole of the Cabinet interviewed the President, who approved the plans which were subsequently carried out, Mr. Sun Pao-chi withdrawing his resigniation.

Later in the evening the Cabinet requested special meetings of the two Houses of Parliament to-morrow, at which the Premier will make a full report on the Sino-German negotiations, and, if Parliament approves, the Sino-German agreement will probably be signed on Friday or Saturday.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Bonds Agreement Signed?

From Our Own Correspondent.

Peking, June 5.

There is a strong rumour that the German Bonds agreement has been signed. No confirmation, however, can be obtained from Tientsin whither, it has been stated, Herr K. A. Balser, Secretary of the German Legation, went to confer with Mr. Li An-ching, the President's chief negotiator.

*Apparently it has so far been impossible to elicit a statement as to the character of the proposed agreement. In 1921 Germany agreed to pay China an indemnity and China agreed to accept invalidated bonds as part payment. China has since expressed her willingness to redeem the bonds herself, if the German Government prefers to pay a cash indemnity.

The German case is particularly urgent because much badly needed German property is held by the Chinese Government pending a settlement of the bond question. There has been less interest in this question in foreign circles in China than in the Gold Franc case because it is more involved and less clearly understood.

SINO-SIAMESE TREATY

Peking, June 2.

Chinese press reports state state that a Sino-Siamese Commercial Treaty will shortly be signed.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Admiral Tu Shih-kuei, Commander-in-Chief of the Navy at Nanking, has telegraphed to Peking stating that a large majority of the men of the Shanghai Independent Navy in Shanghai under Admiral Lin Kien-chang, are desirous of returning again to the Northern fold. The Admiral suggests that $100,000 be sent to the ships as an additional inducement. Meanwhile President Tsao Kun has conferred upon Admiral Tu the highest possible naval honour—the Golden Sword with Three Lions' Heads.

A SOVIET ENVOY TO MONGOLIA

Vasilev's Visit to Peking: The Red Grip Firmer than Ever on the Mongols

From Rodney Gilbert.

Peking, M[illegible]

The Chinese, like many [illegible] observers, have never been able to persuade themselves that the Soviet's promises to evacuate Mongolia and acknowledge China's full sovereignty over that territory were sincere. They keep a suspicious eye on every Russian movement in or out of Mongolia and do some very effective sky work through the Mongol potentates who are pro-Chinese. Under these circumstances it is astonishing that there has been no report in either the Chinese or the local foreign press of the coming and going of Mr. A. N. Vasilev, Soviet Envoy Plenipotentiary to the Mongolian Soviet Republic for a period of two years.

Mr. Vasilev came to Peking some days ago, making no secret of the fact that he was a formally appointed envoy to the independent Mongols and has now left for Urga, after a series of conferences with Mr. Karakhan and his staff, taking no pains to conceal his identity or keep his movements secret. Foreigners who are familiar with the situation in Mongolia and who know Mr. Vasilev, say that the Soviet Government has not and never did have the slightest intention of abandoning the Red grip upon Outer Mongolia and that it is generally understood that the new diplomatic agent will; under the cover of diplomacy, actually exercise the administrative powers of a governor-general.

Why the Chinese have nothing to say about this is difficult to understand. If a British official were to arrive in Peking on his way to Tibet with anything like the credentials that this Soviet agent carries, or if a Japanese were to come and go as Minister to Manchuria, the student outcry would be deafening and the Chinese press would fairly boil over with vituperation.

Russia's Waiting Game.

It must be obvious to the Chinese authorities that Mr. Vasilev's position has a significant bearing upon the future of Sino-Russian negotiations. If Russia had any desire at the moment to resume conferences with the Waichiaopu she would not arouse Chinese suspicions by bringing a man here whose appointment was virtually a recognition of the independence of Outer Mongolia. Mr. Karakhan has just denied in a public statement that the resumption of negotiations with Japan stood in the way of further conferences with China, which is probably true because, whether or not Russia were negotiating with Japan, it is extremely unlikely that she would be negotiating with China under any other condition than that of unconditional recognition. There is little doubt in the minds of most observers here that Moscow severely disapproved of the terms of the Wang-Karakhan draft agreement and that Mr. Karakhan would not be permitted to sign it now, even if he were personally willing to do so. He could not hope to negotiate a new document with the Waichiaopu on terms more to Russia's taste and get the Chinese to sign it. So, from the Russian point of view, the only thing to do is to procrastinate and wait until Russia is in such a strong position internationally that China will recognize her unconditionally, after which, as the legal heir to the Tsar's credits and rights in China she will not have to negotiate her terms but will be in a position to dictate them.

Mr. Vasilev is an ex-lawyer, a man of good education and ability. His political history is unknown to the Russian diplomats of the old régime in Peking, but it is an established fact that he holds the same ambassadorial rank in Urga as Mr. Karakhan does here.

The Chinese press ran a story on Wednesday that Dr. Sun Yat-sen is attempting to borrow $2,000,000 "from British and Japanese capitalists, with the Canton Mint as security."

THE TREATMENT OF CRIME

June 2.

IN the middle of April there was held in the City of Birmingham the great Copec Conference on Politics, Economics and Citizenship. It was an influential and enthusiastic gathering indicating that the movement feels certain of exerting a mighty influence for good in the future. Its President this year was Dr. Temple, the Bishop of Manchester—and a better or abler could not be found. The Vice-President was Dr. Garvie, Principal of New College, Hampstead, and a former chairman of the Congregational Union. The speakers were all able men, but if Copec has a weakness its Achilles heel is just here. Before it can come into its kingdom it must, without discarding the high-brows, capture the imagination of the common man. The problems it discusses most vitally concern him and cannot be settled without his active co-operation.

We choose for consideration one of the subjects presented at the conference and one, which though important in itself may yet be regarded as one of the least important of those that engaged the attention of the delegates. We refer to the question raised under the head of the "Cause of crime and its treatment." In no respect has civilization made more marked progress, in recent years, than in its treatment of the criminal. It is with a feeling of horror one reads the record of the savagery of our criminal courts, less than a hundred years ago, contained in, say, Mackenzie's "History of the Nineteenth Century." And even in our own day, though we have Children's Courts, Deferred Sentences and Probation Officers, it is plain that we are only at the beginning of the reform needed in our criminal law. We published on Tuesday last an article on "How criminals are made" which told of an old man, 63 years of age, who came up for sentence at the London Sessions and who, it was said, had spent two-thirds of his life in prison. Such an instance is a glaring proof of the failure of our present methods of dealing with those guilty of offences against the law. Indeed, this very sentence, "against the Law," contains in itself the germinant idea which has prejudiced the minds and warped that attitude of those entrusted with the task of administering justice. The law has been broken. The majesty of the law must be vindicated though in the process the majesty of the man may be lost sight of.

Lombroso taught that criminals were born. There was a "criminal type" and it was useless to attempt the reformation of those who were predestined to a life of crime. Now, we know that criminals are made and that we, in so far as we are members of the society responsible for producing them, help to make them. It has become fashionable for men to assume a kind of inverted hypocrisy. Moral men scoff at morals and advise the youth, commencing his business career, to "Be good to yourself, boy." Religious men are careful to conceal their interest in religion whereas the gambler and the rake wear their unenviable reputations like orders of merit. The lure of the primrose path is strong and its slope steep, but he who slips on it is inevitably broken. Fiction contains no more pathetic story than that we referred to a few days ago in the tale of the girl who as "The bobbed hair bandit" committed numerous robberies and was apprehended in the city where she went to await the arrival of her expected baby. Sentenced to 10 years' imprisonment someone whispered to her "Was it worth it?" She scribbled her response on a piece of paper. "Tell the girls who would like to do as I did and see their names in the papers, Don't try to do it. While I smile my heart is breaking." How many hardened criminals bide breaking hearts beneath a forbidding exterior? And this is why retributive sentences are discredited. They are easy to inflict and there is some satisfaction in thinking of a certain type of criminal safe behind prison bars for a term of years, but beyond this they accomplish nothing; they harden and degrade, but never reform. Oscar Wilde sang in his "Ballad of Reading Gaol" "T'is only what is vile in man will bloom and flourish there," and yet he had not been long released before he succumbed to the old temptations and the dram-glass. To reform a man is admittedly the hardest thing in the world, but if we devoted as much talent and energy to the task as we do now to convicting and punishing the criminal it is just possible that we should succeed beyond our expectations.

Shanghai is infested by as hard-bitten a brand of habitual criminals as any place on earth. We send them to prison and expel them and they are back again within a week of their expulsion. It would seem worth while to make an effort to discover the reason why these men choose the life of the law-breaker. Is there no other way of making a livelihood open to them? Is it not just possible that they are in the hands of others who, while themselves keeping clear of the meshes of the law, hound them on to steal? The subject needs investigation for we cannot here, anymore than elsewhere, continue a weary round of convictions leading to further convictions, like the path of a blind donkey turning a mill. The outcome of our penal proceedings should have another goal than this.

KING GEORGE

June 3.

HIS Majesty King George the Fifth is 59 years old to-day, having been born at Marlborough House on June 3, 1865, and millions upon millions of his subjects, scattered all over the earth, will join in wishing him many further years of health and happiness and in hoping that he will be spared to rule them for many years to be. It is something of a paradox that the British Empire, one of the oldest of existing monarchies, consists of one of the most democratic peoples in the world, governed and controlled on democratic principles. The basic reason for this is that the British constitution is founded on no fundamental law, but rests on three main administrative principles—self-government, self-support and self-defence, in all of which the voice and wishes of the people are paramount. Our King exists as a King and a Monarch, the pivot of the Empire's constitution and the head of its administration, and while abrogating none of his duties as such, is democratic in that he knows his people, is constantly in touch with them and, what is more important than all, understands them. His success and popularity as a monarch are due to his humanness, his lack of ostentation, his fine understanding, and his reliance on and co-operation with those whom his people have elected to form his Government. Worthy of mention is the fact that only a few weeks ago Mr. Ramsay Macdonald and his daughter spent a short holiday at Windsor Castle, where they were the personal guests of the King and Queen, and occupied apartments in the Royal suite, as distinct from those rooms in which State, diplomatic and formal guests are accommodated. It is significant that in these years of Bolshevism and Communism, of the overthrow of monarchies and the banishment of kings, our own King has retained the love, honour and respect of his people, and that even in the extremest sections of British politics, whatever may be the doctrines expounded, the name of His Majesty the King seldom is referred to except in terms of respect and allegiance. And so with His Majesty's direct heir, the Prince of Wales, who probably knows and understands the British people and the British Empire as no monarch in prospect has done in our history and who, when the time comes, will prove a worthy successor to the Crown of that great Empire of which all true Britons are justifiably so proud.

THE RUSSO-CHINESE AGREEMENT

June 3.

THE agreement concluded in Peking on Saturday whereby China recognizes the Soviet Government is indeed, as Mr. Rodney Gilbert described it yesterday, a bolt from the blue. When we remember the acid terms on which Dr. C. T. Wang and Mr. Karakhan parted barely two months ago, the Soviet's ultimatum, the secret intrigue by the Peking Cabinet to secure something even better than Dr. Wang had obtained, and the public loss of face to China when Mr. Karakhan flung off in a huff in order, as it seemed to everybody, to escape a bargain into which the wily Oriental had entrapped him, but which Moscow could hardly be expected to approve,—it seems incredible that Dr. Wellington Koo should have succeeded so soon in cajoling the Bolshevik into agreement with all the essentials that Dr. C. T. Wang so nearly secured. Soviet Russia has given up to China all the big things, extraterritoriality, her concessions in China, and the Boxer Indemnity: it is really almost another Brest-Litovsk. And in return she does not, so far as can be seen, get anything but a barren recognition. The Bolsheviks are clever men; nobody has ever denied that, and we may therefore presume that they have some arrière pensée in giving away so much without return. Possibly they think that their position in the future will be immeasurably improved by the very fact that they have given all for nothing. They will be able to tell China, so they say to themselves, that they are the real friends and thereby they will score off the other Powers as they please in the Far East. The weak point of this fond scheme is that an Oriental state like China knows no gratitude. Give her an inch and she will take, not an ell, but several yards. It is difficult to get out of China what she has promised to do under her signature: where there is no promise, expectation of any profitable result is futile.

It is impossible to judge the agreement accurately until the full text is received. But there is quite enough in the communiqué published yesterday to indicate that the agreement is fruitful of difficulties. It is one thing to sign such a contract, quite another to get it realized. Take, first of all, the question of the Chinese Eastern Railway, in which it is understood "that the Soviet practically replaces the Russo-Asiatic Bank under the 1920 agreement." That agreement, it may be recalled, was discussed at the Washington Conference, which ultimately accorded to it its recognition. The Chinese Eastern Railway was the subject of three resolutions at Washington, in the first of which we read:—

"that funds will be obtainable from bankers and other outside sources only if suitable conditions are established for the economical operation of the railway and if the funds provided are to be expended under adequate supervision."

Later on we find this:—

"The Powers other than China, in agreeing to the resolution regarding the Chinese Eastern Railway, reserve the right to insist hereafter upon the responsibility of China for performance or non-performance of the obligations towards the foreign stockholders, bondholders and creditors of the Chinese Eastern Railway."

Both clauses are palpably framed to cover the possibility of Soviet interference. The attention of China was drawn to these resolutions during the Wang-Karakhan negotiations, and inasmuch as France is chiefly interested in the Russo-Asiatic Bank, we do not suppose she will very readily acquiesce in the Bank's management being supplanted by the Soviet's. Then, as regards the Russian Boxer Indemnity, this is at present being used as security for the Eleventh Year Loan, which was arranged in the autumn of 1922 in order to tide Dr. Wang Chung-hui's Cabinet over until the tariff revision conference should meet. The Inspector-General of Customs was made responsible for the service of that loan and unless Peking can give him some security as good as what he has, it cannot play ducks and drakes with the Boxer Indemnity on the pretext of fancy education schemes. Lastly, there is the question of church property in China. The title deeds of the Russian church in Shanghai stand in the name of a private individual and are lodged in a foreign Consulate; and we have no doubt that similar precautions have been taken with Russian church property in Peking, Hankow and elsewhere. It will be interesting to see how China proposes to get hold of this property and give it over to the Soviet.

As regards Shanghai, what is to happen under the agreement is particularly interesting. Here it will be remembered. Mr. Grosse holds authority over the Russian community as joint Commissioner with the Chinese Commissioner, so as to get over the difficulty that Chinese officials cannot function in the Settlement. Mr. Grosse was of course well known to the Consular Body, of which he had been a member until China broke off relations with Prince Koudacheff, the former Russian Minister, and it very gladly accepted the arrangement. But the situation may be quite different when a Soviet Envoy comes in, whose Government is not yet recognized by three of the five great Powers, not to mention the smaller ones. Furthermore there are some thousands of Russians in and about Shanghai who are not registered with the Soviet authorities. What is to be their status? That of unrepresented foreigners presumably. But a little reflexion will show that the situation is not as simple as that phrase would, with people of other nationality, imply, and many hardships are likely to ensue. The agreement might have one useful side, that of enabling the repatriation of destitute Russians who have no reason for not returning to their homes. But it can hardly be regarded as a complete instrument yet. For one thing, the Soviet has still to evacuate Outer Mongolia. One imagines that a very long time will elapse before it does so.

CHINA AND RUSSIAN REFUGEES

June 4.

VERY unwelcome news reaches us with reference to the colony of Russian refugees in Chinese territory. It will be recalled that, last autumn, the League of Nations was led to interest itself in their case and appointed Dr. Greig of Kirin its delegate in the Far East to study the question of their repatriation. The first essential was, of course, that the League should obtain from the Soviet Government some guarantee of safe conduct for the refugees to their old homes: without that, they would never be induced to return to Russia. Negotiations were accordingly opened by the League, but, after several months, have come to nothing. The Soviet apparently is not interested in making any arrangement with the League. From Moscow's standpoint this is, perhaps, natural enough. Russia is not yet a member of the League; she is recognized by only two or three of the Powers composing it; and an application for safe conduct for the refugees may appear to her as an indirect insult, implying that without it they can only expect imprisonment or worse. Against this, the League's position is only that of a go-between. These exiled Russians fled from their country to a large extent through misguidance; there is no place for them in China, or anywhere else that can be seen; but being fugitives, they are naturally afraid to go back without some knowledge of what they are going to; it would very greatly improve Soviet Russia's prestige in the eyes of the world, which it would be idle to pretend is not in need of rehabilitation, if she extended to these unhappy and for the most part quite harmless people a helping hand.

Meanwhile the newly concluded agreement between China and Russia offers a possible way of escape. The situation as regards the Russian refugees remains much the same as ever it was, only to this extent worse, that it is increasingly difficult to support those who can find no work to do. There are certainly some who can never go back, until Bolshevism changes altogether: they fought hard against it and are proscribed. But these are the people who, having more education and initiative than the others, have managed to find employment. The great maority of refugees, we think it would be correct to say, blindly followed their leaders. There was no very great reason why they should fly from Russia and there is less why they should not return. But as it has been estimated that there are some 50,000 of them scattered about China, it is, as often pointed out, utterly beyond the power of any private organization to send them back. The Refugee Relief Committee of Shanghai has really done wonders. It has somehow managed to keep its soup kitchens going; it has repatriated some and emigrated others. And we may be sure that the League of Nations will not relax its efforts, in spite of the rebuff it has received in Russia. Unluckily, there are a great many other people than Russians anxious to seek fortune in a new world and the countries which have room for immigrants are not at all anxious to admit them. In Russia there is room and it is obviously the proper place for Russian refugees.

Now we do urge that in this predicament the Chinese Government could and well might take advantage of the agreement with Soviet Russia. When approached by Dr. Greig in connexion with his work for the League of Nations, the authorities in Peking showed themselves very sympathetic: and further, there is no doubt that individual Chinese officials have helped the refugees: we know on excellent authority that Marshal Chang Tso-lin has contributed large sums for their support. There would be nothing unreasonable in the Chinese Government saying to Moscow: "We have in our territories a very large number of indigent citizens of yours for whom we cannot provide work: they never ought to have left Russia and unquestionably most of them did so under a misapprehension and might quite safely be allowed back. Can't you help them to their homes if we bring them to the frontier?" Were any further support thought advisable in making such representations to Moscow, it might possibly be lent by the British Legation, whose Government has recognized the Soviet as China has done. But the time to act is now, when summer is beginning, making it easier to transport the refugees towards their homes and easier for them to find work when they get to Russia.

STATE CONTROL

June 5.

It is more than probable that [illegible] compiled, with results, of all the world's state-controlled industries and undertakings, it would show that in the majority of cases [illegible] economic activity results in financial loss or reduced efficiency, or both, with an inevitable reaction on the prosperity of the industry or undertaking and [illegible] people generally. Experience has proved that with very few exceptions control by a State of any industry is not to be desired in the best interests of that State. It curtails private competition, stifles individual enterprise and discourages initative; it (usually) gives the State immunity from the consequences of defections, responsibilities, laws and liabilities to which private concerns are subject—as witness the State operation of ships—it nullifies, largely, that constant call for and need of economy and efficiency which constitute the [illegible] business; it lumbers itself and encumbers itself with bureaucratic and often redundant official appointments (invariably [illegible] over-paid); and it gives the workers the erroneous impression that behind them is a limitless pit of wealth into which they may delve as deeply and as frequently as opportunities occur [illegible] be manufactured, irrespective of commonsense, equity and the condition of the industry or undertaking.

We have especially in mind the case of the miners at Home, and appreciate, as well as any, that the miner follows a hazardous and unpleasant occupation and that in producing a commodity which, possibly more than any other, has contributed and still contributes to the Empire's greatness, he is worthy of every reasonable consideration and the most generous treatment the industry, as private enterprise, can afford. The miners never have made any secret of their ambition and desire for the nationalization of the coal industry. Whether it is that they imagine that the State can do any better than, or as well as private ownership, or that, urged and directed by their own executives, they think or are moulded into thinking that a Government Coal Department would be easier to extract concessions and advantages from than private employers, is not clear. An excellent indication of their attitude, or rather that of their officials, is furnished by the inquiry which, under the Presidency of Lord Buckmaster, recently investigated conditions and wages in the coal industry. Mr. Herbert Smith, who represented the miners, laid it down that if a colliery could not pay its workers that standard of wages which the Miners' Federation deemed imperative, it ought to shut down! His statement, analysed, means that where the miners are concerned, wages shall not bear any relation to the earning capacity of the undertaking, which would have to continue indefinitely without providing any return on the capital invested in it, or until all the capital had been eaten up, and dismissing its employees and shutting down.

It is an amazing doctrine, not even commendable in theory and one which, in practice, would result in either the speedy extinction of the industry or in the untold wealth that is sunk in the coal business being rendered utterly unproductive, with ultimate detriment to the State as a whole and to the mine-owners and the miners particularly. The Labour party, since it came into power, has shown a somewhat unexpected reasonableness in many matters where unreasonableness was feared, and it is to be hoped that in regard to the interminable howling for the nationalization of the coal industry an equal reasonableness will eventually prevail.

LIGHTER THAN AIR OR HEAVIER?

June 5.

The welcome extended to Captain d'Oisy is still fresh in memory when we have the pleasure of extending a similar cordial greeting to the American aviators, who in beautiful weather arrived yesterday afternoon. In d'Oisy's case bad luck attended him only when he reached Shanghai: provided with another machine he has since pursued a splendid course around north China, Manchuria and Korea and we earnestly hope that skill and good fortune will bring him safely to his journey's end in a few days' time. With the American [illegible] all the worst of [illegible] journey was at the beginning. It seems hardly conceivable that aeroplanes and aviators can have battled through such weather and [illegible] as they encountered in their flight across the northern Pacific. It was a magnificent achievement on which the American airmen are warmly to be complimented; and it may be hoped that in compensation for their endurance at the outset, the same sunny shies which have cheered them since they reached Japan will continue to smile upon them till they reach home again.

Meanwhile the success of these world flights adds new interest to the old controversy of "lighter or heavier than air." Is it the aeroplane or the airship which is destined to be the most popular form of conveyance? The failure of the Zeppelins during the war, as fighting machines, and the achievements of aeroplanes appeared at one time to have settled the question, and to-day it is possible in many parts of the world to take an aeroplane journey from one point to another as easily as to take a train. On the other hand even in war time the airship demonstrated its possibilities in the memorable flight of a Zeppelin from Constantinople to East Africa and return, without a landing. The advantages of airships over aeroplanes are in many particulars obvious: they carry more passengers, are less at the mercy of chance in respect of landing and remain afloat even if their engines break down. It is important to note that the British Government, though refusing to bind itself down to the Airship Guarantee Company for a line of airships, is about to spend considerable sums in lighter-than-air research and to construct a chain of airship stations between England and India. One hazards the suggestion that aeroplanes will come to play much the same part as is filled by motor-cars and charabancs, journeys in them being mostly confined to pleasure trips or where the highest speed is desirable; while the heavy work of transportation and long distance journeys will be performed by airships. But in either case one does not anticipate that the route across the northern Pacific will be much frequented.

THE LONDON CITY CHURCHES

June 6.

We have to thank the London Society for a most fascinating and instructive booklet on the London City Churches, published in answer to the recently opened campaign for the selling off of some of these buildings, of which more presently. No Englishman, certainly none who ever called himself a Londoner, can turn the pages of this little work, without a thrill. Forty-five churches are names and described and every name is instinct with romantic association. Some of them are household words in every corner of the Empire—St. Bartholomew the Great, part of the church of the priory of Austin Canons founded in 1123; All Hallows Barking, where William Penn was baptized and Archbishop Laud's headless body lay; St. Michael Cornhill, known to have existed in 1055 and probably much older; and St. Stephen Walbrook, one of the most perfect pieces of Wren's designing. But somehow it is the lesser known churches which stir the imagination most. St. Andrew Undershaft, for instance, so called because a maypole was put up annually in front of the south door, but this custom was discontinued a trifle over 400 years ago because of a riot. Another church dedicated to the fisherman Saint bears the curious name of St. Andrew-by-the-Wardrobe, because before the great fire the King's wardrobe was close by, as still commemorated in Wardrobe Place. St. James Garlickhithe, says Stow, is so-called because "in old time on the bank of the river of Thames, near to the church, garlick was sold;" and St. Katherine Cree, another odd name, appears to be a contraction of St. Katherine de Christchurch. The "Lion Sermon" has been preached in this church on every October 16 since 1647, to commemorate the escape from a lion of Sir John Gaymer, Lord Mayor of London, who also presented the church with a stone font in gratitude for the same deliverance. Fancy any Lord Mayor now being exposed to danger from a lion: though, if he were, we have sufficient belief in the respect of City dignitaries for the ancient relics and customs of London to be sure that he would make some presentation in thankfulness therefor.

Yet there must be people in the City—let us hope no Lord Mayor or Alderman past or present—who would have some of these old churches pulled down, the sites sold for offices and the proceeds, together with endowments, distributed among needy parishes elsewhere. The ground of attack is that the night population of the City of London numbers hardly as many thousands as that by day reckons hundreds of thousands; that, in consequence, Sunday services are most meagrely attended: and that City parsons enjoy fat incomes and do nothing for them. But as the Rev. Arthur West, rector of St. Dunstan's-in-the-East, shows in the London Society's booklet, much in these arguments is based on misconception. The average income of the clergy, he points out, including the four suffragan bishops, is £750 without a house. Over £100,000 is taken annually from the funds of City churches, without their having any say in the distribution, and given to poorer parishes elsewhere. And it is a vital mistake to assume that Sunday is the only day on which these churches can be or are used by worshippers, as records of special Lenten services clearly show. Mr. West frankly admits that Sunday services in some churches are poorly attended, and he makes the useful suggestion that the clergy of these buildings should be detailed for mission work in the suburbs where many City workers live and during the day follow their people to the City to conduct special services. The success of short week day services at convenient hours in many churches, from St. Paul's downwards, suggests that these might be greatly extended, given proper organization. Apart altogether from the religious side of the question, Mr. West argues well that:—

It is scandalous to assume that City merchants, clerks, women typists, young boys and girls and other workers, do not set a very high value on these oases of refreshment which brighten daily toil. The tiny gardens are frequently an additional joy. Even though many of the workers may not be attracted to services or music within the Churches, it is the case that the beauty of architecture, the sense of history and an atmosphere other than that of mere business, enriches and gives repose to their lives. The sites of the Churches would be of comparatively small value without the gardens, and the loss of these, merely as material breathing spaces, would be a real calamity. They are at present protected by law.

That last sentence gives comfort and certainly there are very few Englishmen abroad who will not pray that it may be long before the law is repealed. It is a characteristic of Englishmen whose lot is cast outside their native land that they specially resent the disappearance of old landmarks. They do not read history, perhaps, but they have none the less a strong historical sense; they revere an ancient custom, an ancient house, an ancient title, because it is ancient. It seems to them always to have been a part of their native land and they would have it so remain. Nor do we for one moment believe that in this they are at all different to the overwhelming majority of their brethren at Home. We do not believe that those who advocate pulling down City churches are more than a tiny minority, who have been taking advantage of the passing utilitarianism and restlessness of the times to press their so-called reforms. Bolshevism is not by any means only expressible in terms of red ties and labour unrest. The same spirit is visible in jazz music, futurist art, muckrake novels, the clamour for revision of the Prayer Book and the desire to destroy City churches in the sacred cause of business and for what may be given to the poor—like the proceeds of the suggested sale of a certain "box of ointment, of spikenard very precious." And because this spirit will pass, like all other evil spirits which from time to time have been permitted to buffet mankind, we ought to be the more strenuous in fighting it. To that end the London Society is rousing itself in defence of the City churches. It is a brave, stout-winded organization, which has already proved of immense value in saving old London from materialist and money grubber, and one wishes it success in its new championship.

FOREIGN CHILDREN IN CHINA

The physical care and [illegible]tion of foreign children in China must often occasion anxiety to their parents who may be sometimes inclined to think it would have been better if they had never left the homeland. Yet it is doubtful whether the children suffer much loss from residence in a foreign land. As to their physical health, circumstances have greatly changed since foreign families first came to China, when travel was difficult and the causation of most of the common diseases with the means of their prevention was not understood. In this part of China they are usually well and strong, not thin and pale like those who live in the tropics. Of course there are risks and disadvantages here as everywhere else and for the purpose of discussion these may as well be stated. The children spend much of their time with the Chinese servants and without the knowledge of their elders it is easy for them to obtain native comestibles, mysterious and delectable but not very digestible, and owing to the ignorance and carelessness of the Chinese the defences against infectious disease are sometimes broken through. Moreover, the children learn from the servants a great deal it would be better for them not to know, and require far too much personal service. As to their early education, the frequent vacations, furloughs and other family changes tend to make it discontinuous and uneven; and in the outports and inland places the children seldom receive the wholesome discipline which comes from the close companionship with numerous others of their own age and class.

On the other hand, boys and girls who live in the East have many unusual advantages. It is a pleasure to all normal children to travel and see the world. Healthy boys demand more; they long for perilous and sanguinary adventures—at least in imagination—so that nearly all pass through a stage when they wish to be pirates or Red Indians. Captain Evans, who took command of the Scott Antarctic Expedition after the death of its leader, has just told us the delightful tale—ever new and ever old—of how at the age of eight he and two other boys of the same age, who like himself were in disgrace at school, bought a stock of provisions on credit and made for Barking Creek intending to sail away for the Spanish Main. Sad to say, the police frustrated this daring enterprise, and the three diminutive buccaneers were taken to the police-station. Parenthetically, it may be remarked, it is this inborn love of adventure and of the sea which is one of the sources of England's colonizing power and of her maritime greatness. Indeed, some say that not a few missionaries are impelled by the same spirit though they may not be aware of it. However, the point we wish to make is this: in England the children are unable to satisfy their adventurous longings except in a small way by visits to the cinema, whereas those who go to China actually see a good deal of the world and of the various peoples in it, and sometimes meet with a few real adventures. One or two boys in China have won imperishable fame among their companions by having been actually captured by brigands. Much more valuable, however, is the educative influence of travel and residence in foreign lands, as it enables the children to acquire an openness of mind, alert powers of observation and sensitiveness to new impressions which should more than compensate for educational irregularities; at any rate, when sent home to be educated, they appear well able to hold their own.

But there comes a time, after the children have entered their teens and are becoming "weedy" in more senses than one, when it is necessary, if possible, to send them home to finish their education, and to deepen their patriotism: for they cannot feel quite the same towards the old country as those born and brought up there. While it is true they do not know England who only England know, it is also true that they do not know England who never to England go. This separation between parents and children is the hardest trial of all, and is probably the cause of more foreigners leaving China than sickness, business failure or any other cause. It is a great problem. If the children are left in the care of strangers in England and do not see their parents for years, it is not fair to them and it weakens their filial affection. If the wife goes with them she becomes a "grace widow," and the husband suffers a double loss and reverts to bachelor existence. Perhaps the difficulty will be solved when it is possible to travel to England swiftly and at reasonable cost, either by railway or by aeroplane. In any case the young birds must leave the nest sooner or later. On the whole, we think that foreign children in China have a far better time than the children at home who seldom or never go abroad.

THE REVELATION

An idle poet, here and there,
Looks round him; but, for all the rest,
The world, unfathomably fair,
Is duller than a witling's jest.

Love wakes men, once a lifetime each;
They lift their heavy heads and look;
And, lo, what one sweet page can teach
They read with joy, then shut the book.

And some give thanks, and some blaspheme,
And most forget: but, either way,
That, and the Child's unheeded dream,
Is all the light of all their day.

"THE British Legion Album," compiled by Field-Marshal Earl Haig in connexion with his appeal for ex-Service men, will shortly be on sale in Shanghai, at Messrs. Kelly and Walsh's. According to the "Referee," this is the most wonderful five-shillingsworth ever offered, for here is something from every well-known man and woman in the Empire—Royalties, soldiers, sailors, churchmen, statesmen, authors, artists, oh! everybody you can think of. No such a collection of signatures, pictures, and quotations, all reproduced with the most scrupulous fidelity, has, I should think, ever been got together before or ever will be again. All the profit from the sale goes to help the ex-Service men, and five shillings seems little enough to spend in so good a cause.

NOTES AND COMMENTS

The Unemployment Debate

One would have liked rather more, in the telegraphic report of the debate on unemployment, of the grounds on which the Opposition based their attack on the Government's unemployment policy. For on the face of it, it seems rather hard to criticize the Government for not yet having realized the millennium which some of its supporters have been promising when Labour should get into power. Mr. MacDonald's schemes of State works are interesting, especially as regards afforestation, though that is hardly the sort of work on which to put untried hands with success. Meanwhile the only practical cure for unemployment is improvement of world conditions and harder work. For instance the way in which the bricklayers are sticking up the country undoubtedly reacts all round: a three-roomed cottage, we are told, cannot now be built for less than £500 whereas before the war it could certainly have been put up for £150. Cost of materials will not alone explain the difference. We do not think this paper can be accused of being unsympathetic to Labour, but there is a good deal of a very rotten spirit still prevalent for which Capital cannot altogether be blamed. Writing in the "Weekly Dispatch" on foreign competition, Mr. W. L. Hichens, chairman of Cammell, Laird & Co., says:—

> I am inclined to think that in some quarters there is an exaggerated idea of the degree to which other countries are becoming industrially self-dependent. No doubt this tendency was developed to some extent as a result of the war, but there are still plenty of potential markets for British goods, provided we can produce cheaply enough.
> It is a matter of common knowledge that prices in the export industries generally have been so cut as to yield little or no profit. No one can contend that to-day, at any rate, the capitalist is reaping an undue reward. His reward, in fact, is so inadequate that new capital will not be enticed into British industry. Industries are being carried on mainly in the interests of the worker, and he is the person who will suffer most if they are closed down through the loss of our foreign markets.
>
> Surely, therefore, Labour has everything to gain by joining with Capital in a full and frank inquiry as to the steps which are necessary in order to recover our foreign trade.
>
> If Labour can suggest a better way everyone would welcome it.

Passport Visas

An American contemporary makes the sensible suggestion that as the quota of immigrants admissible to the United States has been cut by one half, thereby depriving steamship companies of much of their revenue from steerage traffic, the time is opportune for the authorities to take steps to compensate the lines for this loss by facilitating tourist travel. The reference is particularly in regard to the abolition of the passport and visa nuisance. There is no doubt that during the war, when the control of passenger traffic was necessary and an accurate check on all people travelling was essential, passports and visas constituted a means of great assistance, but though the signing of the Peace Treaty meant that their usefulness and necessity had vanished to a great extent, they still remain, not in the United States alone, to harass those who travel and to prevent many from travelling who otherwise would. Although, since the termination of hostilities, a few of the very onerous restrictions have been removed, many still remain, and one of the chief considerations to those about to travel is in getting passport and having them visaed for those countries or ports at which they are going to land or at which they might land. There still is room for a great deal of improvement in this matter. Another aspect of the subject is the charges that are made for visas. In no case is a visa at all what one could consider cheap, or even reasonable, and in regard to some countries the charges are so high as to be little less than extortionate. Money is expensive in these days, and the average person who travels, either on leave or on business, can ill afford some of the charges that are made by Consular authorities for visas. Admitting that (even with the miserably inadequate salaries that are paid to Consular officials in most cases) Consulates are expensive institutions to be included on a nation's charge sheet, no real justification exists for mulcting the traveller in some of the sums he has to pay before he can enter a country. A visitor to any land almost proves an advantage to that land—perhaps indirectly—and to discourage travel, as the present scale of visas undoubtedly does to some extent, is a policy both mistaken and near-sighted.

The Shanghai Exhibition

Truly the ways of the Chinese frequently are most extraordinary. For months Mr. Bena has been freely advertising his idea of an International Exhibition for Shanghai and has been doing everything one man could be expected to do in order to find out what support he might expect and what opposition, if any. He was not so sanguine that he did not imagine there would not be a single drop of cold water poured upon the project and it was common knowledge that some foreigners of standing were inclined to be sceptical as to the possibilities of success, being principally impressed with the tightness of money at the moment and realizing that a very great deal of money would have to be expended before anything at all came in. However, Chinese support to the very fullest extent was counted upon, for, after all, the biggest advantage would be with the Chinese. Not a single word to reverse this opinion ever was heard, even at the joint meeting when the views of all parties were asked for. Now comes the extraordinary announcement that the Chinese Government long ago had decided upon a World Exhibition, to be run entirely by the Chinese and to be held at Shanghai, and an official notification has been published to the effect that, in view of this decision, no Chinese support can be given to Mr. Bena's scheme. That, presumably, puts an end to the whole business, but one cannot help wondering what sort of an exhibition it will be that is run by a Government that cannot find sufficient money with which regularly to pay any of its servants, from gatekeepers to Ambassadors. Mr. Bena and his associates very frankly admitted that they could not hope to run an exhibition without the fullest co-operation of the Chinese. The Chinese Government apparently believes that it is quite capable of managing an exhibition without any assistance whatsoever from foreigners: or perhaps it believes that the foreigners will be compelled to join in. At least it seems remarkable that this Government Exhibition has been decided upon and a committee appointed to draft details without a single hint of it becoming known to the outside world. The Government will have to appoint a more wideawake publicity agent if any overseas visitors are to be attracted to the Exhibition.

The Housing Scandal

Unless there is more to be heard which will put a different complexion on the scheme, the British Labour Government's method of solving the workmen's housing problem, reported in Reuter's telegrams, strikes one as being one of the most iniquitous pieces of unbusiness-like legislature one has seen for a long time. A 15-years' contract is to be made for two and a half million houses to cost £1,376,000,000, the State paying £926,000,000 and local authorities the rest. We believe we are right in saying that the houses are to contain only three rooms, and a simple division shows that they will cost over £550 apiece. No provision appears to be made for revising prices before the end of the contract, although it is a moral certainty that costs, even for Government work, must have dropped considerably before another 15 years are up, if normal conditions are allowed to prevail. But even as things are to-day excellent cottages can be built for much less than what the Government proposes to guarantee to the builders for 15 years. One such house has been put up at the Wembley Exhibition—we think we are right in saying the cost was under £200; and "Country Life," which organized a cheap cottage competition before the war, has lately published an article showing what can now be done for about that sum. In other words, just when the building trade, which has notoriously been the most rapacious, dilatory and profiteering since the war, is beginning to learn some sense and moderation, the government comes in and encourages it in stiff-neckedness, saddling the country for 50 years ahead with this preposterous bill. And it is a psychological certainty that work done under such conditions will be cheap and nasty work. One devoutly hopes that there are enough business men in the House of Commons to stop this conspicuous "hold-up" of the taxpayer.

The Cost of Building

Our correspondent "Unconverted Londoner" misses the logic of his own facts. If it cost £1,000 in 1920 to put up a four-roomed house, and the Government to-day is proposing to pay £550 for a three-roomed house, is it not reasonable to expect that two or three years hence prices will have fallen lower still? And the Government scheme is to make a contract for 15 years at £550, which, besides being most unbusiness-like as regards future probabilities ignores the fact (as shown by another correspondent) that even to-day several lots of houses have been built in different parts of the country for very much less. As for the assumption that "Labour can be trusted to build good and substantial houses for its own supporters," we are not at all sure. Our correspondent must remember that building is one of the so-called sheltered industries: it has no need to fear competition from abroad, has, therefore, no inducement to abate its demands, speed up its output or improve the quality of its work, and it has notoriously taken the fullest possible advantage of its immunity since the war. If a business government, which was prepared to fight, could get no more patriotic behaviour out of the building unions, what is a labour government likely to get, whose supporters' chief demand is that it shall cut down working hours and increase wages?

"K. of K."

Eight years ago on June 5 occurred what always will be considered by British people as one of the saddest tragedies of the war—the loss of H. M. S. Hampshire and with it the untimely death of one of the most famous of all British soldiers, Lord Kitchener. It is now ancient history how Kitchener, on the eve of his departure for Egypt, cancelled his journey and abandoned his position at the urgent request of the Government, backed by the press of the whole country. He assumed forthwith the onerous duties of Secretary of State for War, and while opinions as to his conduct of the War Department and the influence of his policy on the progress and success of operations still may differ considerably, none can question the lofty spirit of the man, his ability as a soldier and his genius as an organizer. The relentless attacks made on him by two great London newspapers, the manifestations of public anger at these attacks, and his famous personal explanation to members of Parliament on his war policy and plans will be comparatively fresh in memory. Mr. Asquith, with whom he was stated to be at considerable variance prior to his death, paid him a glowing tribute some two years ago in an American magazine, and one gathers that although, while he was at the War Office, there were many occasions when he did not see eye to eye with the members of the War Cabinet, none with whom he came in contact had any doubt as to his organizing ability and administrative genius. His one fault—if fault it be—appears to have been his singleness and isolation, and his forcefulness and determination, and whether or not these qualities had any appreciable effect on the conduct of the war, the name of Kitchener will go down to posterity as a great man and a great soldier, whose love of country transcended all other feelings.

My Lady's Fashions

Once again voices are raised against the liberty which the modern girl permits herself in the matter of dress. In this respect it is perhaps only fair to differentiate. A few years ago any girl seen riding on horseback astride would have been denounced as unsexed. Now not only is this way of riding almost universal, in fact certainly in the Far East, and in America, more women ride astride than side-saddle, but many women who ride constantly live almost all day in breeches. Again, a lady who puts on knickerbockers and sports stockings as an easy and suitable costume for a water picnic does not seem to us fair as a subject for criticism, that being the sort of dress that any number of women don for a sporting or athletic occasion; and whether she has two little girls to bring up or not need no more debar her from dressing in this style than it would be considered a reason for her not riding astride on horseback. In these matters custom is everything. Nobody objects to Chinese women wearing trousers. Indeed many people will think they look better in them than in skirts. Ten or twelve years ago the skirts of Western women came right down to the ground. When they first shortened them, in the old saying, "a little above two feet," it was a shock to many susceptibilities. The same might be said in respect of open-necked blouses. Yet if we go back 100 years we find that a lady's every-day dress was such as now would be considered sufficiently décolleté for a dance. That there may be girls who deliberately take advantage of "this freedom" so to speak, of "malice prepense," and in order to court attention, is another question, one that we prefer not to discuss. Of them and of liberty generally it may be said that because such-and-such a girl thinks a thing right, it by no means follows that she is right. There are bounds in all things.

The Punjab Martyr

Unfeigned satisfaction will be felt that at last a Judge of the High Court of England, who is above all political considerations and has for 25 days sifted all the facts with the aid of a special jury, has publicly vindicated the unfortunate General Dyer. We congratulate Sir Michael O'Dwyer on winning his libel action: it is a fine thought that there are courts of law to give him the satisfaction which it is to be feared the Secretary of State would never have given. But the sentence one reads with special pleasure is that "the Judge, summing up, expressed the opinion that General Dyer had acted rightly and had been wrongly punished by the Secretary of State for India." The circumstances of the Amritsar affair are sufficiently recalled in the report of the first day's proceedings, which we reproduce from the "Times." Admitting fully that General Dyer acted strongly, the crisis demanded it; and be it remembered, that he did not order the firing without the fullest warning being given beforehand that firing would be the consequence of disobedience to the proclamations against any assemblage of mobs. Be it further remembered that, while his case was pending, the Bishop of Calcutta himself wrote to the "Times" warning the British public what would be the consequences of unjustly punishing General Dyer—consequences for the prestige of British justice, for the safety of white men and women and for the whole cause of law and order in India. That was nearly five years ago. The warning was disregarded and who will say in the light of subsequent events that it was not amply justified? General Dyer was broken not because justice demanded it, but at the dictates of politicians pandering to the least respectable elements in India. It is said that General Dyer is dying. At least his last moments will be cheered by the public vindication of his honour by an impartial judge as against the politicians who threw him to the wolves.

THE Chinese press reports that a junk, laden with a large quantity of sugar, which left Nantao on May 22 for Wenchow, was attacked by a gang of pirates on the following day while passing through a place known as Datiaoko, on the border of Kiangsu and Chekiang. A member of the crew who resisted was killed, but the others were unharmed. The boat returned to Shanghai at once and the matter was reported to the authorities. It is rumoured, states the Chinese press, that a fishing boat at that place was also captured by pirates, and efforts are now being made to locate the craft.

HOW MOSCOW GIVES ITSELF AWAY

The Budget Deficit of 400 Millions: Extraordinary Revelations of Financial Juggling: Object Lesson for Foreign Banks and Governments

From Rodney Gilbert.

Peking, May, 30.

Soviet speeches and manifestos always serve to remind us that persons who think they are particularly clever never fail to over-reach themselves. To describe them in Irish, a high Red functionary never opens his mouth without putting his foot in it. Our best evidence against the Soviet rulers has been supplied from the beginning by themselves in statements through which they hoped either to deceive or convert the world. They are the most industrious propagandists who have ever functioned, but to a careful reader every publication which comes out of Russia only proves in one way or another how unfit the big men in the Soviet régime are to rule Russia.

The inspiration for all this moralizing is to be found in two reports upon the Russian budget which have recently emanated from Moscow. A Reuter telegram, dated May 23, quoted Rykoff, Lenin's successor, to the effect that there would be a 400 million gold rouble deficit in the Soviet's 1924 budget. The writer remarked to a friend that details would be interesting and was informed that Kameneff had, at the end of March, issued a public statement which discussed the budget in great detail and had also suggested means of making up the deficit.This statement was republished in the Harbin "Isvestia," of April 14 and 15. The writer then prevailed upon a goodnatured Russia friend to find copies of this paper and translate Kameneff's dissertation. The document appears to be an extract only from a much fuller report, but it certainly gives enough information upon Russian financial methods to astonish the world. There can be no possible doubt that Kameneff speaks with authority. Rosenfeldt (his real name) stands next to Rykoff, as vice-chairman of the central executive committee, and is married to Trotsky's sister. He is therefore one of the inner circle and the statement published by the "Isvestia" is in every sense ex cathedra. Before indicating the significance of a number of statements which Kameneff makes, it is best to give the translated text, which is as follows:

Kameneff's Report

Reasons for monetary reforms:

(a) Peasants refuse to sell their produce against Soviet money.

(b) Workmen's wages could no more be satisfactorily fixed as the index figures were no more correct.

At the moment of the reform 300 million roubles were in circulation (February 1924). To the Autumn of this year it will be necessary to issue another 150 million Roubles; will it be sufficient and will the country be able to absorb them? Nobody can know.

"To arrive at a really stable monetary system three conditions are necessary:

The state budget must not show any deficit:

	1922 expenses were 90. million Rbls. a month
December	1923	—	—	162
February	1924	—	—	157
[illegible]	—	—	—	[illegible]
April	—	—	—	estimated 151

The budget for 1924 is 1750 million Rubles not including the expenses for the gold budget, i.e., expenses for the DBO (East Siberia) and the Transcaucasus. Against it are 1350 M. Rubles revenue maximum. This, if expenses are reduced to the utmost and kept down to a maximum of 145 M. Rubles a month. How shall the minimum deficit of 400 M. Rubles of this year be covered?

By issue of the 2nd lottery loan which is compulsory.

1st peasant loan 50 M. Rbls. which will give only 16 M. Rbls. effectively.

By issue of the guaranteed loan.. i.e. 60 per cent. of all the reserves accumulated in Industry must be paid into the State Bank against Bonds of such loan. This arouses strong opposition by Djerjinski Pistakoff (Minister of Industries).

New bank notes will be issued for the other half, or 200 million Rubles.

"With all the above we shall be still forced to take advantage of partisan measures, as follows: we shall retain 20 per cent. in April of the salary of our Soviet clerks. This is a very good measure, people get fixed salaries, we cut a part off to save 2 1/2 million but we remain nevertheless on a budget of 151 million Rubles for April

Bank note issue and credit for Industries:

The February issue was 20 million Rubles. In March we cut it down to 6 million Rubles but in April we allowed 14 million Rubles.

Remember that sacrifices are necessary!

This year's budget is 2.000 million Rubles, next year will be 2300-2400 million Rubles. The peasants taxations should give 285 million Rubles. To get the balance somebody must suffer. This is the first obstacle.

The second obstacle is the fixation and reduction of prices for goods necessary to the people. Where we have the full control prices went down, but prices on other products rose. Here we see that our institutions are not powerful enough to compete with private enterprises and if the private capital can beat us and prices rise, then our monetary reform will not be able to hold out.

Obstacles in the way of control of the markets.—Because of the policy of private capital as opposed to the inefficiency of technical weapons and the inability of state managers and managers of the cooperative societies, the prices for products can only be reduced when we control sufficient quantities to impress the markets.

Balance of Foreign Trade.

In August we exported 175 million pood of wheat and we are saved against a fall of our currency by a balance in our favour. Our plan was to export for 437 Mill. Rbls. and to import only for 300 Mill. Rbls. to which we have to add some 20 Mill. Rbls. for our representatives abroad. Taking into account some other items we still have about 60 Mill. Rbls. to the good This would allow some imports, for instance meat. The meat market is disorganised and no reserves are available.

Stabilization of Wages.

The salaries for workmen must be kept on the same scale as for March and that for three months. The result will show our success in keeping the prices for the lifes necessities on the same level. If we cannot do it, the increase in prices of such necessities will necessarily be followed by an increase in wages and that will be a heavy blow to the monetary reform.

How can the possibilities of issue be used? On May 1 the issue will be 20 Mill. Rbls. in silver coins, 90 Mill. Rbls. treasury notes and 305 Mill. Rbls. chervonetz banknotes, in all 415 Mill. Rbls. This leaves, if we take that on the crop increase we may issue up to 450 to 500 Mill. Rbls., a reserve of 35-85 Mill. Rbls. for 6 months to cover deficits to redeem Soviet notes and for credits to the Industries. It is not altogether possible that this amount will be sufficient.

Crisis in Small Money.

There should be small money and notes totalling at least 33 per cent. of the chervonetz banknote issue. Having issued 305 Mill. Rbls. in chervonetz and 110 Mill. Rbls. Treasury notes and silver coins, the last are only 25 per cent. of all the money in circulation. Before the war 40 per cent. small money was in circulation.

Deficit Greater Yet.

It will be seen that Kameneff, or Rosenfeldt, confirms Rykoff in his statement that the deficit will be G.R.400,000,000. His own figures are, however, in contradiction of this statement and indicate that the deficit will be very much greater. He says that the budget for the year is 1.750 million roubles but a little later he says that the 1924 budget is 2,000 millions. The average of expenses in February, March and April, according to his figures, was 151.66 millions. He suggests no means of reducing this except through a reduction of clerks' salaries in the month of April. While looking forward to this temporary reduction, he still estimates the April expenses at 151 millions. Working on the average of the three months given, the annual expenses would be approximately 1,820 million gold roubles. Local Russians explain that the account for the expenses of the gold budget in East Siberia and Transcaucasus covers the discrepancy between the 1,750 million budget and the 2,000 million budget in Kameneff's text. In other words to show a clean slate, Kameneff has to add another 250 million gold roubles to his budget and therefore to his deficit. This brings the deficit up to something like 720 millions. To cover this be proposes to make several questionable levies to the tune of 200 million roubles. He will issue paper for another 200 millions, but this is only another form of contracting a debt, so the real shortage is presumably something like 520 roubles.

It may be only a coincidence, but it is interesting to note that the loan for domestic use which the Soviet agents in London are trying to negotiate is £50,000,000. The total that they ask for is £150,000,000, of which £100,000,000 is to remain in Great Britain. This balance of £50,000,000 would just about cover a budget deficit of G.R.520,000,000. That the real purpose of the loan is to make good this deficit is, of course, nothing but surmise, but it is worth thinking about.

Red Juggling with Finance.

These questions of finance raised by Kameneff's report are after all unimportant abroad as compared with other revelations of Soviet methods embodied in the report. The way in which Kameneff proposes to raise G.R.200,000,000 against the deficit is astonishing to anyone who has not been steeped in the Red theory. The lottery loans and the peasant loans are compulsory assessments upon taxpayers levied in proportion to the taxes they pay. The bonds are printed in denominations as low as one rouble, and they sell to the taxpayers, who are forced to take them, up at 85. They are then legal tender and can be used at face value to pay taxes or other Government charges. The appropriation of 60 per cent. of the reserve capital of all industrial establishments, both state and private, in exchange for State Bank bonds is an even more startling procedure. It is amusing to find Djerjinski, the notorious Pole who was until recently head of the Cheka and the detested sponsor for countless crimes and outrages, protesting against this measure. Djerjinski, it would appear has made a few investments and accumulated some reserve capital.

The third measure suggested—the reduction in clerical salaries for April by 20 per cent.—is an arbitrary measure which would not be tolerated in any but an absolutely free country, where the people are the masters.

The Cost of Espionage.

The statement that the Soviet's foreign representatives cost the Soviet G.R.20,000,000 has been of no little interest here where it is known that Tsarist Russia's appropriation for diplomatic and consular representatives abroad never exceeded R.9,000,000, within which sum were included the expenses of the Petrograd Foreign Office as well. Kameneff's quotation, to judge from the context in the paragraph on balance of trade, does not include Foreign Office expenses. In spite of the fact that the Soviet Government maintains only a fraction of the number of legitimate agents abroad which the Tsarist Government supported, in spite of the fact that consular salaries have been materially reduced under the Red régime, the Soviet appropriation for representatives abroad was in 1923 more than double the entire cost of the whole Tsarist foreign service including home offices. This gives one some idea of what is being spent upon news agencies, propaganda, espionage and subversion of law and order in other countries. To mention only what we are locally familiar with, it accounts for the generous sums spent upon Korean malcontents, it explains how Rosta survives and it accounts for the tone of several procommunist papers in Peking.

Those who read Kameneff's statement carefully will find other points of interest which do not have to be expounded. It is a document which should be in the hands of every Occidental and Japanese statesman who shoulders any responsibility for negotiations with the Soviet. An unconditional recognition of Russia provides for no extraterritorial rights. The foreign merchants who go there to do business will be subject to precisely the same sort of levies and impositions as those which Kameneff proposes to inflict upon Russian industry and upon the Russian people to make up his budget deficit unless their treaties provide for special exemption. These same statesmen must also think twice before they accept a Russian promise to abstain from propaganda when they know from Kameneff that the Soviet's agents abroad cost Russia G.R.20,000,000 annually.

Weighted Scales.

While the Soviet is up for discussion it may be worth while to append to this article another example of the way in which the Reds persist in giving themselves a great deal of adverse advertising. In a general way those readers who can get access to Russian published documents are advised to read through the new Code for Criminal Procedure, approved by the 4th Congress of the High Executive Council, October 23, 1922. The following clause from this code will be of immediate interest to those who care to go no deeper into the subject of Red Russian law:

"Those tribunals whose decisions do not conform to the spirit of justice of the Russian Soviet Republic and to the interest of the masses of the workers will be given disciplinary punishment."

In other words the judge who interprets the law, rightly or wrongly, in a criminal case against the wishes of the Soviet, or in opposition to the sentiments of the holy riff-raff, is to be punished for it. In short it is Soviet bureacracy first, mob sentiment next and justice last. Nothing could so thoroughly epitomise the "spirit of justice of the Russian Soviet Republic" as this little clause in the new code.

AMERICAN ARSENAL IN CANTON

Said to Have Been Resold to Peking, Canton not Having Completed Payment

Hongkong, May 31.

A communiqué issued by the Canton Government says:—

"A protest has been lodged with the American Consul-General against the removal of the Rabbit Arsenal plant from Canton and its sale for the manufacture of arms in the North. The plant is Government property. It was sold to the Government for Gold $1,600,000, of which G.$1,200,000 have been paid, leaving an unpaid balance of G.$400,000. There had been an arrangement that pending the payment of the balance the plant should be stored at Canton in a godown. The vendors, who are of American nationality, are no longer willing to continue the arrangement and have entered into a contract to re-sell the plant through a Japanese intermediary without notifying this Government nor arranging for the re-payment of the G.$1,200,000.

"There is now a Japanese steamer at Canton with a specially recruited gang of labourers from Manila who have begun preparations to load the plant for shipment to the North.

"As the United States is a party to the so-called Arms Embargo Agreement, it is an interesting question whethher the removal of the plant from Canton and its re-sale to any othher party in China would not constitute an American breach of the agreement vis-a-vis of the other signatories. On the other hand, the retention of the plant by this Government could not be so construed since the United States was not a party to the Agreement when the plant was imported to Canton."—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Explanation by U. S. Legation

Peking, June 2.

In connexion with the communiqué issued by the Canton Government stating that a protest has been lodged with the American Consul-General "against the removal of the Rabbit Arsenal plant from Canton and its sale for the manufacture of arms in the North," an explanation of the position was obtained from the American Legation to-day. It was pointed out that this machinery was exported from America in 1920, permission being given by the American authorities because they honestly believed that it was what it purported to be—commercial machinery which had nothing about it to indicate that it was to be used for warlike purposes. It was imported into Canton by the Davis Company, which is registered in Hongkong as a British firm, and it is at present lying in a Canton godown.

It was further pointed out that if the Canton authorities wished to prevent its removal, believing that they had an interest in the machinery, their proper course would be to sue the Davis Company in the British Consular Court at Canton. The only circumstances under which the American Legation is likely to become interested in the matter is if it transpires as a result of legal proceedings that, as has been rumoured, the Davis Company have parted with their interest in the property to an American concern.

Regarding the statement that the removal of the plant from Canton and its resale to another party in China "constitute an American breach of the Arms Embargo Agreement" it is emphasized that there is no such thing as an arms embargo treaty or agreement, the arms embargo being a self-denying ordinance with which the Chinese authorities have no concern.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

FUKIEN BANDIT OUTRAGE

Chairman of Lumber Co.'s Sympathetic Reference to the Late Mr. Dinsmore

At last Friday's annual meeting of the China Import and Export Lumber Co., the Chairman, Mr. C. H. Arnold, gave additional information concerning the shooting of Mr. Jay Dinsmore by Fukien bandits and the capture of his colleague, Mr. MacKay, also making sympathetic reference to the company's deceased employee, whom he described as a loyal servant, one of nature's true gentlemen and one who loved China.

In addition to the late Mr. Dinsmore and Mr. MacKay, the party (the Chairman said) included a Chinese Yale graduate. They were attacked at a place called Nangia, a forest area ten miles from the village of Pichikou, 20 miles south of the town of Shahsien. Mr. Dinsmore, after being wounded, could have gone on to Yenpingfu, a day's journey down river, for medical attendance, but stayed at Shahsien with the heroice resolve to save his companions who had been taken prisoner. He wired from Shahsien that his wounds were not serious, but in this he was mistaken, for he died on the 21st.

Mr. James Carroll, the company's senior forest inspector in that area, the Chairman continued, "was working with the local officials for the release of the captives. The local officials seemed powerless or afraid to take active steps against the brigands.

Mr. Arnhold expressed the hope that in their negotiations along the customary lines, they would soon receive favourable news as to the prospects of release for Mr. MacKay, Mr. Paul Lee and the others. It could only be hoped that lives sacrificed, such as Mr. Dinsmore's, might bring to the attention of the British and American home governments and those of other nations, the necessity of enforcing steps whereby the protection of other foreign lives may in future be protected.

Hopes for Release of Mr. Mackay

Mr. J. J. Carroll, of the China Import & Export Lumber Co's. branch at Foochow, has written from Shahsien to a friend in Shanghai and states in the course of his letter:—

"You have probably seen in the papers of Dinsmore's death and the capture of Mackay and three Chinese employees of the company. The affair took place very close to the small village where we camped two years ago and hunted serow. The bandits came at night, looking for money, and Dinsmore shot his pistol a couple of times to frighten them away. They did not run, but came on and took the gun from him and shot him with it. The wound did not seem serious and he did not die for three days, at which time poisoning set in. I was not here, but came with all haste and have been trying to effect the release of the captives.

"We have been able to send in supplies and as we are not using soldiers we have reason to hope the captives are getting fairly good treatment. We are now negotiating with the bandits and expect to receive a definite offer inside a few days.

"This province is in very bad shape, what with sporadic fighting and almost continual troop movements. We all have our hands full, trying to conduct business with any degree of success."

Foochow, May 30.

Mr. Carroll is in communication with Mr. MacKay and his party. The bandits are demanding a high ransom. An early release is hopeful. The captives are receiving food and clothing and are being well treated. — Reuter's Pacific Service.

CHENGTU'S BOLSHEVIK YOUTH

Students' Hand in Labour Day Celebrations: When the Soldiery is of Use

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT

Chêngtu, Sze., May 10.

Last Monday, Labour Day, was celebrated by the local Labour Organizations, the affair, however, being chiefly engineered by the Student's Union.

The programme worked out for the day was quite elaborate, but not quite fully realized. The students had announced all over the district that the schools would be closed and that a monster mass meeting would be held in the Public Park, where there would be a Memorial Service for the great Soviet leader Lenin. After that, the programme announced, the students would parade the principal streets of the city and make speeches.

The mass meeting was held. Great crowds of students and others attended to listen to inflammatory speeches by would-up student leaders.

Then Gen. Yang Sen sent out a proclamation, and soldiers in plenty to enforce it, that no parading of the streets would be permitted. The students were allowed to make their speeches, but had to confine their oratory to the Public Park, a veritable Hyde Park of Chêngtu. This made the students extremely angry and many speeches were flavoured with choice invectives against Yang Sen and his soldiers, the students declaring that soldiers, anyway, were a lazy, good for nothing parcel of parasites and that the followers of Karl Marx would not tolerate them in their system.

Yang Sen's Firmness

The soldiers were very patient and forbearing and bore the insults with good grace because Yang Sen had warned them not to attack the students unless bodily harm were done. The students had flags in plenty vilifying England, America and Japan in the order named, for naval activities on the coast and on the lower river. No incidents were reported, however. Yang Sen's order was a most sensible action. It probably prevented the spreading of a lot of seditious propaganda. It is quite evident that Communism has taken a strong hold of the students, but so far has only manifested itself in the doctrinaire stage.

Perpetuating "National Shame"

To-day the students have organized another big, "stunt." It is the day of National Shame. A holiday was called again, the second this week, and great crowds turned out in the Public Park. This time several street meetings were held, but all speeches were directed to the burning topic of the infamous "21 Demands." Copies were spread everywhere, and wherever an audience of half-a-dozen could be gathered together some youthful follower of Karl Marx would be mounted on a soap box reading out the "Demands" and making running comments on their iniquity, saying that they directly attacked the sovereignty of China. The Chief of Police had extra men on duty, and the military police were doing double duty, but the day passed off in an orderly manner and without incident.

At night a great meeting of boy scouts was held in the Y.M.C.A. Gymnasium. It was the first time such a gathering had been held. Eight troops assembled in full uniform, with colours flying and fife and drum bands playing. It was quite an imposing spectacle. They sang the National Anthem with vim, saluted the rainbow flag and settled down to hear some good speeches on the rise of the movement in England through Gen. Baden Powell's discovery of boy power in the South African War, and how the movement quickly spread to over 40 countries. At one stage in the proceedings a Scout Master was called on to read the iniquitous "21 Demands"—even the Scouts were running true to form on this auspicious day.

Tuli's Praiseworthy Reforms

Gen. Yang Sen is still carrying out his reforms. The city is certainly becoming brighter and cleaner. The debris and extra stands are all cleared away from the streets now; we didn't know our streets were so wide. He prohibited the annual "Tung Yeh Hue"—Eastern Hell procession. The leader was quite incensed and tried to make trouble, but he was promptly taken in tow by the police.

IDOL PROCESSION IN HANGCHOW

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Hangchow, May 29.

The "Chu Tien" Idol has had another "birthday." A procession carted it through the streets for three days.

The Assembly has asked the Civil Governor why he permits "such disturbances of the peace." The poor have replied for him. Poverty is given as one reason for the procession because it provides a livelihood for pedlars and down and outs generally. Another reason advanced in favour of the procession is that it pleases old women who have great faith in the idol, which seldom fails to give them all they pray for! It has, however, brought the price of fish down for the last days, which at least the poor have something to be thankful for.

Although the Provincial Assembly is sitting, there are not enough members present daily to accomplish much. It has now be decided that this body shall adjourn for the summer season. Members will reassemble when ordered to do so by the Civil Governor.

COMPETITIVE examinations have been introduced by Marshal Chang Tso-lin, who hopes thereby to secure the best brains of Manchuria for his civil service.

WHO SENT THE BOMB TO DR. KU'S HOUSE?

FROM RODNEY GILBERT.

Peking, May 27.

It is reported in local papers to-day that Dr. Wellington Koo believes that the persons who sent him the bomb which seriously injured his servants were Communists who disapproved of his attitude towards Soviet Russia.

In official gossip throughout the city Dr. Koo is credited with having come to a very different conclusion. It is said that he has advised the police, who have been exceptionally active in their search for the sender of the bomb, that they can abandon their efforts because he is convinced that the attempt on his life had no political significance, but was prompted by personal and private animosity. If this story is true, it is to be assumed that the sender has been identified and that he is someone whom Dr. Koo does not care to expose.

CHASE OF CROOKS OUT OF TSINGTAO

Plague of Shoplifters and Pickpockets Who Must Be Got Rid of

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT

Tsingtao, May 29.

In anticipation of an influx of visitors during the coming summer season, the Administration has issued a set of regulations governing the registration of citizens of non-treaty Powers. According to the Tsingtao authorities, these regulations are not a measure of red-tape at all, but in order to give full protection to those who are capable of giving a good account of themselves and to eliminate, as far as possible, the presence of unsuitable people.

Tsingtao, since last winter, has been invaded by a band of foreign crooks who have victimized residents and quite a number of shops. From Christmas and New Year, right up to the Easter holidays, shoplifters have succeeded in "getting away with it," to quote an Americanism, in an alarming manner. A number were caught red-handed but many have been too smart for the police. There are, in addition, a number of pickpockets whose fingers are so nimble that they are capable of removing your wallet from your hip-pocket without your noticing it. Only recently, a young foreigner had his gold watch removed from the chain to which it was attached.

Of the shoplifters, a young Rumanian woman, of very attractive appearance, has given more cause for exasperation than all the rest combined. Everytime she left a shop she had been visiting, something would be found missing. Of late she has been lying low, being aware, no doubt, that her movements were being watched.

The new regulations come under nine paragraphs, as follows:—

"All Russians and citizens of non-treaty nations who are going to stay in the Kiao-Au Commercial Port longer than three months are asked to obtain resident certificates, so that the necessary protection can be given to them.

"These resident certificates are valid only for one year. When the time of one year is up, visitors who continue to stay in this port are asked to obtain new certificates.

"Those who apply for resident certificates must have some proper profession or legitimate occupation, their passports or old resident certificates must be examined. Only when everything is found all right will new certificates be granted.

"In the resident certificate, each resident is asked to fill his name, age, nationality, religion, the date of entering this country, profession, present address, the number of the members of the family etc. in the blanks clearly. Each resident is also asked to bring three two-inch bust pictures. The children who are under age may be filled in the same certificate as that of their parents.

"A fine of more than $1 or less than $10 will be imposed on those who have stayed in this port longer than three months without applying for resident certificates or after one year without having obtained new certificates. Those who do not obey the regulations shall be deported.

"Each resident certificate is charged $4,—$1 for stamp and $3 for the certificate. The same amount will be charged upon changing an old certificate into a new certificate.

"In case the bearers of these certicates will travel in China and return to this port not later than three months of the date of issuance their certificates will still be valid. Those who have left this country or this port for more than three months no matter whether their certificates are for one year validity or not, the same shall be considered cancelled.

"Residents must carry passports issued by the Commissioner of Foreign Affairs in case of travelling in the interior of China, and also carry passports when entering this port.

"These resident certificates must be shown whenever required by the police."

FRENCH CHINA CONSULAR SERVICE

Paris, May 31.

M. Du Courthial has been appointed French Consul at Hongkong, M. Dufaure De La Prade has been appointed French Consul at Canton, and M. Teissier has been appointed French Consul at Foochow and Amoy.—Reuter.

THE plight of the soldiers of the old Manchu Banners upon which Mr. Rodney Gilbert recently dewelt, is set forth in a petition to the Government which was submitted by the Tutungs of the Yellow Bordered Banner last week. It is pointed out that the Bannermen have not been paid for a long time and they are practically destitute.

CANTON MERCHANTS ON STRIKE

A New Tax on Silk: Old Rights of Tenants: Uproar Over Proposed Abolition

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT

Canton, May 25.

During the last week there have been several interesting incidents, in the nature of merchants' strikes. In the first place there was a strike of the silk merchants in the Shuntak district, owing to their opposition to a new tax on cocoons which had been imposed. The silk trade was hindered for a week or so, and the strike has only just been settled. The second strike is that of the Chinese and foreign medicine shops, who are opposing the new Government tax on patent medicines. This strike started on the 26th, and is still on.

In addition to the above there has been talk of a general strike of all merchants, which was due to start on the 28th, but which has been postponed temporarily, owing to the Authorities meeting some of the demands of the Merchants, and owing to the intervention of several important persons including Gen. Hsu Hsiung-chih.

The cause of this strike, amongst other things was the proposal of the Government to do away with an old Chinese business custom, which is admittedly bad, but which it is very difficult to do away with without causing a good deal of hardship. This custom it is very difficult to name in English. Its effect is that it is very difficult for a landowner who has let his land to raise his rent or get rid of his tenant without paying a large sum of money to the tenant for improvements, goodwill, etc. Thus along some of the new streets the authorities wish the landlords to rebuild the houses, but the landlord cannot do this without the tenant's consent or without paying him a large sum of money. The authorities wish to cancel these rights of the tenants and thus naturally they have raised a storm of protest.

The matter is now under discussion but it is difficult to see how it can be settled. In connexion with the proposed strike there was a large meeting and parade of the Merchants' Volunteer Corps yesterday, which was attended by representatives from the other towns and villages in the Province.

The Civil Governor, Mr. Yang Shiu-k'am, who has just resigned, left Canton on Monday. He was given a good send-off at the Hongkong steamer by which he left en route for Shanghai. His successor to the post of Civil Governor has not yet been appointed. Several names have been mentioned as being likely candidates, Hu Ham-min, Liu Chung-oi, Tang Tsak-yu, Hsu Hsiung-chih, and Dr. C. C. Wu. At the present it is thought that the most likely appointment will be that of Dr. C. C. Wu.

H. M. S. Robin Fired On.

There has been practically no fighting on the East River owing to the height of the water hindering operations, but the other day H. M. S. Robin which was proceeding to Waichow was fired on for a considerable time from the banks by Yunnanese soldiers, and it is reported that the Commanding Officer Lt. Tudway, R. N. was slightly wounded by a bullet.

The reorganization of the Cantonese troops is proceeding under Gen. Hsu Hsiung-chih, who is establishing his Headquarters on the West River at Shiuhing. In Kwangsi Gen. Shum Hung-ying is continuing his campaign against Lu Yung-t'ing and is reported to have captured Kweilin.

The Canton Mint which was to have been reopened by a group of merchants is still idle. All arrangements were being made and the staff had been engaged when it was announced that owing to the depreciation of the subsidiary coins and the high cost of Hongkong banknotes the proposal would have to be dropped temporarily, and the staff were dismissed.

GROWTH OF OPIUM IN KIANGSI

Provincial Guild's Effort with Wu Pei-fu and Chih Hsieh-yuan to Stop It

Peking, May 28.

A deputation representing the International Anti-Opium Association was recently invited to dinner with about 30 members of the Kiangsi Guild at their Club. The purpose of the gathering was to discuss the opium and opium monopoly questions of their province, and to receive the reports of the Kiangsi deputations sent to Marshal Wu Pei-fu and General Chih Hsieh-yuan. Senator Fu, President of the Guild, presided and was supported by other Senators, Members of the House of Representatives and many others interested in opium suppression.

The President made a very earnest and stimulating speech, which was responded to by the General Secretary of the International Anti-Opium Association, who gave a review of the whole situation in China and in Kiangsi in particular. The reports of the deputations were then made. The deputation that visited General Chih Hsieh-yuan, Inspector General of Kiangsu, Kiangsi and Anhui, was received by the General personally. General Chih made the following reply to the information laid before him:—

"Tsai's conduct indicates that he does not care a pin for the people's sufferings. I really feel excessively ashamed before the Kiangsi people that such things should be done by my subordinates. Although the Central Government has issued a chaban I am of opinion that Tsai must be pan (punished) immediately without further cha (investigation). It is fortunate that the President has devised effective measures to deal with this matter, otherwise I could relieve the Kiangsi people of this gall and wormwood.'

Supposed Abolition Denied

The deputation to Marshal Wu was also personally received, and the Marshal, before the deputation was permitted to make its statement, remarked: "Opium is the thing I hate most." Referring to the Kiangsi monopoly, Marshal Wu stated: "As Tuli Tsai has reported to me that he has abolished all his opium monopolies and that the promoters have been ousted, you will have to drop the subject. You must beware lest you be utilized as the tools of others."

Thereupon the deputation replied: "With reference to the abolition there is strong proof that it is not true. We are conscious that it is our duty to rise up against the opium monopoly and we, the patriotic people of Kiangsi, are working unselfishly without any private motive. We are not being used as tools."

To this Marshal Wu replied: "He (Tsai) has sent me a telegram, and I do not think he would deceive me. However, if his telegram has no force to remove the people's doubt, I will again send him a telegram."

Marshal Wu then dictated the following telegram: "Immediate arrest and punishment of the promoters and reply."

The International Anti-Opium Association records its very high appreciation of the determined efforts of the Kiangsi Guild to remedy the lamentable opium conditions in their province.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Appeal to the Spirits of Patriotic Ancestors in Peking

Peking, May 31.

Vow taken by the Kiangsi Anti-Opium Committee in Peking before Spirits of Patriotic Ancestors of Kiangsi:—

"To-day, May 25, of the 13th year of the Republic of China we, the Kiangsi Anti-Opium Committee, under the leadership of our most respectful and humble Ting Shan (Senator Fu) unite to make offerings with true hearts and determination, together with incense and libations, to the patriotic Spirits of our province of Kiangsi for the purpose of clearing the land of the pernicious persons who encourage opium evils, which harm the people of our province. We are conscious that your merits are brilliant and that you sacrificed your bodies for righteousness and that that is why you live with us as long as the mountains are in being. During this critical state of our country whilst there is much to be readjusted, it is much to be regretted that Tsai in our province has done little to help us, but has made extortions with a view to enriching himself. He has nothing in his mind but gold, which is everything to him. To the welfare of the people he has never given a thought. His subordinates likewise have this accursed appetite for gold. In our province soldiers as well as bandits prevail everywhere. In our province Tsai bribes the Members of the Provincial Assembly and extorts excessive taxes from the poor people. What is even more to be regretted is that an opium monopoly has recently been established by him. We are conscious of the fact that various sufferings are engendered by him and unless this chief culprit is removed there will be no hope for our province of Kiangsi. We feel it a duty to rise against this evil enemy of our province. We display our hearts before you and take oath to maintain righteousness with faithful hearts. We vow to fight to the end without neglecting this duty, and we vow not to receive bribes offered with the object of making us forsake our sacred cause. You who are above us will not fail to read our hearts and observe our every action."—Reuter's Pacific Service.

LOWER YANGTZE VALLEY NOTES

A New Secret Society

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT

A new secret society has been formed in almost all of the cities and towns from Nanking to Anking. It is called the Tong Shan Shae (同善社). Its members are sworn not to give away the secrets of the society to anyone, not even father or mother. No Christians are allowed to join and from all accounts it will need watching. It cost $1 to join and 200 cents the first time you worship the gods. This secret society started in Peking and it is spreading like wild fire in all directions.

We here in the lower Yangtze valley have had a cold wet May and for a time we thought that the rain would greatly damage the wheat, barley and rape harvest, but it cleared up in time and the grain quickly ripened. We are hearing from every city and town for hundreds of miles that the farmers are reaping an excellent harvest.

In many places the young rice plants have been transplanted and they look healthy and good coloured. It is most interesting to see from 50 to a 100 women ankle-deep in mud and water singing as they plant the fields.

The Bethel Mission in Hochow has been building a new mission home which is about finished. It will be occupied in the autumn by Rev. and Mrs. Z. Charles Beals. The Rev. and Mrs. Spaulding will occupy the present home.

A cyclone swept over Chaohsien recently and blew off the roof and north wall of the Advent Christian Mission's home, formerly occupied by the doctor. Luckily no one was in the house at the time. The storm wrecked things badly as the rain came down in torrents right after the roof was lifted off. It will take some hundreds of dollars to repair the damage.

ARMED BURGLARY IN HONGKONG

Attack on Dairy Employee Frustrated by a Neighbour and a Dog

Hongkong, June 4.

An armed Chinese burglar savagely attacked Mr. H. W. Page, of the Dairy Farm Company, in the house of the latter, which was entered by Chinese in the small hours of this morning.

Mr. Page grappled with his assailant, and there was a life and death struggle, in the course of which Mr. Page's terrier dog bit off the burglar's toe.

Attracted by Mr. Page's call for assistance, a Portuguese neighbour rushed into the house with two policemen, who found Mr. Page exhausted by loss of blood and an abdominal wound. The burglar, in attempting to escape, fell off the verandah and was killed instantaneously.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

EVERYONE VISITING SHANSI

Model Province Has Something of Interest for All Inquirers into China's State

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Taiku, Shan., May 27.

It is becoming the fashion nowadays for distinguished visitors to China to include this province, or at least Taiyuanfu, in their itinerary. The latest person of note to come up here was Dr. Rabindranath Tagore. He and his party arrived in Taiyuanfu on May 21. They were escorted all the way from Peking by representatives of the educational institutions in Taiyuanfu, and received a great ovation upon reaching Taiyuanfu. On the afternoon of the 22nd. Dr. Tagore addressed a great audience in the "Hall of Self-examination." The number present was reported to be about 5,000. Twenty-three different organizations co-operated in arranging for this meeting. The theme of Dr. Tagore on this occasion was village as contrasted with city life. He pleaded for the conservation of village habits, customs and standards of living, opposing the rush of population to the cities. The main speaker was followed by his English secretary, who has been spending some time in the study of village conditions in India. The party departed from Taiyuanfu on the morning of the 23rd.

A number of schools from outside this province have sent deputations of teachers and students to visit the capital of the province, paying particular attention to the schools and other institutions established there. One such party consisted of pupils from a normal school for girls in Japan, accompanied by two or three of their instructors. Recently over 30 members of the Agricultural College of Shantung Province have come up here on a similar visit.

Popular Foreign Wedding

A wedding of interest to people in Shansi took place in Peking on May 17, when Stanley Hoyte, M.B., B.S., F.R.C.S., L.R.C.P., of the China Inland Mission, Pingyangfu, was married to Miss Grace H. Wilder, B. A., of the same Mission. The happy couple returned to Shansi on May 27. Dr. Hoyte was a former well-known leader of the Student Christian Movement of Great Britain, while Mrs. Hoyte is the daughter of Dr. Robert P. Wilder, one of the founders and prominent leaders of the Student Volunteer Movement of the United States and Canada, and is still identified with that Movement as a general secretary. Dr. and Mrs. Hoyte will make their home in Pingyangfu, where he is at the head of the C.I.M. hospital.

PRIMITIVE PEOPLE OF THE PHILIPPINES

Where Silver Is Unknown and Arcadian Simplicity Still Reigns.

Manila, May 25.

The most primitive people of the entire Philippine archipelago dwell on the Island of Babuyan, some 60 miles north of the Island of Luzon, according to members of Governor General Wood's party who visited that group recently. The total population of the Island is 77, composed of 14 married men, the same number of married women, 20 adult unmarried women, 25 children of both sexes and four old women.

Money is unknown among the people, with the exception of Bernardino Rosal, the head man, who treasures a few silver pesos as a reminder of his former life in Luzon. Rosal is priest, judge, legislator, and executive all in one. He officiates at funerals, marriages and births and adjusts all tribal differences.

Dr. Pacifico Laygo, an assistant in the Philippine Health Service, who was a member of the governor general's party, landed on Babuyan Island and explored the volcano which recently was in eruption.

"From the top of the mountain to the water's edge the once exuberant vegetation was burnt off and boulders, ashes and lava cover the mountain side," said Dr. Laygo. "A new crater appears to have formed from which steam is continuously rising. The advisability of transferring the inhabitants to the mainland of Luzon was discussed with the islanders but they decided that they preferred to remain on Babuyan, although most of their corn and camote fields were destroyed by the eruption. They were terrorized by the flow of rocks, ashes and steam from the volcano but they could not be persuaded to leave the island, their only desire being to get to the northern end of the island where they believed they would be safe from future eruptions."—Reuter's Pacific Service.

SUN YAT-SEN GIVES AN INTERVIEW

Very Much Alive and as Hostile to Peking Government and Powers as Ever

Mr. Percy Noel, Far Eastern correspondent of the "Philadelphia Public Ledger" and the New York "Evening Post," interviewed Dr. Sun Yat-sen in Canton on May 20, being the first foreign correspondent to be allowed that privilege after the rumour of Dr. Dr. Sun's death had begun to appear in the press.

In describing Dr. Sun Yat-sen in his telegram to his newspapers, Mr. Noel wrote: "His replies were clear and gave good evidence of alert intelligence. He showed too much fire and purpose to be a disappointed leader, dying of a broken heart. His health is not good, but his followers feel that the past fortnight's forced rest has given him new strength. He complained that he was too often misquoted and he is smarting under the indignity of the report of his death which has a special significance to the Chinese mind."

Mr. Noel's interview which was given for the newspapers he represents cannot be reproduced here in full, but from Dr. Sun's statements to the correspondent it would appear that he is in no measure weakening in his attitude toward the Peking Government nor even to the Powers, who, he claims, are the only explanation of that Government's continued existence.

The "Public Ledger Service" in the Far East has recently been reorganized, Mr. Noel taking charge with headquarters in Tokio, while Mr. George E. Sokolsky will be in charge here. In addition to the "Philadelphia Public Ledger" and the New York "Evening Post," this news service appears in many prominent newspapers in the United States.

NEW HARBOUR MASTER FOR HONGKONG

The "Hongkong Telegraph" of May 30 announces that the Government has appointed Lieut.-Commander George S. Hole, R.N., now the Master Attendant of Colombo, to be Harbour Master of Hongkong, in succession to Commander C. W. Beckwith, R.N., who recently left for England on retirement.

There has been much speculation regarding Commander Beckwith's successor, but the matter is now put beyond all doubt, Lieut.-Com. Hole being expected to arrive here some time in July.

Lieut.-Com. Hole first joined the Navy as Midshipman in January 1904, serving in the cruiser Andromeda and the battleship Albemarle. He was made Sub-Lieutenant in 1907 and in 1909 was serving on the torpedo-boat-destroyer Ettrick. In October of that year he was made Lieutenant and served in the Albemarle and T.B.D. No 10, and later in the cruiser Argyle. In 1914, he was given the command of the destroyer Peteral and soon after the outbreak of war was wounded. Naval records show that he was still on the Active List early in 1915, but was not in employment, and he retired off the Active List in the same year, being granted a pension for wounds.

In March, 1916, he secured an appointment in the Colonial Office and proceeded to Ceylon, where he has served since that time. He was for a time on special duty as Mine Sweeping Officer, being raised to the rank of Lieut.-Commander on October 1, 1917.

Born in August, 1887, he will be 37 years of age this year.

WHEN THE YANGTZE WENT DOWN

Crowds of Steamers Held Up in Chungking by Abnormal Low Water

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Chungking, May 1.

President Harding's plea, or was it President Wilson's, was for a return to normalcy, but Chungking leads us such a chequered career that it would be difficult for us to recognize normalcy if we saw it. To the abnormal in politics we are by now thoroughly accustomed and we also thought that we were accustomed to the not infrequent abnormalities of our river, but the abnormality of the river this spring has broken all records.

During the second week in April it rose just sufficiently to allow the big steamers to come up. Having enticed the steamers up, it promptly began to fall and ever since April 23 it has remained stubbornly and tantalizingly low—just low enough not to permit steamers to leave again with a reasonable margin of safety. To those steamers content to risk its wrath outside the margin, it has shown its teeth by strewing its banks with their wrecks. The older and wiser skippers watching the antics of the younger have the melancholy satisfaction of saying, "I told you so."

To-day the steamers commence the fifth week of their detention: for a solid month their anchors and mooring wires have remained out undisturbed: did barnacles favour steel plating, doubtless their hulls would be covered with them. Day after day the Chungking Club has been crowded with the "men who go down to the sea in ships" bringing with them that indefinable air of restlessness indissolubly associated with the sea and those who plough thereon. Every day and in every way they get better and better at bridge, at tennis, at dancing, at riding and some even at patience. Some weeks ago the daily greeting used to be "Hullo, when are you going off?" and the answer a cheery "Oh! in a day or two when the water rises" but those days are long since gone. Nobody mentions such a subject now. Hope may spring eternal in the human breast, perhaps it still lingers in the breast of one or two captains. In Bubbling Well it may bubble perhaps, but in Chungking it must lie like truth at the bottom of the well, too feeble to send even a bubble to the surface to show it still survives. One skipper has declared that, like Mr. Balfour in connexion with traiff reform years ago, "He has sat so long on the fence that the iron has entered his soul." For iron in this instance read "Chungkingitis."

A New Wheeze

Several globe trotters were detained for a fortnight on one steamer and we had come to regard them as permanent residents but being wise in their generation they quietly folded their tents like the Arabs and silently vanished away by one of the winter steamers. They left us a fragrant memory and at least one new story. The story runs something like this.

"An international scientific body decided that the collected knowledge of the elephant and his ways was neither complete nor up to date and they requested their corresponding members in all countries to make good the deficiency. In due course the response was received from various countries. An English member contributed a book entitled "Elephant hunting in Upper Burma." From Poland came a monograph on "The Elephant and Poland" A German forwarded a learned essay on "The Elephant, the first Tank used in War" and a French savant sent a masterly analysis of "L'Élephant et ses Amours."

PEKING is being invaded by ever-increasing numbers of Russian refugees. Most of them, state reports reaching Shanghai, are penniless and with little clothing or food. As usual Chinese officialdom says they are "a menace to peace and good order." Such is certainly far from the truth in Shanghai, which also suffers from periodical invasions of under-fed, badly clothed victims of Red Revolution. How many "violent crimes" are committed by them in a year? They can be counted on the fingers of one hand, while the petty offenders are usually arrested for begging.

THE WEIHAIWEI MURDER TRIAL

Tragic Story of Russian Woman and Chinese Husband: A Verdict of Not Guilty

FROM A CORRESPONDENT.

Although the main features of this case have already been reported, our own correspondent adds details of much interest in an unusually interesting story.

Weihaiwei, May 26.

The story begins 20 odd years ago when Kao, the youngest of four brothers, left his home in the Territory to seek a means of livelihood in Manchuria. It ends in the trial on Wednesday and Thursday last of one Eugene Feodor, a Russian subject, for the murder on April 17 of the said Kao, with whom she had been living as his wife. Judge Wilkinson presided over the local High Court: Messrs. Mossop and Priestwood represented the Crown and the accused, respectively: and the following residents formed the jury,—Messrs. Beer, Clark, Roberts, Sun and Whitelaw.

The evidence clearly showed that the deceased was a ne'er-do-weel: that he had returned to his native village over a year ago without any money: that with the Russian woman and her child he had occupied the house of an absent brother, whose land he had been cultivating in a perfunctory manner: and that he had lost face badly with his relatives with whom he was on unfriendly terms.

The Fatal Night

The chief witness for the Crown, a neighbour named Sung, testified that he had taken some interest in this unusual ménage—particularly in the Russian child; and that on occasions he had intervened in quarrels between accused and deceased. On the night of the tragedy he was having his evening meal when he heard sounds of an unusually violent quarrel, and he entered the house in the hope of restoring peace. Sung testified that in his presence Kao violently assaulted accused with hand and foot: that he remonstrated and urged Kao to treat the woman more kindly for the sake of the child, then lying on the brick bed in the room: and that finding Kao disinclined to take advice, he said he would go. He had barely passed the doorway of the sleeping compartment, when hearing the sound of a fall. He retraced his steps to find Kao on the floor in a dying condition. The woman was seated at the table in a state of collapse.

In answer to further questions this witness declared that the statement that he had been met on the road outside the house by accused who had begged him to come to her help, was untrue.

This witness and another of the same name who had entered the house together narrated subsequent events,—the summoning of the neighbours and the two eldest brothers of the deceased: the tying up of accused to a tree: the information carried to the police station some miles away: the hiring of two carts to take a party to Port Edward, in the first of which was placed the accused with the dead body: the handing over of both to the authorities.

Dr. Cooper, Medical Officer of Health, stated he had examined the body, which was that of a tall man of powerful physique: that death was due to a stab in the chest which had penetrated the heart: that the injury might easily have been caused by the knife produced in court: and that it might possibly have been self-inflicted.

Surgeon-Commander McCloy, R.N., stated he had examined accused after her admission to the prison on the Island: and that he found her covered with bruises, particularly in the lower parts of the body.

Mr. Priestwood called no witnesses for the defence but put Eugene Feodor in the witness-box, who, through a Russian interpreter, told a pitiful story of degradation and ill-usage. She was married to a Chinese eight years ago, but as the marriage was an unhappy one, there followed a legal separation. The father of her son was a Russian. She agreed to accompany Kao to his native village and his treatment of her was for a time reasonably kind and friendly. Quarrels arose when he began to pay improper attentions to his absent brother's wife. That the latter had attempted to commit suicide, when she heard that her husband proposed to return to his home for the New Year. On that occasion Kao had said he would kill himself if his sister-in-law died, and had also threatened to kill accused. On the night in question, Witness asserted, she was nursing her child and did not promptly open the door on deceased's return from the theatre. She was subjected to violent abuse and beating. Fearing for her life, she went to the houses of two neighbours, but was refused admission. On the road she met the two witnesses named Sung, and begged for their assistance as she feared her "Master" would kill her. They entered the house together. It was not true to say that while these witnesses were in the house she left the sleeping apartment to fetch the knife. She went to get an onion. On her return Kao said he wanted neither her nor the onion, kicked her and knocked her down. She took a seat at the table, weeping. Deceased carried the knife on his person—ostensibly, for the purpose of self-protection. As the Sungs were leaving, she noticed Kao fumbling with his waist-band where he carried the knife, or dagger. At this point she lost consciousness. She did not know that a dead body was taken with her in the cart. She did not know that Kao was dead till so informed in prison. She recollected asking for a drink of water on the journey.

A Dramatic Moment

There was one moment of dramatic interest. Apart from the fact that there were differences between the narrative of the accused and those of witnesses for the Crown, the latter had declared with remarkable unanimity that they had been unable to converse with accused at any time, for she did not know their language and they did not understand hers. She was therefore called upon to repeat to the Court, in Chinese, what she alleged she had said to the two Sungs on the road when she sought their help. This accused was able to do readily and correctly!

In his summing up Judge Wilkinson said that in the absence of any evidence of premeditation the jury would be justified in reducing the charge to one of manslaughter. A point they had to consider was the possibility that Kao had taken his own life. In this connexion he drew their attention to a letter found in deceased's house written by the absent brother, in which the latter stated he expected to return to his home in the village. If, as accused alleged, the relations between Kao and his sister-in-law had been immoral, the probability of further trouble with the brother who had befriended him might have furnished a motive for self-destruction.

After a brief retirement the jury brought in a verdict of "not guilty" either of murder, or manslaughter.

VOLCANIC ERUPTION IN THE PHILIPPINES

Manila, June 2.

A submarine volcano eruption is reported off the coast of Luzon, causing a strong quake and tidal wave at Agno Pangasin at 11.30 p.m. on May 29. Minor damage was done.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

THE Canton Government is stated to have spent $50,000 on repairing two gunboats, which are to be put on patrol duty—one on the West River and the other on the East River.

DISASTROUS HANKOW FIRE

Hankow, May 30.

In the early hours of this morning the godown of the Mitsui Bussan Kaisha was completely gutted by fire. One hundred tons of wood oil were destroyed. The estimated loss is a hundred thousand taels and is fully covered by insurance.—Reuter's Pacific Service

WUCHANG STUDENT LEADERS' FATE

Marshal W's Close Watch on Recent Bolshevist Agitation: Five Shot at Loyang

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Wuchang, Hup., May 31

Apparently the authorities are getting very anxious about the amount of labour agitation that is going on in the city. Although ostensibly a workers' movement, its leaders appear to be mostly students and teachers in the schools. A few weeks ago, some of the biggest book-shops were searched by the police, and a large quantity of alleged pernicious Socialist literature was confiscated and destroyed.

Next, suspicion was directed against a teacher who is employed in two of the largest government schools, and orders were given for his arrest. The man in question wrote a public defence which was published in the local papers, stating that he is a teacher of social economics, but not a Socialist. This defence was accepted., and the teacher of economics was allowed to remain at liberty.

So far, the agitation has been more or less of a comedy. But the leaders of the movement have been arrested in Wuchang by agents of Wu Pei-fu, and taken to Loyang where five of them have already been executed. The sixth is a lawyer named Liu. The Hupeh Provincial Assembly sent a telegram to Loyang in which they guaranteed this man's innocence and requested that he might be spared.

A Road to Loyang.

Evidently the Loyang Warlord is keeping a close eye upon this centre, and he is taking means to make communications more convenient than they are at present. A main road is to be made northward from Hankow, and it is said that orders have already been issued that soldiers are to be employed in its construction. Hankow is also to be connected with Loyang by a long-distance telephone, for which the materials have already been ordered from abroad.

Girl Athletes at Sports.

One of the features of the recent National Athletic Sports was the number of girl competitors, some of whom came quite long distances. Before returning to their own provinces, some of these have shown enterprise in another way. On Monday night, the girl athletes from East China gave a theatrical entertainment in the Y. M. C. A. quarters in Hankow. Tickets were sold for admission, and the profits were to go towards their travelling expenses in coming to the sports. The girls of Central China gave a similar entertainment in Wuchang, with the same object.

Wuchang educational circles are shortly to see the instalment of the first lady principal of a school. She will be Miss Cheo Ming, who has been invited by the Educational Bureau to become Headmistress of the Girls' Normal School. Miss Cheo is a Peking graduate of some distinction. It is understood that it was only after some pressure had been exercised that she consented to fill the unique, and possibly rather onerous post that has been offered to her.

Yet another "University" has been added to Wuchang. This is the Medical School, which will in future be known as the Wuchang Medical University.

SZECHUAN CITY CLEARED OF BANDITS

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Mienchow, Sze., May 19.

A correspondent from Mienchuh writes that on Monday last, the 12th instant, soldiers of the 10th Division stationed there made a determined effort to clear the city of bandits. The bandit leader is a man named Heo Chi-pao. I am informed that all the bandits in the city were taken, and killed; but those in the suburbs largely escaped: among these latter were Heo and his son.

Large numbers of soldiers have come through here recently, said to be en route for the Lonyan district to clear up bandits.

MISSIONARY CAPTIVES IN KUEILIN

Two Released to Arrange Ransom for Others: a Beleaguered City

Welcome news was received in Shangahi on Sunday about two of the five missionaries who were captured by bandits at Taiwan while travelling from Wuchow to Pinglo on board the American hospital ship Roanoke.

We are informed by the China Inland Mission that they have received a telegram from Wuchow requesting them to inform the children at the Chefoo Mission Schools that Mr. R. A. Jaffray and Dr. Miller have returned home safe and well. Mr. Jaffray is one of the two British, and Dr. Miller of the three American, missionaries who were taken into captivity in the hills. No mention is made of the other three members of the party, Messrs. E. H. Carne (British) and Rex and Ray (American), and it may perhaps be assumed that they also have been freed, but have no children at the Chefoo schools who should be informed.

Peking, June 2.

Consular telegrams received from Canton to-day confirm the news that Mr. Jaffray and Dr. Miller, two of the missionary relief party who were captured en route from Wuchow to Kueilin, have returned to Wuchow, apparently to negotiate for the release of their colleagues, who are still in the hands of the bandits. Mr. Chamberlain, American Vice-Consul at Canton, who is now in Wuchow, states that Mr. Jaffray and Dr. Miller were released in order to arrange about a ransom for the others.

The British Consul-General at Canton has reported to the British Legation that, as far as can be ascertained, there are 10 British missionaries in the beleguered city of Kueilin. Their names are:—Bishop Molden and his wife, Mr. and Mrs. R. W. Bland, Mr. and Mrs. H. B. Bailey, Mrs. J. I. Deacon, Miss Santler, Miss A. Pim and Mr. Oldfield. There are also 10 American missionaries belonging to the Christian and Missionary Alliance and to the Southern Baptist Mission.

The American gunboat Pampanga, which has been stationed at Canton, was to have proceeded to Wuchow on Saturday.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

CHEKIANG SHUTS OUT SOUTHERN COINS

Modern Chinese College Girl Gymnasts

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Hangchow, June 2.

Canton and Fukien 20 cent pieces are now prohibited coming into the province except in small quantities.

On Thursday some 30 Japanese industrial students with their teacher from Shanghai visited the City to see the Industrial Schools and study the City industries.

The girls Union School gave a fine display of calesthenics on Friday in the open air much to the delight of the parents, onlookers and guests. It is simply wonderful what the schools are doing nowadays to promote bodily strength and graceful movement of the Chinese girls. Such training means much for the well-being of the country in the future.

Negotiations are still going on about the water works and those who are in the know of things assure as that water is really going to be "laid on." Let us hope there is no mistake this time because the water here is a very serious matter, the chief supply being from wells which are so easily contaminated by surface drainage. One seldom takes a cup of cold water without saying inwardly: is it safe? We envy those who have simply to turn a tap on and satisfy their thirst without a thought. Another exhibition is contemplated a few years hence and this time in Hangchow and a small committee has been appointed to arrange the time and place. The old parade ground near the Dzien dang has been mentioned as a suitable site.

The Y.M.C.A. National Conference of Secretaries have been in session for more than a week, but

PERILS OF COUNTRY LIFE IN CHINA

Rich Marked Down for Plunder: Outrage near Shaoshing: Seven Shot Down

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Shaohsing, Chê., May 30.

Those who live within China's larger walled cities or in the treaty ports know very little of the dangers that surround the people who live in more isolated country villages. Here is a case in point.

On May 6 Yiang Van-tsing, business man and banker, returned from Hankow to his ancestral home near the village of Motse in the Yuyao district. The occasion of his coming home was the approaching marriage of his son. Yiang, having prospered in his business ventures in Hupeh, was a marked man on his return. The day after his arrival a band of armed robbers called at his home with a request for a loan of $30,000. The secretary who met them said that he must consult his principal before making so large a loan and started to go and find Yiang Van-tsing. The bandits fearing a trap promptly shot the secretary in the back. A second secretary upon seeing this murder fled, but was likewise shot down.

Father and Son Killed

Upon hearing the shooting Yiang Van-tsing came out. The bandits immediately attempted to carry him away for ransom. A Hankow man who had accompanied him tried to prevent them from so doing and in the mêlée both men were shot dead. There remained only the son to deal with. Although only a boy he proved troublesome and in the end the bandits hamstrung him to prevent his running away. Bruised and bleeding the boy still continued his resistance by bitting the shoulder of the bandit who was carrying him. A farmer and mason on seeing the boy's pitiable condition remonstrated with the bandits and were promptly shot for their interference. The boy was also shot for having bitten his captor.

Culprits Reported Capture.

All this occurred within 20 li of the first station west of Yuyao on the Ningpo section of the Shanghai-Hangchow-Ningpo Railway. Two detachments of soldiers were promptly sent into the mountains and it is reported that the culprits have been captured.

Experts with Brown Automatics.

On May 18 the district city of Siaoshan was greatly agitated because of a bandit raid within the city. A wealthy man had been captured and through a clever ruse got away. In an effort to check further raids a man had been arrested. The source of the excitement was to be found in the fact that it was commonly believed on the street that the man who had been arrested had no connexion with the crime and that an innocent man was being made a scapegoat. Alike in Yuyao and Siaoshan the innocent bystander suffers while the country gentleman in his home among the hills is at the mercy of the hardened criminal who has learned too well the use of a Browning automatic.

SIR Artnur and Lady Leveson, Miss Pamela Leveson, Sir John and Lady Fowler and the two Misses Fowler, Lieutenant-Commander Miney and Mr. Hardy Jowett, visited the Forbidden City the other day. They were presented to the Manchu Emperor and Empress by Mr. R. F. Johnston, the Imperial Tutor. The visit lasted for two and a half hours and was thoroughly enjoyed by the visitors. To each of the five ladies of the party, the Emperor presented a Pekinese dog of the breed for which the Imperial palace has long been famous.

the fruit of their labours has not yet been published, Mr. Rugh preached at the monthly English service on Sunday a very practical sermon, the gist of which was that the only solution to the world's unrest is for every Christian to live Jesus Christ—a pure, fresh and sinless life. Conferences, theological arguments, and philosophical reasoning were of no avail. A consciousness of God in Jesus Christ was what was needed.

HONGKONG LETTER

Prayers for Water Answered by Deluge: Swimming Delights: Rate-Cutting to Canton

From Our Own Correspondent.

Hongkong, May 26.

The week has opened with cheerful weather after the five days' drenching last week. A section of the Colony's residents, particularly in the lower levels of Victoria were recently clamouring for water, protesting against the restrictions imposed on their supply. Their prayers were answered with a vengeance. From Monday to Friday a fall of 10.84 inches was registered at the Royal Hongkong Observatory, Of [illegible] recorded during the 24 hours from Thursday to Friday morning. The Colony was not exactly flooded, but it was certainly saturated and the five days' consistent rain provided a typical beginning of a tropical wet season. No serious landslide came to the notice of the P.W.D., though there were several minor collapses in the hill district. The races—an extra meeting—were held despite the swampy state of the course. Within an hour of the opening, the rain had steadily fallen yet the jockeys and ponies faced the bog and went through with the programme. Coolies were working most of Friday afternoon and Saturday morning clearing away the mud, with the result that when starting time came, the state of the course was declared to be better than it was at the annual meeting. Former Shanghai ponies again proved their stamina and good training.

Chinese householders in the lower levels of the island wrote indignant letters a few days ago to the newspapers about the restriction of their water supply, an expedient which is found necessary every summer here. They protested that even when the Water Department cut down their supply to two hours a day they were deprived of a certain portion of that period by enterprising tenants who monopolised the one tap or diverted the flow into their own pipes, stored up the water and later sold it. Shortly after their complaint was made, it was announced that a constant supply would be turned on in all [illegible] Eastern Street, the Chinese quarter, until further notice.

Is Shanghai Envious?

Bathing here is swinging into its seasonal popularity. The public beaches with the exception of the favourite — Stonecutters Island, were opened at the beginning of the month. Stonecutters, one of the most delightful spots near Hongkong, always attracts the bathers and since its opening a fortnight ago, there has been a happy crowd of swimmers, non-swimmers and paddlers dipping in the briny every day. One of the most popular of the private beaches, the Easma (Ex-Active Service Men's Association) drew a big crowd last week when it was formally opened. Hongkong residents are indeed fortunate in the possession of so many amenities for tolerating their long summer. Indeed, Shanghailanders must be envious. Those especially, who know Hongkong and its delightful natural beauty spots, cannot but give forth a sigh when they think of cool bathing in the summer among the Fragrant Isles and then look into the dirty depths of the Huangpu. To see the happy bathers, the kiddies playing on the sands on Hongkong beaches is like a breath from Home. There is a seaside, holiday atmosphere about it. Truly, Hongkong is for the residents Hongkong-by-the Sea just now.

Canton Fare Reductions

One of the most interesting events of the week has been the astonishing action of a steamboat company in reducing its steerage fare from Hongkong to Canton to ten cents. This drastic reduction from $1 to ten cents was described in the newspapers here as a rate war, but today the allegation is denied in a letter to the "Hongkong Telegraph" written by the owners for the steamship company concerned, the Hongkong, Canton and Macao Steamboat Co., Ltd. Ten cents for a steamer trip of seven hours is probably a world record, but it was only in force for a single night, Saturday. According to a statement made by the secretary of the steamboat company, a company owning former French boats will not agree to a standard charge and are continually varying their charges. The French boat have been approached but have refused to come to terms and as a consequence, the company which cut the rate to ten cents on Saturday have decided to contest the opposition and in the words of the secretary, Mr. J. Arnold, will reduce the fares on all their boats and even take passengers for nothing if necessary. It is an interesting situation and the outcome of it is being eagerly watched.

It brings to mind almost a similar incident many will recall which happened several years ago. Royal steamship companies running boats between Scotland and Ireland suddenly began a rate war. One reduced the fare to eighteen-pence and for a time held the field. The other, nonplussed, retaliated very ingeniously by charging the same price, eighteen-pence, but adding as an attraction to their potential passengers, several bottles of beer. For a time war was waged until eventually a settlement was arrived at in a simple manner. The companies amalgamated and further reduced the fare to one shilling. Even locally, old residents remember a similar instance when competition was deadly keen. Years ago, the Hongkong Canton & Macao S. Co., reduced their fare to ten cents for steerage and maintained the rate for almost six months. Further back in the shipping history of the Colony musty records tell us that competition was so keen that touts used to be employed at Canton and Whampao to solicit passengers for Hongkong at 5 cents per person which included a meal on the boat of a pot of tea and two large cakes. Probably today's event is merely history repeating itself.

The Late Mr. Claxton

Hongkong sportsmen have shared with Shanghai the grief over the death of Mr. A. A. Claxton, the well known interport cricketer and all-round sportsman. It was indeed a shock to hear the sad news particularly so when it is hard to realize he was with us only a week or so [illegible] Col. Robertson, Secretary of the Hongkong Club, the flags were immediately lowered over the Club and the Hongkong Cricket Club. Cricketers here will always cherish his memory; he will be sorely missed and the Shanghai Cricket Team will be considerably weakened.

SHANSI'S NEWEST MOTOR-ROAD

Drought Again Threatening Crops

From Our Own Correspondent.

Kiangchow, May 29.

Rain, just in time, enabled farmers to sow cotton, but drought is again threatening all crops.

On watered land the wheat is good, but on the non-irrigable plateaux very small harvests must be expected.

The commencement of the motor bus service to Yuncheng is definitely promised for June 1.

Travellers by motor or ricsha see very little of the life of Shansi, as the road passes through no villages, skirts the outside of cities, frequently at some distance from the walls. Only wayside refreshment booths at long intervals break the peaceful monotony of the clean, quiet stretches of roadway.

Unfortunately the section from Yuncheng to the Yellow River at Maotsingtu, is not completed. This 100 li is about the biggest and most interesting bit of road construction, but for some reason work has been stopped. The ferry at Maotsingtu is opposite the new station on the Lunghai Railway. When the few remaining li are finished there will be 1700 li of road from the railway in the north at Tatungfu to the Honan line.

A re-organisation of the mail service will be instituted in connexion with the increased bus facilities.

This city is 30 li from the motor-road. The postal service is excellent, but for the fact that the ever increasing volume of postal business every now and then baffles the physical power of the staff to keep up with their work.

CHINA DELICACIES NOW BARRED

Governor of Tsingtao Extends His Economy Rules to Food and Feathers

From Our Own Correspondent.

Tsingtao, May 30.

Those who recall what Dr. Tehyi Hsien had to say in reference to shark's fins will be interested to learn that, from now on, this delicacy, together with another Chinese dish famous the world over, will be eliminated from the menu in all future official functions given by the authorities of Tsingtao, in line with the idea of Governor Kao En-hung on the subject.

His Excellency declares that shark's fins and bird's nests are superfluous luxuries which should be eschewed. Half of the people partaking of them do so more for the sake of displaying their opulence than for anything else, whereas the other half have not the remotest appreciation of them other than an artificial one. It may be, although his Excellency does not say so, that he is in agreement with what Dr. Tehyi Hsien has said. According to the doctor, the first mentioned delicacy is neither shark nor fin. This statement has opened quite a good deal of discussion amongst connoisseurs of Chinese dishes and no less sensational is the doctor's affirmation that "if it weren't for Boston, Massachusetts, there would be no shark's fins in China for feasts." Occidentals are accustomed to thinking of shark's fins as merely an item in inexplicable Orientalia. So, therefore, when a Chinese expert proceeds to tell us that shark's fins as listed on Chinese menus are "neither shark nor fin," we ought to be forgiven for sitting up and taking notice of it. According to the doctor, "shark's fins" are "bits of sword-fish, delicate portions under the giant fins carefully scraped and fashioned dexterously by hand into the patterns of fins." But anyhow Mr. Kao is keen on giving it a wide berth, in company with bird's nests, when giving official functions.

Clothes Also too Costly

Then there is the matter of clothes. His Excellency is opposed to the process of wearing ultra-expensive clothes, as practised by people who in reality are financially incapable of affording them. More than that, the Governor thinks everybody, irrespective of social or financial standing, should be economical in the matter of clothes. Very often, backed by a show of finery, considerable credit is secured by the unthinking.

It is difficult to realize whether the Governor has only his own countrymen in mind, in his discussion of extravagancy, and more particularly in the matter of the use of automobiles by people who should be the last to think of them. He regrets that now-a-days about the first thing a so-called successful man would do is to purchase a costly machine before first purchasing a house. Instead of safeguarding himself against the proverbial rainy day, the average man thinks it his duty to society to possess an automobile for himself and his family. It would be interesting, comments the Governor, to know what benefit an automobile could afford the family should its owner suddenly discover himself on his beam-ends.

A Town-full of Bad Debts.

As I have said, it is difficult to realize whether Governor Kao has only his own countrymen in mind or whether he has spoken in reference to everybody in Tsingtao, irrespective of nationality. For many a tailor, dressmaker cafe-owner and garage have bundles of uncollectible chits, and the whole thing has gone so far that creditors here are seriously thinking of organizing a ring for the purpose of comparing notes and listing all the bad payers. The garages, however, are in the deepest part of the mire. They are, in the main, Chinese owned, and some of their chits bear the names of non-existent people. "Wellington Ford," "George Washington, Jr.," "Napoleon Wong" and "Papa Joffre" are some of the fictitious names attached to scraps of paper, and I have even seen a "Kakvipazjivaite," which in Russian means "How do you do!" It may be asked whether it would be impossible to trace the identity of the [illegible] these fictitious nomenclature but Tsingtao native tradesmen have not been stung on the same scale financially as their contemporaries in other treaty ports. Moreover, these unscrupulous people who think nothing of working against the prestige of the white race do not hire cars from the same garage twice. I asked one garage man whether he could not remember the faces of his pernicious creditors. His reply reminded me of the story of the wolf and the sheep. Said he: "Hai-yah! Foreign master all have got same face, first time look see no can remember!"

Preliminary Hearing in Case of Mr. Bessel: American Plaintiff Also Moving

Peking, May 30.

Officials of the War Office informed pressmen that they could not attend the proceedings against Col. Chen Kuei-yuan at the opening at 2 o'clock this afternoon, as it was only a preliminary hearing, but they could be present later when the actual re-trial takes place. Mr. Eric Teichman (Chinese Secretary to the Legation) was present as official observer, and also Mr. Bessel and a number of Chinese railway witnesses.

The trial of the soldier Li opens to-morrow, when the charge of assault, preferred by the American, Mr. Pomeroy, will be heard.

The British case will probably not come on until the middle of next week, owing to the absence of Mr. Campbell.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

CHUNGKING MISSIONARY'S REPORTED SUICIDE

Tragedy at Methodist Church Conference at Springfield, Massachusetts

From Our Own Correspondent.

Vancouver, B. C., May 15.

Mr. Roger T. Rahn, aged 28, a lay delegate to the Methodist Church Conference from the West China Conference, committed suicide yesterday by taking poison, says a telegram from Springfield, Massachusetts, of to-day's date.

The message adds: Mr. Rahn is believed to have taken poison in his room at a local hotel and his body was found to-day. His act is attributed to ill-health, coupled with depression from which he had suffered since arriving in this country. Mr. Rahn was a teacher at a Christian school at Chungking. Friends of Mr. Rahn, whose Chinese name is Ran Du Dsi, said that he had thought he would die before the conference closed.

SMUGGLING OF ARMS IN TIENTSIN

Tientsin, June 4.

The Customs have detained 58 cases of wine from Genoa, which were destined for an Italian firm at Tientsin, owing to the discovery of 23 pistols and 5,000 rounds of ammunition in false bottoms.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

BRITAIN AND BOXER INDEMNITY

Suggested Holding Up of Bill to Counteract the Chinese Trade Marks Provisions

London, June 2

In the House of Commons to-day, Mr. Samuel Samuel (Conservative) suggested postponement of the second reading of the Chinese Indemnity Bill until the Chinese Government altered the conditions of their Trade Marks Bill so as to protect British manufacturers and traders against having trade marks, which they have been using for a number of years, fradulently taken away.

Mr. Ramsay MacDonald said that it was not desirable to connect the trade marks question with the very different matter of the China Indemnity Bill.

Mr. Samuel asked if the Prime Minister had any list of applications of Chinese, Japanese and German firms for registration of British trade marks, and if it were possible to suspend the Indemnity Bill in order to introduce a bill whereby the money could be applied to compensate British manufacturers and merchants whose trade marks were taken away.

The Premier replied that he thought it far more desirable that, in regard to the Trade Marks Law, we should conduct the negotiations on the merits of the case itself and not mix it up with another Act of ours, which, he hoped, would be accepted by China as an act of grace rather than as the result of a bargain.—Reuter.

WUCHANG ATHLETIC MEETING

East China Victorious After All: Last Day of All-China Sports

From Our Own Correspondent

Wuchang, May 25.

Yesterday was the third, and last day, of the National Athletic Sports. Naturally, the excitement was higher, and the crowds greater, than upon either of the previous days, but the same order prevailed as before, and was well maintained up to the end of the proceedings. The boy scouts and girl guides, who in relays were helping the police to keep the entry, had a little trouble now and again with some of the "roughnecks," who would have entered the grounds by force or fraud rather than by right. The result was a few fights, in which the would-be entrant usually got his way in the end. But these little scenes took place outside the grounds, and did not affect the general order in the arena itself.

As it was easy to foresee from the first, the competitors from East China were successful in carrying off nearly all the prizes. In the final game of the football competition, they easily defeated the Central China team who had been the victors of the day before against North China. They also obtained the first place in the 5,000 metres race. On total points, East China came out easily first, with North China in the second place and Central China in the third.

Owing to his continued indisposition, the Tuchun was unable to distribute the prizes in person; but this was done by a representative. No sooner was all over, tables were spread in the open upon what had been a football field. Electric lights were hung around on poles, and as darkness closed in the scene was lit up by many coloured lights. A cinema appartus and screen were also erected close by. Then all the competitors and officials who had taken part in the sports were entertained to a meal served in Western fashion, followed by a show of moving pictures in which athletic events were mostly shown on the screen.

Mr. Li Chia-ao, the Chinese representative in Moscow, has telegraphed to the Government reporting the death of the Hutukhtu. Recent reports reaching Peking from Urga stated that the Living Buddha was ill.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

THE JEWISH COLONY OF HONAN

Personal Experiences of the Israelitish Remnant in Kaifengfu: Two Ancient Tables and the Story They Tell

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT

Kaifengfu, May 23.

In a recent issue you asked for more information on the Jewish colony in China, that forms the basis of the article written on the report of Adolph S. Oko, Librarian of the Hebrew Union College, Cincinnati. In your appeal for information you suggest that this may be the colony that formerly existed in Honan. You may well be pardoned for not more readily recognizing the Honan community as the one about which Professor Oko wrote, for in one place the original article printed in the Jewish Exponent of March 24, as a Special, speaks of "London Society for Promoting Christianity among the Jews in China," which sent missionaries to that country for the first time in 1849. The manuscripts purchased by Mr. Oko were obtained by the missionaries of that Society in the "village of Kae-fung-foo." Accompanying these documents is a history of the experiences of the missionaries "in that village."

Undoubtedly this "village of Kae-fung-foo,' refers to the capital city of Honan, for on consulting the Encyclopaedia Sinica, one learns of no other colony of Jews in China apart from the Kaifengfu community. Quoting from the Encyclopaedia we read that the London Society for Promoting Christianity among the Jews ("in China" not being part of the Society's name), got a deputation of two natives to visit the colony, and the results were published the next year in a book by Dr. G. Smith, with translations by Dr. Medhurst of some inscriptions. From the same source we find that Dr. W. A. P. Martin visited Kaifengfu in 1866 and found seven left out of 70 original families, numbering from three to four hundred persons. The synagogue was then is a state of complete ruin. The remnants could not trace their tribal pedigree; they never met as a congregation, had no Sabbath and no circumcision, and seemed on the point of merging into the heathendom around them. So much for the past.

A Desolate Remnant.

When your correspondent first came into contact with the Jewish community some 12 years ago, there was no single vestige of the ancient synagogue left on the original site. As a matter of fact the very site itself was nothing but a pond hole, as for two generations the public at will had removed earth for one purpose or another. There were on the plot two stone tablets, which had originally stood in some honoured spot in the synagogue precincts, but at the time I first saw them one was all but buried in the mud and the other was half sunken in mud on the verge of the pond. This plot of land is just east of the mercantile street called the Earth Road, and south of the other big street known as the Great West road. Leading east from it to a large residential street is a narrow way called the "T'iao Ching Hu T'ung." "Plucking Sinue Lane" that is the "Lane leading to the Jewish Quarter."

In the neighbourhood of the plot of land that was purchased by the Canadian Church Mission some few years ago, there dwells a little old man by the name of Chao. He keeps a tiny tea shop, and in the old days had rubbings of the stones for sale. This Mr. Chao has one of the "Seven Families" names that remain of the original larger community. He is himself married to a Mohammedan wife, but in answer to a multitude of questions could only reveal that he knew next to nothing about his antecedents, and absolutely nothing about the peculiar tenets of the faith to which his fathers originally belonged.

He is typical of the 250 to 300 members of the seven tribal families that remain in this district. One would say of them that they are in all things like the ordinary Chinese families around them. They have less knowledge of "one God" than the Mohammedan members of this city, and in all matters of worship they follow the non-Mohammedan, non-Christian customs of the Chinese religions. Some have said that they can trace some of the distinctive facial characteristics of the Jew, as he appears in other parts of the world. Frankly the writer must confess that he has never been able to do so, and has always thought that imagination has been brought into play by those who have made the assertion. Incidentally this result in the life of the Jewish Community bears another testimony to the Chinese power of assimilation.

Two Tablets and a Laver.

A few years ago there was a very definite attempt made by the Chinese trustees of the Milton Stewart Evangelistic Fund to align the remnant of the Jewish tribes with Christianity. Through the medium of the Canadian Church Mission, who had acquired the Jewish property from a number of the leading members of the Families, and had been made custodians of the Tablets that commemorate the coming of the original Tribes and the rehabilitation of the Synagogue, this attempt was made. At that time a registration of the families was effected, and of old and young 250 were entered. There were many who had removed from this to other districts however, some living in T'ung Hsu and others in Suichow.

The two stones that were found on the Jewish plot of land, and were given into the custody of the Canadian Church Mission, stand at present under brick protecting covers, in front of the large church erected by that Mission near the old Imperial Travelling Palace in the very heart of the city of Kaifeng. In the church and at present used as a Baptismal font stands what in ancient days was one of the ceremonial lavers of the synagogue. This laver is chiselled from a block of stone in the form of a lotus lily, with a base in the same general design. It was purchased from one of the signatories (a leading man among them also named Chao) of the deed which transferred the property to the Canadian Church Mission, and Bishop White, head of that Mission, was assured by him that it was indeed from the ancient synagogue. So far as I have been able to find from inquiries no other relicts of the synagogue can be seen around this city.

Memorial Stones' Record.

There are two stones preserved. The main stone was chiselled according to the date it bears in 1489 A.D. The reverse of this stone was cut in the year 1512, and thus brings the history of the colony to that year. The other stone is in a very poor state of preservation and reveals very few facts: there is enough, however, to give some idea of later events till the year 1653. It was erected in the second year of Kang Hsi in 1663.

The first stone purports to have been erected"To commemorate the re-establishment of the 'Ch'ing, chen tsi' or the Temple of the pure and true religion." A running translation is as follows. "This stone is erected by Chin Ying of Ning Hsia in Kansu, and Chin Li of Kaifeng, Honan, in the second year of the Emperor, Hung Chih of the Ming Dynasty.

"The religion of 'I-tsi-loh-yeh' Israel, was founded by Abraham, the nineteenth generation from Adam. He received the doctrine from our ancestors. He followed their teaching without making idols, flattering gods or spirits, and having no faith in magic. He gave the doctrine to Moses, who was a man of wisdom and character.

"Moses got the Holy Books from the Hill of Sinai after fasting and praying for 40 days and nights. The Holy Book is divided into 53 volumes, containing a great body of the finest moral teaching.

"Moses gave the doctrine to Ezra. This doctrine was based on four fundamental principles, purity, truth, respect and worship. Worship should be observed three times a day, and before each time of worship those taking part should bathe the body and change the clothing.

Chinese Emperor's Favour.

"The Religion came from T'ien Chu, India. In the Sung Dynasty persons bearing 70 tribal names offered presents of cloth to the Chinese Emperor After examining their books, he professed himself as satisfied that they were true people and bade them live wherever they wished. In the first year of the Emperor Lung Hsing, 1163 A.D. the first temple was built. In the 16th year of the Emperor Tsi Yuan, 1279 A.D. the temple was restored.

"The first Emperor of the Ming Dynasty offered a safe and peaceful asylum to any who wished to become his subjects. At that time the members of the pure and true religion adopted Chinese clothing, customs and ceremonies.

"In the 19th year of the Emperor Yung Lo of the Ming Dynasty, 1421, permission was granted to Dr. An Ch'ing to rebuild the temple once again. It was in this temple that the members of the religion permitted a tablet to be placed inscribed, 'Long live the Emperors of Great Ming.'

"In the third year of T'ien Shun, 1461 A.D. the temple was destroyed by a great flood, but was again soon rebuilt. When the Emperor Cheng Hwa ruled China three members of the Kao family rebuilt the rear Hall with their own money and preserved three copies of the Holy Scriptures therein. In the second year of the Emperor Hung Chih a piece of land was purchased, foundations were prepared, the buildings were erected, and a momument was set up."

The Pure and True.

The stone puts the members of the community on record as professing that, "All the three religions have their own temples: in the same way the pure and true religion has its temple, in which God is worshipped. The true religion has many similarities with Confucianism. While the religion comes from God, it permits respect for the Emperors of China."

The reverse side of this stone claims to be "A monument for commemorating the Temple in which the Holy Scriptures are revered" It says that the "Religion of Israel came from India, but had Adam as its original founder. This religion has a Holy Bible divided into four series with 53 books. The founder of the religion in its present form was Abraham, and the revealer of the Bible was Moses. The original religion came into China in the Han Dynasty." (Then several dates are repeated similar to those on the front of the stone, and then) "This temple was built to give respect to the Holy Scriptures. Every member of the religion, no matter where he may live gives respect to the Scriptures.

"The doctrines in the Bible are nearly similar to those contained in the Confucian Classics. Any one who observes them will become a good man.

"This religion was passed on from generation to generation as follows: Adam, Noah, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, The Twelve Tribes, Moses, Aaron, Joshua and Ezra."

The Temple Rebuilt.

From the third monument it is learned that the temple was destroyed and the scriptures lost in the 15th year of the Emperor Ts'ung Cheng of the Ming Dynasty, 1642 A.D. Afterwards the Scriptures were collected and rearranged by famous men who knew them well.

"In the 10th year of Shun Chih of the Ch'ing Dynasty, 1653 A.D. the temple was once again rebuilt."

The front face of the main tablet has been chipped in several places, especially where the list of names appears. It is said by those who profess to know that the chipping was done during the Boxer trouble to prevent the Boxers looking up the families. This may indeed be the fact as the surface there is white showing no signs of age, such as even the years from the Tai Pings would have given.

From several places in the record of the stones one can trace very early defections from Jewish tribal customs and from the old jealous guardianship of scriptures and temple worship. The present state of the remnant of the Jewish community might have been anticipated by prophets centuries ago, had there been such among them then.

ADMIRAL Leveson, who will shortly be relieved by Vice-Admiral Sir Allen F. Everett, has been Commander-in-Chief for two years in the Far East, although formerly the tenure of this command was three years. The fewer flag appointments now available are by this means distributed over a larger number of officers.

AMERICAN AVIATORS IN JAPAN

Arrival in Poetic Scenery Scarred with Battling in Arctic Gales

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT

Tokio, May 22.

The little town of Kasumigaura (Lagoon in the Mist) where the Japanese navy has its principal aerodrome and aeronautical training station was crowded with thousands on thousands of Japanese and foreigners this evening all straining their eyes and craning their necks to catch a glimpse of the American round-the-world aviators who were due some time before dark.

Suddenly three specks appeared against the setting sun. A loud shout from the assembled throngs greeted the sight. The specks grew bigger, took form, and three planes in triangular formation swept into view. American and Japanese flags, by the thousands, were waved frantically by school children, a detachment of blue-jackets stood at attention, the planes came nearer, the inmates waved greetings to the crowds waiting to do them honor. A few minutes later the landing was completed. Banzais rent the air, sailors threw their caps in much the same fashion that school boys the world over do, people pressed forward to see the aviators, cameras clicked. The conquest of the Pacific by air was completed.

A demure little Japanese lass, wearing a navy-blue serge skirt and sailor-fashion silk blouse, represented the Governor of Ibarai Prefecture in which is situated Kasumigaura and was amongst the first to welcome the intrepid American airmen to Japan. She tendered them a beautiful bouquet of chrysanthemums, the proudest of Japan's floral treasures. A pat on the head and thanks were uttered.

Airmen Worn Out.

The airmen looked completely worn out. There was not much enthusiasm visible in them. For weeks they had been battling with all the elements and some of these at their worst, battling with them while death was often staring them in the face. For weeks they had no bath; for weeks they had lived on tinned provisions; for weeks they had gone without a proper sleep; so that when Lieutenant Wade Smith jocosely told the little Japanese lady who, with her arms laden with flowers, bade the aviators welcome to the Land of the Rising Sun, that what they wanted more was "a wash, a bite and a bed," he was more than merely joking.

The little village of Kasumigaura, which depends for its existence on the Japanese aerodrome there, broke out into a perfect criss-cross of Rising Suns and Stars and Stripes. The entire population took a holiday; people coming in from all holitions of the country, from the muddy paddies and from the fashionable towns, swelled the tiny village's population to an extent it has never yet had, not even when has Japanese aerodrome was first publicly opened after Colonel the Master of Semphill, who instructed the Japanese in naval aviation, had completed the station.

Tokio is planning all manner of festivities in honor of the aviators who will come to the capital by motor to-morrow. They can not fly here because Tokio is within the fortified zones.

A chain of American destroyers is patrolling the Japanese coast and the sea between Nagasaki and Shanghai. The next lap on the world-girdling flight will be to Kagoshima where the planes will refuel and from thence they will make a bee-line for Shanghai. Kasumigaura will be left behind some time next week and the flying trio from across the Pacific are expected to reach Shanghai about the second week of June.

Despite the feeling over the exclusion bill, the press tenders a warm welcome to the American airmen whose courage and perseverance have evoked the warmest admiration of the Japanese, for the Japanese are a sporting peeople.

Newspaper Comment.

Typical of the newspaper comment are the two following extracts from two different journals:

The "Yomiuri," a nationalist organ, says: "We warmly congratulate the American aviators on the feat they have achieved in being the first to cross the Pacific by air, and the warmth of our congratulations is not in any way lessened by the recent action of Congress in humiliating us. We admire their courage and perseverance in facing the rigors of the inhospitable frigid zones through which they winged their way here. Their success shows how scientific Americans are and it also shows that the human faculty to govern natural force is steadily increasing. We pray that they will achieve final success and girdle the world."

The feat of the Americans is also regarded as a menace and as a lesson to Japan. One paper, after paying a tribute to the airmen, discusses why Japanese are so backward in aviation and assigns the following reasons: (1) lack of skill in operation of airplanes; (2) technical defects in the manufacture of planes; (3) the small budget appropriation. The military and naval authorities are urged to abridge other items of their huge budgets and to release more funds for aviation, and the Government is urged to give technical men better pay and to guarantee them a good living. "The superiority shown by the foreign fliers," this paper remarks, "is a menace as well as a lesson and Japan should profit by it as early as possible.

CHINESE BIOGRAPHERS

Absurd Fiction Perpetrated by Peking Papers on Supposed Death of Ku Hung-ming

FROM RODNEY GILBERT.

Peking, May 27.

The local Chinese press has contrived to kill off Mr. Ku Hung-ming, although the latter, as the writer's eyes have borne witness, is as active and well as ever.

Although Mr. Ku's obituary notices were very flattering and must give him no little satisfaction, the biographies published, no two of which were alike, have all been amazing examples of Chinese journalistic inaccuracy. Nothing like Eugene Chen stood in the way of confirming Mr. Ku's alleged demise in the first place and, in the second place, it would have been a simple matter to have got an accurate story of his life from his family or his intimate friends.

If the absurd fiction which the local papers published within 48 hours of Mr. Ku's supposed death is a criterion of Chinese biographical methods, it would be a good thing for all celebrities who want posterity to know who and what they really were to arrange for a premature death in print and then re-emerge and correct the published biographies.

JAPAN AND RUSSIA

Official Attitude Unchanged: Press Opinion on the Chinese Agreement

Tokio, June 2.

The conclusion of the Russo-Chinese Agreement has at present evoked little comment here. The official attitude towards the negotiations with Russia is unchanged, according to the "Kokumin," which is of opinion that Article 4 of the new agreement will inevitably lead to international compications. The "Nichi Nichi" thinks that China's success with regard to rights from Russia will encourage her to attempt to recover similar rights and interests from other Powers, and notes with interest M. Karakhan's apparent change of front in consenting to a fresh discussion of points which he declared were already settled.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

JAPAN'S IMPERIAL WEDDING CELEBRATIONS

Tokio, May 31.

From this evening for the next six days Japan will publicly celebrate the Imperial Wedding. The series opens at the Palace this evening, with a State banquet at which the Empress, the Prince Regent and the Crown Princess and other members of the Imperial Family, officials and members of the Diplomatic Body will be present. In the city the celebrations will be held next week.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

HARAKIRI FOR EXCLUSION ACT

Suicide Near U. S. Embassy in Tokio: Letters of Appeal Found on the Body

Tokio, May 31.

Indignation at the American Exclusion Legislation is alleged to have led to a case of "Harakiri" this morning in the neighbourhood of the site of the American Embassy.

Three letters were found by the police on the body of a man who committed suicide, addressed respectively to Mr. Woods, U. S. Ambassador, the Japanese nation and the police. The first letter was addressed, "An appeal to the people of the U. S. A. through Mr. Woods, who understands and sympathizes with Japan," and was signed "A nameless subject of the Mikado."

The man has not yet been identified, though he appears, from the courteous tone and style of the letter, to be educated and a Christian.

He appeals "through death for a new Bill cancelling the exclusion clause, which is an affront to Japan: I am a Japanese: Japan has been humiliated by your country without justification: I would rather die than live to hate your people.

Views of America's Action.

June 1.

The reaction at present manifesting itself in Japan against the American Exclusion Act covers a wide range. On one side may be placed the view that "the righting of the wrong" should be left to the good sense of the American people, "who are obviously disappointed at the turn of events," or that a solution should be found by appeal to the world and to international co-operation without thought of race prejudice or distinction, and also the introspective views of a certain section of intellectuals that Japan's internal helplessness is the chief cause of the present situation and that the remedy lies with herself in regaining confidence and purging her own body politic and economic.

On the other side is the call to the nation by reactionaries and others that Japan must throw over the West and turn again to the Orient. Thus the "Hochi" declares: "Japan has hitherto relied principally on America, but henceforth her diplomacy and economics must be conducted independently. She must settle her own problems, including immigration, for herself." This view is finding expression in the convening of a series of national meetings, some of which aim definitely at the formation of an Asiatic union, in a demand for the exclusion of American Christianity and the withdrawal of American missionaries, which would naturally find support from the Shinto and Buddhist priesthood, and in a resolution by certain women's societies, shops and others to boycott American-made toilet and fancy-goods. It is not because Japan does not appreciate American friendship, but because she wishes to convince America that she has acted unfairly that Japan is going to demonstrate her anti-American sentiments, is the explanation of one of the promoters of a national meeting which will be held on June 8.

Yesterday's suicide has created a profound impression on the public, and is freely commented on as a true reflection of the sentiments of the nation, though the act itself may not be commended nationally. Mr. Okada, the chief of the foreign section of the Metropolitan Police Bureau, interviewed, recorded his admiration of the act, which, he declares, bears no sign of insanity. He has instructed his subordinates to honour the remains as if they were those of a hero of battle. The man has not yet been identified. Steps are being taken by his admirers to arrange a national funeral.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Dr. Ku Hung-ming, who has lately been erroneously reported as having passed away, will shortly leave on a trip to Japan, in response to an invitation by his Japanese friends. Mr. S. Yeguchi, Director of the Mitsubishi firm, placed his villa at his disposal. Dr. Ku will break his journey to Tokio at Seoul where he will be the guest of Baron Saito, the Governor-General of Chosen.

NANKING A CENTRE OF NEW LEARNING

Phenomenal Growth of Educational Institutions: School for Koreans Too

From Our Own Correspondent.

Nanking, June 4.

For both geographical and political reasons, Nanking is rapidly a centre of learning and progress in China. Centrally located, at present free from political disturbances and with large areas of land available for building purposes, educational progress is encouraged and made possible. The universities and schools are more and more dominating the life and interests of the city.

The Southeastern University has a budget for the year 1923-1924 of $60,000 and it looks as though the full amount will be received before the end of the year. On June 25, the imposing new Library will be dedicated. At the same time, the corner-stone will be laid for the new science hall on the site of the burned buildings. The total cost will be about $200,000. The new Science Hall together with the recitation building which is going up will accommodate three times as many students as the building which was destroyed. The students of the University contributed an average of $20 toward these new buildings and each professor contributed a month's salary.

The Military Governor has recently donated a set of old Chinese coins of considerable value which are to be kept on exhibition at the new library of the Southeastern University. The library is receiving large additions of books to replace those burned. The Department of Geology and meteorology is now publishing a monthly weather Bulletin, with detailed reports of daily weather conditions.

A new Science Hall will soon be built at the University of Nanking. The Famine Fund Committee has voted $50,000 Mex. toward the erection of this building, in which the Agricultural, Forestry and Biological Departments of the University will be housed. The China Medical Board has recommended a grant of $25,000 and $30,000 for equipment. Plans for the new Dormitory at the Language School, to cost $50,000, are about complete.

New Wing of Hospital Opened

On May 22, the new wing of the University Hospital was opened. The building is thoroughly modern and wonderfully well equipped. It cost $60,000 and has 60 beds. The University Hospital now has a staff of eight foreign doctors and two foreign nurses, two Chinese doctors and 26 nurses in training. Last year, there were 48,000 treatments and 2,000 hospital patients. The summer of 1924 promises to be a busy one here.

National bodies will hold important gatherings in Nanking, and three summer schools will be in session. These conferences and schools will draw prominent educators and speakers from all parts of China. Liang Chi-chao, Tsai Yuan-pei, Fan Yuen-lien and other notables are expected.

There are now 107 Popular Education Schools here with an enrolment of 3,700 students. Already over a thousand people have been taught the 1,000 Chinese characters.

A unique educational adventure here is the establishment of a school for Koreans. Plans are under way for a 16-room school building. Already 42 pupils are in attendance.

Furbishing Up the Ming Tombs

Extensive renovations have been made in recent months at the Ming Tombs. Cement steps have been built in the Sun Chung Tai Tunnel. Much of the old débris has been cleared away. A new road has been built and there are plans for developing a park around the stone monuments. A school has been started for the beggar children who swarm round the Tombs and prey upon visitors. Plans are also being considered for a park in the Old Ming City. The Shiuhan Park, with its museums, coloured-tile buildings and gardens, the Drum Tower Park and the large reforested Park at the base of Purple Mountain are now favourite resorts of the populace.

The New Y.M.C.A. Building, to cost G.$60,000. will be begun this autumn. Land has been secured in the centre of the city. The Southeastern University Christian Association is now campaigning for building subscriptions. A fine piece of land has been secured adjoining the campus, and the building will be used as a social and religious centre. This will be the first such building in a Chinese government university.

MISSIONARIES EXPELLED FROM MONGOLIA

The Secretary of the British and Foreign Bible Society has just received a commmunication from their sub-agent in Mongolia stating that the Swedish missionaries have been expelled from Urga. The officials now in power in Urga are young Mongols said to be inspired by Russian Soviet sympathies and therefore anti-Christian.

About two months ago all the missionaries' books and correspondence were seized and confiscated. Among the books were 3,000 copies of the Gospels belonging to the Bible Society. Now comes the news that the missionaries themselves have been compelled to leave.

Missionary work among the Mongols has always been enormously difficult and only in very recent years have there been signs of response from the people to the Christian Message. It is therefore greatly regretted that the work in Urga has thus been interrupted.

WAS IT KATSU OR FAITH HEALING?

Mystery of Prince Matsukata's Miraculous Escape from Death

(By Alfred E. Pieres).

Was it Christian science, the mysterious Katsu, or merely wrong computations that made of Prince Matsukata, the aged Japanese elder statesman whose death was flashed around the world, a very live man. This question is engrossing Tokio to-day, for Prince Matsukata will have more of a say regarding the manner in which these islands of the Far East should be governed now that the Kiyoura Ministry has met defeat at the polls than any of the politicians who wrested victory at the general elections.

Those who believe that Christian science was responsible for rescuing the octogenarian Japanese public figure from the jaws of death say that, when he was in a critical condition and recovery was deemed impossible, one of his sons, Mr. Yorisuké Matsukata, had just returned from the United States with his wife. The younger Matsukata took an intense interest in Christian science and, according to reports, conveyed the first message of this faith to his dying father.

The Prince listened attentively to what his son had to say and, from then on, it is said, refused to have anything more to do with his physicians, putting his trust in God, as it were.

Very Much Alive To-day.

He is very much alive to-day, not merely existing, but with his strength and faculties so restored that he presides at important councils of State. On him will depend, in large measure, the nature of the next Ministry that will wield power in this Empire.

The Japanese generally believe that Katsu effected the cure. Katsu, resolved into ordinary terms understandable to the average layman, consists of a method of resuscitating the nerve centres in certain parts of the human body, and, by stimulating these nerves, bringing about a reaction of the heart.

According to those who believe that Katsu reclaimed Prince Matsukata, the Prince was not dead, to the well-known Japanese belief that death does not set in until actual decomposition.

Believers in Katsu do not accept the possibility of death by shock. The reported deaths by shock in the Great War have merely shocked them. This belief is also held by the Army and Navy, I am in a position to state that in neither Services is any provision made for death by shock. It is needless to add that this is not the result of any short-sightedness, for Japan has certainly taken care not to lose any of the lessons her wars and other wars have been able to teach.

The secret of Katsu is still jealously guarded, but is said to be applied with fair frequency in jiu-jitsu places and in sumo encounters where it not infrequently happens that persons are thrown down with such violence as to result in severe stunning, sometimes leading to a temporary cessation of cardiac action.

What brought Prince Matsukata back to vigour and activity from what his physicians regarded as a death bed? Was it Christian Science or was it Katsu? Tokio is puzzling its brains to find out, but has not yet been successful in reaching a definite conclusion.

As a result of the strike among the students in the Amoy University, which has arisen from demands of the students that the President, Dr. Lim Boon-keng, and a number of teachers, including the Dean, be dismissed forthwith, the Amoy Police have arrested several of the teachers in order to satisfy the demands of the students. Meanwhile, Dr. Lim is reported to have secured the assistance of the director of construction and some 500 labourers to subdue the students by beating them with canes, sticks and bamboos. The head of the Students' Union received bruises which have since resulted in his death, states the "Journal of Commerce," whilst a large number of other students have received more or less severe wounds.

HUNAN SOUTHERN AT HEART

Although Changsha is Occupied by Northern Forces: Foreigners Dealing in Arms

From Our Own Correspondent

Siangtan, Hu., May 21.

There is no doubt where Hunan stands politically now. The North has taken over the Government, but has left Gen. Chao Heng-ti in charge. It remains to be seen what effect this will have on the Provincial Assembly. It is still in session and it is reported that it refuses to disband itself. The North will probably think that through gaining control of Chao and Hunan it has taken a step towards reunification, but Hunan is strongly Southern in sympathy. There is no doubt that nine-tenths of the people, soldiers and all, are Southern in their sympathies and would rally round Dr. Sun more quickly than any other leader in China. The writer was impressed with this fact by a conversation recently with a Christian leader in Changsha, who spoke of a recent book that Dr. Sun has written. It seems to be a long dissertation about railways and motor-roads, and the possibility of these roads being built by soldiers. In passing, this leader said that Wu Pei-fu has nothing original or helpful to offer for the unification of China. I believe this is characteristic of the great majority of the thinking Hunanese.

Yochow and Changteh are in the hands of the North. Northern soldiers occupy both places. The railway and Changsha also are in the hands of the North. In a recent journey to Changteh one could see the importance that opium is taking in the business and political life of that area. Our boat was stopped at least five times to be searched for opium. Every launch seems to carry some of it among its cargo.

It was reported that four or five foreigners were living in Changteh dealing in arms and opium. It is not known who they are nor where the arms came from, but it is certain there is considerable arms smuggling continually going on.

Rice is still going out in large quantities. Rice merchants are losing money through the low prices. Some are having to sell rice below the purchase price, and have had it on hand for a long time. Money is easier than it has been for months, though the exchange does not change. Paper bills are now worth the same as silver dollars.

The river is very high and floods are feared, if rains do not cease soon.

Messrs. Butterfield & Swire's are building a large addition to their warehouse space on the waterfront.

Siangtan of late has been doing a big business in human hair, but there seems to be a slump just at present and local dealers say there is no price or demand for the goods.

The Siangtan-Hsinghsiang motor-road is nearing completion, though it is not likely to be ready for use before the latter part of June or July.

VACCINE IN SHANGHAI

U. S. Seamen's Charges of Poorness of Quality

Manila, June 2.

Shipping Board officials are investigating charges by seamen of the West Orowa and the West Keats that the Shanghai Public Health Department is using poor quality vacoine.

Nearly a dozen seamen, who had been vaccinated in Shanghai, have been confined in Manila Hospitals recently. One of them had five operations on his arm and another was laid up for 60 days. The men declare that the number of cases shows that there has not been infedtion from external sources.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

An attempt was made on Saturday evening to poison the Ex-Emperor Hsuan Tung, states the "Sinwan-pao." As a result several arrests have been made and some 70 members of the Imperial kitchen have been dismissed from the service.

TAGORE IN WUCHANG

Old-time Eastern Sage Addresses the Half-Westernized Ones in a Sports Field

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Wuchang, May 30.

Dr. Rabindranath Tagore paid a brief visit during the week-end. He stayed in Hankow, where he addressed a large audience on Sunday morning; but in the afternoon he crossed the river in order to speak to the students of Wuchang.

There was no sign of the opposition which has manifested itself in some other places, and the expectation which Tagore's visit had aroused was shown by the large audience of between three and four-thousand students who, on a very hot afternoon, cheerfully waited in the open arena of the athletics ground to hear his address.

As in other places, the appearance and personality of Tagore made a great impression. With his flowing Indian robes, his erect spare figure and earnest, dignified bearing, he might have been some Hebrew prophet of old. His message, too, was worthy of a prophet. Even so might Amos have stood before the evil Jeroboam by the altar at Bethel, or Jeremiah upbraided the people for their sins in the streets of Jerusalem. In flowing, even English, he addressed us, and the vibrant tones of his clear voice reached even the outskirts of the audience, so that for those who understood very little was lost. When the English address was finished, it was very ably interpreted by Mr. Hsu Chih-meng, a Chinese scholar educated at Cambridge. Unfortunately, the interpretation was a mere summary, which lost much of the force and expression of the original. Nevertheless it was the man who spoke, and the circumstances of the time that made his address impressive. It was the Indian mystic speaking to the modern Chinese student. It was the old Oriental sage speaking to the Oriental of a transition period. Even so might Confucious, or still more Mencius, have stood and spoken to his countrymen.

Dr. Rabindranath Tagore warned his hearers that the new desire for the fruits of Western science and progess in material riches will not give lasting satisfaction. Rather, if it is divorced from moral aims and spiritual development, it will end in ruin. He did not condemn scientific inquiry, or the desire for physical well-being—here his sanity is above the mere fakir or devotee. But moral values are the only lasting wealth, and if these are neglected, all that is worth seeking will be lost in the end. The West, as well as the East, may well take heed and learn.

Capt. d'Oisy and Nanking

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Nanking, June 2.

It is understood that the chief flounces or ruffles disposing of the reason for Marshal Chih's opposition to Capt. d'Oisy's landing here was not antagonism to Tupan Lu Yung-hsiang, but bad feeling against the French.

The French, the Tuchun thinks, have done nothing but harm to China. Therefore, he will not recognize or give them any assistance.

Tuchun's Reticence.

There is a dearth of political gossip in Nanking these days. Tuchun Chi is evidently keeping his plans secret.

Extensive plans are being discussed for the development of Nanking as a port. But in this connexion also, nothing has been disclosed.

A fairly attended meeting was held at the British Legation Theatre, Peking, last Friday to consider the establishment of a British School in Peking. The chair was taken by Mr. Alexander, Major Wearne acting as secretary to the meeting. The proposals were placed before the meeting by Major Wearne and after some discussion a Temporary Financial Committee was appointed to formulate more definite plans, to collect information, and to report.

U. S. EMBASSY IN JAPAN

Dr. Schurman Not Welcome as Successor to Mr. Woods

Tokio, June 1.

In an editorial article to-day the "Nichi Nichi" voices opposition to Dr. Schurman as a sucessor to Mr. Woods, not on personal grounds, but because, judging by his actions and statements while in China, the journal is of an opinion that another choice would be better "to patch up the break in the friendly relations with America."—Reuter's Pacific Service.

MR. CYRUS WOODS' RESIGNATION

A Popular Minister: Hearty Send-off from Tokio: Many Entertainments

Tokio, June 5.

Mr. Woods, who since the announcement was made of his resigning the American Ambassadorship has been extensively entertained publicly and privately as a token of the Japanese appreciation of his sympathy and services at the time of the earthquake as well as in the more recent American-Japanese difficulties, left for Yokohama this morning with his family and will leave for the United States to-morrow by the President McKinley. His departure from Tokio was the occasion of a most enthusiastic ovation and demonstration of thanks by thousands of students of Universities and Colleges and the general public, who filled up the station plaza and platforms and gave vociferous "banzais," to the departing train. Mr. Woods was seen off by Baron Matsui, the Foreign Minister; Sir Charles Eliot, the British Ambassador; M. Paul Claudel, the French Ambassador; and other officials and members of the Diplomatic Corps.

In a message to the people, Mr. Woods expressed thanks for the friendliness and helpfulness of the people and press of Japan and pledged himself to the promotion of concord between America and Japan, which was vitally necessary for the welfare of the world.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Five of the six occupants, who were newly graduated from an aviation school, were killed instantaneously, while the sixth was seriously injured and his condition is considered to be hopeless. PEKING DAY BY DAY

Sino-Russian Conference: The Negotiations with Germany

Peking, June 5.

The Premier, the Minister for Foreign Affairs, the Minister of Communications, the Minister of the Navy, and also Mr. W. W. Yen, attended a meeting, held in camera, of the House of Representatives at 3 o'clock this afternoon. The meeting closed at 5 o'clock. After that the members of the Cabinet went to the Senate.

A member of the Senate asked whether the restoration of the 64 villages in the Heilungkiang province, which were leased to Russia by treaty, would be negotiated at the forthcoming Sino-Russian conference. Dr. Wellington Koo replied in the affirmative.

Mr. Wu Yu-lin, the Minister of Communications, made a report regarding the Tientsin-Pukow and the Hukuang railways and also regarding the Anglo-German loan and bonds, adding that China would take over and destroy the bonds which she had cancelled during the war.

In reply to questions, the Premier, Mr. Sun Pao-chi, said that the Sino-German agreement had not been signed yet.

However, it would be submitted to Parliament after signing, as in accordance with the Constitution it could not come into effect otherwise, but there was no necessity to submit it to Parliament before it was signed.

The members were especially requested to maintain secrecy regarding the report on the German Reorganisation Loan and bonds and news in this connexion has not leaked out yet.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

KING'S BIRTHDAY CELEBRATION

Early Morning Parade of the Navy and British S.V.C. Units: Consulate and Club

Tuesday was the King's birthday, his Majesty reaching the age of 59 years. The event was celebrated in Shanghai this year by a combined parade of a detachment from H. M. S. Titania and other naval vessels in port, British units of the S. V. C., and Sikh police, in the Consulate grounds at 8 a.m. Later in the morning, Mr. Barton, H. M. Consul-General, gave an at home for British residents at the Consulate.

The morning parade was impressive, though the British members of the S. V. C. were not nearly at full strength. The men formed up on the Bund opposite the Ewo Foreshore under the command of Major R. W. Davis and marched to the Consulate headed by the band. The sailors from the Titania and the Sikhs with their gaily coloured turbans added a picturesque touch to the scene.

The men formed up in the grounds and a feu de joie was fired to the accompaniment of a few bars of "God Save the King" played by the band.

The parade was then inspected by the Consul-General, after which Mr. Barton and his party mounted the saluting base, and took the salute. The attendance of the public was not so large as it might have been, which, in the circumstances was rather a pity, and members of the fair sex were the preponderating element. The parade marched past to the strains of "Rule Britannia." Col. W.F.L. Gordon was in command of the parade at the Consulate grounds.

The March Past

The parade marched past as follows: Naval detachment from H.M.S. Titania comprising some 40 officers and men.

Light Horse, three officers and 40 other ranks under the command of Maj. H.G.F. Robinson.

Field Artillery Battery, two officers and 30 other ranks, under the command of Capt. J. S. Hay.

Engineers, one officer and 14 other ranks under the command of Lt. J. R. Harder.

Machine Gun Company, three officers and 50 other ranks under the command of Capt. W. C. Bond.

"A" Company British, three officers and 20 other ranks under the command of Capt. M. Reader Harris.

"B" Company British, one officer and 13 other ranks, under the command of 2nd Lt. W. C. Divers.

Customs Company, two officers and 15 other ranks under the command of Capt. G. E. Marden.

Shanghai Scottish, two officers and 32 other ranks, under the command of Capt. A. S. Campbell.

Reserve Company, two officers and 22 other ranks under the command of Capt. A. W. Studd.

The band, under Bandmaster A. de Kryger, 27 other ranks.

Sikh Police, under Capt. E. I. M. Barrett, 225 men, including 20 mounted troopers.

Reception at the Consulate

The reception held at the British Consulate afterwards was attended by the foreign consuls in Shanghai, British consular officials, Mixed Court Magistrates and Assessors, Judge Sir Skinner Turner, Judge Grain, Dean Symons, Sir Edward Pearce, Gen. Ho Feng-lin and other Chinese officers and officials, naval officers and officers from the S.V.C., including Col. W.F.L. Gordon, C.M.G., D.S.O., and others, and all the principal members of the business community. There were no speeches but at noon the Consul-General proposed the King's health, which was drunk by all present.

During the morning Mr. McMeekin, President of the Association of Lancastrians in China, laid a wreath on the War Memorial in honour of the King's birthday, his Majesty being also Duke of Lancaster. The ships in port were dressed over-all in honour of the day, whilst all the British business houses were displaying the Union Jack.

Not the least enthusiastic gathering at noon by a long way was that at the Zero Club. Hidden away on the fifth floor of the "North-China Daily News" building, this very friendly club, governed more by good-fellowship and unwritten laws than anything else, escapes the notice of the man in the street. Its membership is limited and every man on the list is a veteran of the Great War. The accommodation also is limited, and the club staff as well, but there are various occasions during the year when the club is generous with its invitations and those who receive them are only too proud to avail themselves of the hospitality always displayed. The King's Birthday is one such day and there can be few occasions when so many people of note are gathered together in so small a room. High naval and military officers, Consuls, civic officials and all the best known people in Shanghai somehow managed to squeeze into the tiny club. Distinguished officers who remembered their days as junior subalterns mixed and dispensed wondrous refreshment and His Majesty's health was pledged many times over. There has been no such enthusiastically loyal organization in Shanghai as the Zero Club since the days of the Tiger Hunters' Club.

NEW CHINA MERCHANTS' GENERAL MANAGER

Mr. Fu Siao-en to Succeed the Late Mr. Chun Fai-ting

At a meeting of the board of directors of the China Merchants' Steam Navigation Company, held during the week-end, a resolution was passed conveying to the family of the late Mr. Chun Fai-ting (former manager of the company) their deepest sympathy. It was further decided that the sum of Tls. 10,000 be presented to the family as a token of the high appreciation in which his services were held, and that his salary should be paid until the end of the current year.

The Board also passed a unanimous resolution appointing Mr. Fu Siao-en, one of their fellow-directors, general manager of the company.

Mr. Fu, who is a director of the Chinese General Chamber of Commerce, is one of the wealthiest Ningpo merchants in Shanghai. He is director and general manager of the Commercial Bank of China, director of the China Merchants' S. N. Co., Supervisor of the Bank of China, and has a seat on the boards of a score of other companies. He is also a shareholder in numerous other banking, commercial and shipping concerns.

A generous giver to charity, he also interests himself in various institutions, such as the Ningpo Association and the Chinese-Foreign Famine Relief Committee, of which he is one of the treasurers. Mr. Fu, who is one of the most respected members of the Chinese community, has been untiring in his efforts to bring about better relations between Chinese and foreign residents. He has been decorated by the Chinese Government on numerous occasions for his services for the public welfare.

BISHOP BIRNEY RETURNING TO SHANGHAI

The Methodist Episcopal Mission received a telegram on Monday, saying that Bishop L. J. Birney will be returned to the Shanghai Area.

The General Conference, which met during the month of May at Springfield, Massachusetts, elected two new Bishops for China: Dr. Wallace Brown, formerly Pastor of the University Place Methodist Church, Syracuse, and Bishop George R. Grose, formerly President of De Pauw University.

Bishop Grose has been appointed to reside in Peking and Bishop Brown has been appointed to Foochow. Bishop F. T. Keeney, who was the resident Bishop in Foochow during the past four years, has been assigned to the Omaha Area.

BRITISH WOMEN'S ASSOC. GARDEN PARTY

Delightful Afternoon at Mrs. Percy Liddell's

Favoured by sunny skies and a most picturesque setting, the annual Garden Party of the BW.A., held on Tuesday afternoon in the beautiful house and grounds of Mr. and Mrs. Percy Liddell, was an altogether delightful occasion. The number of motors which lined Avenue Haig on both sides for a long distance was as convincing an indication of the number present as anything could be for, once inside, the spacious premises took care of the large number of guests without any crowding.

Mrs. E. M. Gull, Chairman, and Mrs. O. M. Green, Vice-Chairman of the Association, welcomed the guests at the door, the hospitable Entertainment Section provided an excellent tea and ice-cream, and the Sports Section kept games moving rapidly on the two tennis courts. The Russian Cadet Band played throughout the afternoon. Allied flags waved over the entrance arch, floated from standards set up on the lawn in front of the house or, strung on wires, outlined the tennis courts

Nature and the modiste collaborated successfully in a series of beautiful coloured pictures, changing as the models in the latest hues of the summer moved about over the grass, now posing effectively against the clumps of crimson ramblers which dotted the lawn, now grouping themselves into an entirely new ensemble as friend greeted friend. Crisp organdies gaily hued, effective costumes of white, ravishing lace creations, chic silk crochet outfits—in fact every novelty of the season's mode seemed reflected among the hundreds present. A very representative gathering of the membership it was, with a good sprinkling of men and some specially invited guests, among them Dr. A. W. Fearn, the President of the American Women's Club, Mr. Chang Nieh-yuen, of the Chinese Chamber of Commerce, with his wife, and others.

Y. W. C. A. BUDGET CAMPAIGN CLOSED

Total Pledges and Moneys Received $39,339

At the closing rally of the Young Women's Christian Association Campaign to raise $130,000, held on Thursday of last week it was announced that cash and pledges received totalled $39,339.15. The Blue Team collected $9,848.04, the Red, $8,096.29 the Yellow, $7,885.76, the Black, $7,231.37, and the White, $6,277.69.

Mrs. S. M. Woo, president of the Shanghai Chinese Association, thanked the Association's many friends who had worked to collect these funds. She reminded them that this was the largest sum that Shanghai had ever contributed to the work of the Y. W. C. A., and considered that there was reason for encouragement in that fact, as evidence of the growing confidence of the community in the Association.

Mrs. Woo announced that the funds in hand would supply the amount estimated as necessary to be raised in Shanghai in order to bear the running expenses of the Chinese and Foreign Associations for 1924, and to provide Shanghai's proportion of the expenses of the National Y.W.C.A. Committee for this year. A balance, which had been given toward the purchase of the land, would be so applied.

IT is understood that, as a result of repeated requests that he should remain in office, Mr. Kuan Chun, senior Chinese Magistrate at the Mixed Court, has withdrawn his resignation and agreed to stay.

MR. BENA WILLING TO DROP HIS SCHEME

Chinese Chamber's Refusal of Support for World Exhibition

In a letter to Mr. G. A. Bena, reproduced below, the Shanghai General Chamber of Commerce refuses to support his scheme for holding an international exhibition in Shanghai, on the ground that the Chinese Government already intends to hold a similar exhibition here in commemoration of the founding of the Republic.

Interviewed on Tuesday, Mr. Bena informed the "North-China Daily News" that if the Chinese Government has a real, practical scheme on foot he will fall into line with it. In fact, he will do all he can to assist in making the exhibition a success. "If the Chinese Government are really going to make a genuine attempt to hold an exhibition, I will willingly forego my own scheme," he concluded.

The text of the letter to Mr. Bena from the General Chamber of Commerce is as follows:—

Dear Sir,—Referring to the question of the formation of a committee in connexion with the project of holding an international exhibition in Shanghai, a question which was discussed at the Shanghai General Chamber of Commerce as reported in the "North-China Daily News," in its issue of the 29th ultimo, we understand that the Chambers of Commerce of the various nationalities of this city will be called upon to appoint representatives to serve on this committee. With this phase of the matter in mind, we beg to make the following observations:—

The Chinese Government has been engaged in planning for the holding of an international exhibition in commemoration of the foundation of the Republic, and the plans are in the hands of a special delegation. Shanghai has been selected as the place where the exhibition is to take place.

This Chamber has received from the Civil Governor of Kiangsu the outline of the organization programme consisting of the fundamental features of the programme in ten articles. The outline is accompanied by a request for our support and co-operation.

On March 15, 1924, when the 6th Committee meeting of our Chamber was held, the matter of the request of the Civil Governor was brought up for discussion, resulting in a reply being sent to the Civil Governor pledging the support of the Chamber.

In view of what has taken place as mentioned above, this Chamber, finding that the exhibition you have in mind is identical in nature as compared with the exhibition which the Chinese Government has planned to hold, regrets its inability to support your scheme.

Trusting we have explained to you the whole situation quite clearly.

Yours faithfully,
SUNG HAN-CHANG.
Chairman.

THE VIENNESE SINGERS

Mr. Otto Beck and Miss Rosl Schack

Though the audience at the Lyceum Theatre on Saturday night was lamentably small it esthusiastically welcomed the Viennese operatta singers, Mr. Otto Beck and Miss Rosl Schack, to Shanghai.

Their appearance here was of especial interest to music-lovers and theatre-goers generally. Neither have had an opportunity of hearing Viennese artistes in musical comedy for possibly ten years, and the former would no doubt be willing to listen to the music of the present-day Lehars, Falls and Oskar Strausses, of which mention is constantly being made in the Home newspapers. There was only one item of the more familiar genre of Viennese light opera, the Serenade from "Frasquita" by the popular Lehar. The rest of the composers represented were Reinhardt, Bromme, Oskar Geiger and R. Benatzkl. Of their music, that which we heard unmistakeably shows the influence of jazz and as the evening progressed wore rather thin.

Miss Schack has a sweet and at times beautifully shaded soprano voice, but it does not aways attract by its quality so much as by her vivacious personality. She is full of life and brought many laughs in the sketch, "La Valse Soupe" and in her somewhat audacious "Erst kommt der Frühling, dann die Liebe" (Bromme). Mr. Beck sang the Serenade from "Frasquita" with much charm and perfect enunciation, which is pleasing characteristic of both singers. He is well equipped as a musical comedy artist, and like his partner, gave a number of different songs in different moods, successfully merging himself in the spirit of each.

AMERICAN AVIATORS IN SHANGHAI

A Great Welcome from Enthusiastic Crowds: Flight from Japan a Triumph of Organization: Piloted Across by Destroyers: A Landing without Incident

Two of the American round-the-world fliers came to a beautiful landing in the Huangpu, off Black Point alongside the Socony Installation at 3.10 p.m. on Wednesday after flying more than seven and a half hours, having left Kagoshima at 7.30 a.m. Shanghai time. This brought them into the harbour with a flying time of seven hours and 40 minutes. Lieuts. Nelson and Wade, commanding the two machines, with their assistants, Lieut. Arnold and Sergt. (now Lieut.) Ogden, were forced to leave their anchorage at Kagoshima without their comrade and commander, Lieut. Smith, who, it was reported in an official cable to Mr Yada, Consul-General for Japan, had engine trouble and could not get away. They hovered in the vicinity, flying but 45 miles in an hour and 40 minutes, without seeing their friend and then decided to come on without him. This naturally caused some delay in getting to Shanghai and a subsequent shortage of fuel.

The first glimpse of the planes was by a Chinese laodah on board the Scot I, who spotted them while they were still miles away. Cheers rang out over the river, whistles were blown and it almost seemed as if the airmen were aware of the reception, for they turned directly toward the big tender with the assembled Americans and their official guests who had waited so long for the arrival. This, however, was purely conjecture, for they were still miles away.

The specks became larger and the machines became boldly prominent in the blue sky with the sun beating from the west upon them. Then they turned directly toward Shanghai and as it seemed right over the Huangpu; they had been above the Yangtze all the while until this moment. From a formation which appeared to be side by side, the forward plane swung to the left and higher, the other appearing to drop behind and lower. Before reaching Woosung the pilots evidently sighted Shanghai and swung into position for the swoop down, from a point due south. As they neared Shanghai College in their approach to the anchorage, they turned into line. Down swooped the first plane until it seemed to be barely above the water. A coasting steamer on the way to the mouth of the river caused a sudden change and the machine went up again, passed the str. Laowedon deck high, flew halfway to Shanghai and then turned again. The two machines then descended, hit the water and ploughed roughly through the muddy swell of the incoming tide, throwing spray high on to the side of the passing vessel, which obscured the view.

The First Welcome.

Pandemonium broke loose from the official tender. Capt. Eisler, in charge of arrangements, pushed off from the Scot I in his launch, and drew alongside the pontoons, shouting, "Hello, from Shanghai!" The U.S. launch went alongside and Mr. E. S. Cunningham, American Consul-General, reached a hand over the side and drew Lieut. Wade over the rail, cameras operating furiously the while. The Consul-General redoubled his welcome when he got the aviator over the top and the crowd pushed up to have the opportunity of grasping their hero's hand. Introductions followed and a minute later Lieut. Nelson drew alongside and was likewise besieged.

One of the thoughtful ladies rushed for the improvised bar and filled two glasses with whiskey and soda, which the aviators gratefully quaffed, Lieut. Nelson saying, "This is just what a man likes after eight hours in the air!"

Assembled on the upper deck were the official guests, including Mr. Barton (H. M. Consul-General), Mr. Yada (Consul-General for Japan) and Mrs. Yada, Major Hilton Johnson, Mr. S. Fessenden (Chairman of the Municipal Council), Gen. Ho Feng-lin, Commander Sen of the Chinese Navy, Judge and Mrs. Purdy, Mr. J. P. Davis (Executive American Consul), Dr. W. T. Findley (acting Consul for Mexico and Brazil), Mr. Walter Chalaire, Mr. Gardner Crane (Commander of the American Legion), Mr. A. Bassett (American Relief Association) and Lieut. Maskovsky, a Polish aviator. Both banks of the river for a mile were thronged, and when the aviators went over to the Shanghai College the students and American faculty shouted acclamations at seeing them upon this momentous trip round the world. The Point was black with men, women and children who had motored to the spot and the river bunding from there to the big lumber mill above was a mass of spectators. On the east shore, Pootung, the Vacuum Co.'s Installation plant and the Socony platforms and landing stages accommodated crowds who had come to the scene on Socony launches, which, true to predictions, carefully kept to the shore and out of the way. Upstream, ships' crews ranged along the rails but one man was left to each whistle and the noise drowned

the minor notes of welcome. Yangtszepoo Road for the better portion of a mile loomed black with motors of all descriptions, while the factories on both sides were thick with spectators who had brought stools and chairs to points of vantage on the roofs. An occasional small boat or sailing vessel completed the quota on the water. Chinese military guards stood at attention on Socony docks.

An Ideal Flight.

The inexperienced landsmen did not know, perhaps, that a perfect landing had been made, but both officers pronounced it as such. As a matter of fact; it was remarked that the flight from Kagoshima to Shanghai was the best one that they had undergone so far. The weather conditions were perfect, the wind was nominal, no unlooked-for events took place and the harbour was by far the easiest in which to come to a full stop, with no danger to the machines. A cordon of River Police, Customs launches and naval launches kept back traffic and as the first plane made fast the police drew alongside with the query, "Any arms aboard?" to which the reply came, "No, sir."

In the midst of the welcome Lieut. Nelson broke off for a moment and, turning to the Consul-General, insisted that the first need of the party was food for the two men who had stayed with the machines. Nourishment was sent off immediately. The aviators were high in their praise of the efficient work of the officials in charge here, complimenting Capt. Eisler and the patrol established by Captain H. E. Hillman, who was on the spot. What seemed a thousand junks were held up below the College until the airmen had made fast, when they streamed by in a mass.

The officers stated when interviewed that the arangements made for their flight across from Japan were a triumph of organization. Destroyers were strung out at intervals of 40 miles along the whole of the route, and at no time was it necessary for them even to use compasses, for the destroyers threw out heavy black smoke-screens and all that was necessary was to steer the machines from one guiding screen to the next. They flew in over Hangchow Bay and up from the south and, on account of the direction of the wind, landed in the opposite direction from that in which it was expected they would come down.

Shanghai Americans' Gift.

The party arrived at the Customs Jetty shortly before seven o'clock and were met by a military escort consisting of the Mounted Troop and the American Co., S.V.C., and were escorted to the Astor House. Mr. and Mrs. Cunningham entertained them at dinner at the Consulate-General, after which the aviators were feted at the American Charity Ball at Mr. Ellis Kadoorie's home. On behalf of the American community, they were presented with a very handsome silver bowl, the Consul-General making the presentation.

An informal, yet nevertheless a most interesting ceremony took place at the Astor House during the evening. Sergt. Ogden had been informed that his commission as lieutenant was awaiting him and that he was to be sworn in immediately. Mr. Davis, Executive Consul, performed the ceremony, after which the officer received the best wishes of the spectators.

Some time ago Mr. T. H. Ince offered a prize of G.$10,000 for the first man who crossed the Pacific Ocean in an aeroplane. It is true that these men did not cross in mid-ocean but went to the north and took advantage of the Great Circle, which, by the way, increased their dangers, as the accident which befell Major Martin will prove, but nevertheless, now that they have accomplished the feat, it remains to be seen if the Los Angeles cinema magnate will keep to his offer.

Lieut. Smith, the Commander, Arrives Safely

The third American flying machine arrived in Shanghai on Thursday afternoon with Lieut. Lowell Smith, commander of the three, and Lieut. Arnold. The plane first hove into sight while yet several miles to the northeast. Swerving oveer the river in two big circles slowly and gracefully it was brought to the water and was moored at 12 mins. after noon. The big machine came from over the horizon on much the same course as did the others, but perceptibly lower. Following the Yangtze River, Lieut. Smith came on until he had a good view of the Huangpu, when he threw over the rudder and started directly for Shanghai. He passed directly over Captain W. I. Eisler's launch, Record I, and the two other planes nearby and veered to the inside of the Customs boat, Capt. Hillman in the bows, and the River Police boat with Superintendent Woodfield on the look-out. Continuing past the anchorage, the pilot made a short run to the centre of the harbour, going well beyond the factories on the outskirts of the limits and then banked sharply, turning his nose into the direction from which he had just come. Though he made another complete circuit of the river before nearing the water it was evident that Pilot Smith was rather affording the camera men a good opportunity to secure pictures instead of seeming to be afraid of the muddy Huangpu.

Just as the opinion of the first pair of fliers was that this was the best weather that they had experienced so far, since leaving California on their 7,000-mile journey, so did Lieut. Smith express himself in a similar manner upon arrival.

Round of Receptions.

Two of the airmen were officially designated by Lieut. Smith to attend the Chinese reception at the Yamên of the Commissioner of Foreign Affairs, Mr. Hsu Yuan, where an enthusiastic throng attended; then they were entertained by Gen. Ho Feng-lin, and afterwards journeyed to the Columbia Country Club where the ladies and gentlemen of the community acted in the capacity of hosts.

Washington, June 3.

At Major Martin's request the official command of the American fliers has been transferred to Lieutenant Lowell Smith.—Reuter's American Service.

JAPANESE REGENT'S WEDDING

Imperial Celebration Kept by Japanese Consul-General with a Banquet

Mr. Yada, the Japanese Consul-General, and Mrs. Yada gave a banquet on Thursday night at the Astor House Hotel, in honour of the celebration of the wedding of Their Imperial Highnesses the Prince and Princess Regent of Japan. The guests were as follows:—

Mr. and Mrs. E. S. Cunningham, Mr. and Mrs. A. Casanova and Miss E. Revuetta, Mr. N. Aall, Mr. and Mrs. J. van Haute, Mr. and Mrs. F. Thiel, Mr. S. Barton, C.M.G., Mr. J. Lilliehook, Mr. and Mrs. W. A. A. M. Daniels, Mr. and Mrs. J. de Palencia, Mr. Don A. Arce, Mr. and Mrs. Franz Winkler, Dr. and Mrs. W. T. Findley, Mr. F. Kaestli, Sir Skinner and Lady Turner, Judge and Mrs. M. D. Purdy, Mr. L. A. Lyall, Mr. and Mrs. Tollefsen, Sir Edward and Lady Pearce, Mr. S. Fessenden, Mr. W. P. Lambe, Mr. and Mrs. V. G. Lyman, Mr. and Mrs. E. F. Mackay, Mr. and Mrs. P. L. Knight, Mr. P. W. Massey, Colonel and Mrs. W. F. L. Gordon, Mr. and Mrs. J. B. Fearn, Mr. and Mrs. O. M. Green, Mr. and Mrs. E. A. Nottingham, Mr. W. J. Davey, General and Lady Ho Feng-lin, General and Mrs. C. C. Wang, Mr. and Mrs. Hsu Yuan, Chev. and Mrs. S. K. Chen, Chev. and Mrs. N. T. Yang, Mr. and Mrs. Yao Yu, Mr. and Mrs. Sung Han-chang, Mr. and Mrs. Fong Chu-pa, Mr. and Mrs. K. S. Zee, Admiral and Mrs. C. G. Lin, Mr. and Mrs. T. Kikuchi, Mr. and Mrs. T. Tanabe, Mr. and Mrs. M. Yonesato, Mr. and Mrs. M. Nodaira, Mr. and Mrs. M. Ichiki, Mr. and Mrs. I. Akiyama, Mr. and Mrs. S. Sakuragi, Mr. and Mrs. T. Sahara, Mr. and Mrs. G. Hashidzume, Captain and Mrs. K. Otani, Mr. and Mrs. M. Yasuhara, Mr. and Mrs. H. Kishimoto, Commander O. Inose and Lieut.-Colonel and Mrs. Y. Okamura.

After dinner Mr. Cunningham rose and proposed the toast of the Prince and Princess Regent, long life and prosperity to them and all their loyal subjects.

Mr. Yada in replying said:—

"Ladies and gentlemen,—I feel that a great honour has been conferred upon me in having the opportunity to reply to the toast proposed this evening by Mr. Cunningham, Consul-General for the United States of America, for the future happiness of Their Highnesses the Prince Regent and Princess Nagako and His Majesty the Emperor of Japan. You are probably aware that the wedding of the Imperial couple was, by their own request, very quietly solemnized in January this year, on account of the earthquake disaster which befell my country in September last. All public celebrations and other functions for the commemoration of the event were therefore postponed until this month.

"As senior representative of H. I. J. M. Government present here tonight, I can most assuredly voice the heartfelt thanks that the Imperial family, my Government and also the people of Japan would have me convey for the most gracious and kindly sentiments expressed by you all through my American colleague, and I am sure they will all be extremely grateful to learn of your good wishes. I do hope, although I am unable to thank you sufficiently by mere words for your kindness, that you will permit me to return the compliment on behalf of Japan by proposing the good health and happiness of your respective rulers. Ladies and Gentlemen, "Your Respective Rulers."

After this toast had been honoured, the party adjourned from the table and the evening was very pleasantly spent in dancing.

Municipal Celebration in Tokio

Tokio, June 5.

The weather was dull and overcast to-day, but Tokio was holiday-making and festively decorated on the occasion of the municipal celebration of the Imperial wedding. The principal feature was the reception tendered to the Regent and his Princess and other members of the Imperial Family by the Mayor, the Municipal Councillors and the leading citizens. They were received in audience by the Crown Prince and Princess and offered their felicitations. The Imperial party were enthusiastically greeted by huge crowds on their way to and from the reception. A monster lantern procession will be held this evening.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

CHINESE BANK HELD UP FOR $11,000

In Broad Day: And Not a Man with Pluck to Inform Police Until 1½ Hrs. Later

A report was received at Central Station that the Yun Yue native bank had been robbed of $11,000 at 1.30 p.m. last Friday. It is stated that four men, one of whom was armed with a pistol, entered the premises at 497 Tientsin Road, and while one of them stood guard at the door, the other three stepped behind the counter. The pistol was presented at the employees who were lined up in typical "movie" fashion, and while the holder watched them, the two remaining men quickly opened a drawer in an accountant's desk and took the big sum stated in notes and, in addition, $28 in small silver.

They went out by the front door, which indeed is the only one in the building, and have not been seen since.

Although nine men were in the bank at the time of the affair, not one made a move to raise an alarm, nor did a single man go to the door to see in which direction the robbers went. Had a single whistle been blown, after they got out, anyone of a dozen watchmen in the immediate vicinity could have opened fire at the departing robbers. The police say that an armed guard stood within 12 yards of the door of the establishment. Furthermore it was not until an hour and a half later (3 p.m.) that some one came to Central Station to report the robbery, and he was a man who was not even in the bank at the time. That the police are disgusted is to put it mildly, for how can the guardians of the Settlement act efficiently if they are not informed of robberies until 90 minutes after all is over, and the only description they are given is that the robbers spoke the northern dialect. The robbers just appeared to disappear.

The bank is situated in a blind alleyway west of Honan Road, one of many similar courts on either side and has the one exit, the front door, which is the third from the corner of Tientsin Road. The watchman, who is characterized as being very efficient, was stationed on the main road. Although banks in the district have been requested time and again to have a system of giving an alarm, this one does not possess any signalling system, though most of the native banks have means of electric communication with one another; if one is molested, the others are informed, while the robbery is in progress and the police then have a fair chance to get at the malefactors.

Police Criticized.

The following letter has been addressed to the Commissioner of Police, Mr. K. J. McEuen, by the Shanghai Bankers' Guild:—

"Shanghai, being a large commercial port where Chinese and foreigners live together and engage in business, the population is a large one and the presence of bad characters is inevitable. However, there have not been any serious unfortunate happenings and the people have lived in peace, this being mostly due to your efforts in maintaining order, and the residents are really grateful to you. However, owing to the degeneration of public morality in recent years, cases of robbery have become daily occurrences and highway robberies have been frequently reported. A robbery occurred not long ago wherein a large amount of money in Government bonds was stolen, but the perpetrators of the crime were soon apprehended. Now a fresh robbery has occurred in the Yun Yue Native Bank, in broad daylight and in a business centre. If the activities of these criminals are not vigorously checked, it is to be feared that more robberies will be committed in future. The people have become greatly alarmed. If measures are not taken to prevent such occurrence the local business market will undoubtedly be seriously affected. As you are responsible for the peace and order of this place we would like to know what progress has been made into the solution of the present case and what precautionary measures have been devised. You are therefore kindly requested to make these facts known to the [illegible]."

If we are not mistaken this is the case in which the bank had installed no alarm bells and the men in the house were so terrified that they dared not so much as look out of doors to see which way the robbers went and did not notify the police until three hours after the crime. In these circumstances the letter quoted above strikes one as sheer impertinence.

THAT "ENCROACHMENT ROAD" AGAIN

One Result of "Good Roads Movement" Agitation for Road Round the Settlement

The Paoshan District Assembly has addressed petitions to the Military Governor of Shanghai and to the Civil Governor of this province in connexion with the famous road round the Settlement, to "prevent further encroachment by foreigners."

The petitions state that as a result of receipt of letters from the National Road Construction Association, all members of the Paoshan Assembly agree that the Shanghai Municipal Council is always encroaching on Chinese territory and constructing roads. The Council, when they want to make these roads, say that as communications are poor it is necessary to open new roads, but afterwards they impose water and electricity taxes, later collecting taxes and posting policemen on duty in Chinese territory.

"Therefore (says the petition) our sovereign rights are lost and even if we try to get them back, by redemption or otherwise, it is difficult, because the foreigners, once having them refuse to return them. Now the Road Construction Association advocates the road round the Settlement and the improvement of our own municipal affairs. This is a good as well as an important scheme. When we first heard that the foreigners were wanting a new extension of the Settlement, we telegraphed opposing the proposal so that they would not encroach on our rights. Now at the time of the rendition of the Mixed Court, the Legations demand an extension, and we must stop them by building a road round the settlement, if our rights are to be maintained. We hope, therefore, that you will instruct your subordinates to take steps in connexion with this immediately."

SHANGHAI'S UNOFFICIAL CABINET

Korean Provisional Government's Bankruptcy and Bombs

The approaching demise of the so-called "Korean Provisional Government" was announced last Friday in the Chinese press. The "Shanghai Journal of Commerce" reported that the "government" is rapidly losing the supporters whom it has constantly pressed for money and that desperate efforts have been made to raise funds. One scheme was the sending of a petition to the Soviet Government asking for a loan in return for mining concessions in the maritime provinces, but nothing, of course, came of this.

The same report states that the Japanese authorities in Shanghai have discovered that the leader of the Righteous Corps—the provisional government's bodyguard—has been attempting to despatch bombs and pistols to some of his supporters in Tokio for use against prominent officials on the occasion of the opening of the Imperial Diet.

At 10 a.m. on Saturday, in Lat. 31 N., Long. 141.46 E., the R.M.S. Empress of Australia sighted a water-logged Japanese junk and in response to signals of distress, the Captain stopped the ship, sent a boat away and brought off the crew consisting of two men, Heijiro Sonayama and Kaki Takemota. The junk was the Jinyoshi Maru, loaded with wood and a deck cargo of charcoal. The two men were handed over to the Japanese Consul at Shanghai and the Japanese wireless station was informed of the position of the wreck.

AMERICAN MEMORIAL DAY IN SHANGHAI

Service in Honour of the Dead: A People Who Always Have Been Adventurers

An impressive Memorial Day service, attended by a large number of Americans, was held in Bubbling Well Cemetery last Friday morning. Mr. E. S. Cunningham, U. S. Consul-General, acted as Master of Ceremonies, and standing with him on the steps of the chapel, in front of which the audience gathered, were representatives of the Settlement and American organizations, including Mr. Stirling Fessenden, Chairman of the Municipal Council; Col. W. F. L. Gordon, Commandant of the Volunteer Corps: Mr. M. D. Purdy, Judge of the U. S. Court for China; Cdr. W. Glassford, Cdr. W. A. Lee, Lt.-Cdr. Simpson and Lieut. Riefkohl, U. S. N. representatives; Mr. G. C. Crane, Commander of the American Legion; Mr. V. G. Lyman, American Chamber of Commerce; Mr. J. Harold Dollar, American Red Cross; Mr. A. Bassett, American Association, and Capt. W. I. Eisler, U. S. Shipping Board.

A landing force from the 38th U. S. Destroyer Division, U. S. S. Palos, in command of Lieut. Seabury Cook, was drawn up on one side the tree-shaded approach, while the American Co., S.V.C., commanded by Capt. V. Olsen, and the American Troop, S. V. C., under command of Lieut. H. D. Rodger, lined the other. Other American organizations represented were the American Women's Club (the president, Dr. A. W. Fearn, and a number of members being present) and the Shanghai American School, the pupils of which turned out in full force. Every detail of the service, from the inspiring moment when the Colours led the procession up the leafy walk to the chapel, to the last soft notes of "Taps," was dignified and significant.

Rev. C. L. Boynton, principal of the American School, in the opening prayer, gave thanks for the memories of the gallant dead and invoked divine assistance to make the lives of the living a gift to all the nations of the world. The Municipal Band then played an appropriate selection, and special praise should be accorded for the choice of music and the excellence of its rendering.

"To-day's Adventure."

The Rev. James M. Yard, General Secretary of the Methodist Episcopal Mission, then gave a spirited address on "To-day's Adventure," saying in introduction that there was something stirring about speaking to a band of adventurers, men and women who dared to leave home, to try something new, who had caught a glimpse of the beyond and felt the urge of pioneering. "America," continued Mr. Yard, "was born in the spirit of adventure, the 'instinct for unknown continents' burned within Columbus and something of that instinct survives in Americans to-day. We do not need to go back to the forthfaring pilgrim Fathers, the daring whalers, the pioneers of the prairie schooners, or the explorers of the Pacific Coast, we are still going on adventures.

"We remember to-day in particular those who went forth in the days of the Great War. We think of them with hushed hearts and give thanks for their noble sacrifice. Inspired by them we should dedicate ourselves to the great task of civilization which is still ahead of us. Certainly there is no spot in the world where men are more aware of the task that awaits us Americans than in this great land. Can we be as generous and as broad of vision as Lincoln and Hay? Can our men of commerce be as far-sighted as those of early days? Can our missionaries be equal to their sires in generous outlook?

"We in China should ask ourselves: 'What can we contribute to this almost eternal civilization what is worth while?' We are not living here merely to roll up a fortune, but we honestly wish to make some contribution to one of the greatest civilizations which has ever existed in the world. There can be no more difficult or delicate problem in the nations of the world than in China—a land without a government, and yet seeking to hold its relationship with the other nations of the world. Can we be patient in the midst of such reports as we get in the papers this morning? Can we be intelligent enough so that in the future, when peace again comes to China, in those great days beyond the present chaos—perhaps 50, perhaps 100 years from now—China will still think of America as her friend? That is our task, and no easy one."

After the Municipal Band played the National Anthem the Benediction was pronounced by Rev. C. M. Drury, volleys were fired by the American Co., S.V.C., over the graves of those who had died in their country's service, and "Taps" was sounded by a bugler of the U. S. Navy. Many among the audience remained to visit the graves, which had been profusely decorated with flowers and small American flags.

PLUCKY POLICEMAN

Robber's Attempted Revenge on Captor of Five Desperadoes: Shot that Missed

A dramatic story of a fight between a member of the Paoshan Police Force and an armed robber was published on Thursday in the Chinese press. It appears that on Tuesday afternoon a policeman named Tsang Tz-chiang, on patrol duty at the Pangpoo Motor 'Bus station, noticing the suspicious movements of five men, marched them off to the nearest police-station. There they were questioned and it was found that they had taken part in an armed robbery in the district some days before. After this preliminary examination the men were sent to the head station.

The policeman returned to his beat and was there only a few minutes when a member of the robber gang fired at him twice with a pistol, both shots of which, however, fortunately missed the plucky policeman, who returned fire with his rifle. The first shot caught the robber, killing him instantly. He fell and the policeman, thinking that the man was only wounded, grappled with him, but, upon finding that he was dead, let go. The body was removed to the station, and the policeman was highly commended.

GANDE, PRICE & CO. IN THEIR NEW HOME

For some reason that is not quite clear, the leading wine and spirit merchants at Home always have been associated with dilapidated and not always very clean, and certainly very untidy premises, Dirty Dick's being perhaps the most notorious, but withal one that could be thoroughly trusted for the quality of the beverages sold. One would not go so far as to suggest that any of the popular and substantial firms in the same line of business in Shanghai ever have encouraged the presence of dirt, but at least two of them have been housed for so long in buildings long past their best days that they seemed purposely to be keeping up a sort of Dirty Dick tradition, and one did not like them any the less for it. Messrs. Gande, Price & Co. had but little room in their old offices in which to swing a cat, had they possessed one, and not a great deal to spare when drawing a stiff cork, and now after long years they have moved to really commodious and handsome offices at 5 Peking Road. They had a full battalion of visitors in last Friday to wish them continued success and prosperity and one heard over and over again that the firm did not look half so cosy and hospitable in the new surroundings. However, that probably is just a prejudice born of long association and one can rest assured that the firm's beverages will not deteriorate because of the substantial walls that have replaced partitions and the handsome furniture and brass-railed counters installed in lieu of ancient tables and chairs belonging to the antique period. And without feeling that a sin is being committed, the wish may be expressed that the firm will enjoy continued and even greater prosperity than it has known for so long.

The Shanghai Chinese Bar Association has been dissolved by order of the Provincial Procurator, reports the "Shanghai Journal of Commerce."

SPRING FLOWER SHOW

Best Seen for Many Years: New Competitions: Many Entries: The Miniature Gardens

"The best show from a competitive point of view for five years," was the verdict passed by an official of the Shanghai Horticultural Society on its Spring Show held on Wednesday in the Town Hall. Certainly the number of entries was decidedly encouraging and a high standard of excellence was maintained, although Sunday's rain was responsible for much damage to Shanghai's gardens. The Horticultural Society has introduced several new features and has innovations in store for succeeding shows. The formation of a ladies' sub-committee has proved very useful in stimulating interest and the medals offered from the National Rose, Sweet Pea and Chrysanthemum Societies of England have further awakened interest.

Wednesday's show was certainly a delight to the eye and the good weather permitting wide open windows, a pleasing effect of airy openess was obtained. While the arrangement of the hall followed the lines of previous exhibitions, with the palms and the Yokohama Nursery Exhibition of dwarf trees near the door, rose arches, sweet william and potted plants banking the stage, vegetables and ferns to the left and pictures and miniature gardens, as well as cut flowers, the general effect seemed to be one of greater spaciousness and the individual exhibits stood out more distinctly than ever before.

The three miniature gardens exhibited excited much interest and their completeness of detail is remarkable, especially when one realizes that they were in every respect the exhibitors' own work. The first prize, won by Mr. and Mrs. E. J. Cornfoot, represented an English Manor House, complete to the dove-cote. A lily pond was one of the charms of this tiny domain. The second prize, won by Mrs. Ryde, showed a tennis court and a gold fish pond among its delights. The third prize, won by Mrs. Pardoe, was another of the gardens any one would love to possess, with its stepping stone walks, sun-dial and arbors. The garden paintings and photographs were delightful, but one is surprised at the small number of exhibits for it seems as if garden-lovers would surely wish to preserve the charms of their plots in lasting fashion. Decorated dinner tables drew many critics and admirers, and the opportunity of expressing an opinion by ballot was made good use of. As the tables supplied were six by four feet some of the decorations looked rather crowded in the small size, and the simple centre-piece of purple iris, with fronds of asparagus fern scored on account of its unpretentiousness. The sweet-pea exhibits were very appealing in their novel colourings. To enumerate the good points of the various classes would be too lengthy a task.

AN INVITATION TO B. E. E. VISITORS

There are pleasures and privileges awaiting visitors to the British Empire Exhibition, in addition to the extensive array of exhibits that will be staged for their inspection by British manufacturers.

The Palace of Engineering will be crammed with exhibits, representing world famous names, although in many cases the space is altogether inadquate to permit of a fully representative display. John I. Thornycroft and Co., Limited, for instance, find that they cannot possibly do justice to their wide range of engineering productions beyond the few examples they will have on view. Hence they cordially invite visitors interested in their productions to visit their engineering works at Basingstoke, and their boat-building yards at Hampton-on-Thames, both of which are one hour's journey from London.

Any of our readers who contemplate visiting the British Empire Exhibition are asked to communicate with Thornycrofts before or after their arrival in London, at "Thornycroft House," Westminister, London, S.W.1.

The annual conference of National Associated Chambers of Commerce will be held in Tsinanfu, Shantung, in September next.

SICCAWEI COLLEGE (1850-1924)

Splendid Educational Record: 74 Years of Fruitful Work
A Sketch of Pioneer Days

The early days of many educational establishments in Shanghai were modest and unostentatious in the extreme. Siccawei College is no exception to the general rule. Commenced in 1850, the same year as the "North-China Herald," it has done work down to the present day, educating and training hundreds of young men, Christians and non-Christians, who have all laboured for the welfare, progress and best interests of their country. The original class-rooms were mere Chinese quarters accommodated to the needs of the moment. A single teacher was deemed a luxury for the times. In 1860, the Taiping rebels, returning from Anhui, occupied the establishment, and the students had to be dispersed. In 1864, a typhoon swept away the roof of the building, and crushed in the fall some 20 young boys. In 1870, 20 years after its foundation, the average attendance reached to about 100. rich and well-to-do families holding to the principle of educating their children at home. In 1878, a new and more spacious building was erected, and did work till 1918, when the present day college was opened with an attendance of 417 students. Since that date, the above figures have swelled to 514, which is the actual number on the roll for the first half of 1924.

Full Records Since 1905.

Full annual records are available since 1905. On that date, the attendance numbered 268; in 1913, these figures reached 313; in 1915, the roll was 362; in 1919, it reached 417, and thence increased annually, until at the present day it attains 514. All these are full boarders, returning home and taking a holiday only twice a year. First, at Chinese New Year, when they are given about a month, and again during the warm season—July and August—when the holiday extends to these two months.

Results of the Work.

In the early days of the College, a programme suited to the needs of the country had to be wrawn up. Its general tenor was purely Chinese, the aim being to give a sound national and religious education to the mission converts, prepare intelligent helpers, teachers in village schools, and competent elders to control places too remote to be frequently visited by the missionary. Little by little the above aim was broadened, and young students were prepared for the B. A. degree, while others were trained for the native clergy, or even as members of the Jesuit Order. Rev. Father Sicca, S. J., annalist of those past days, sums up as follows the work done from 1851-1887:—Received the B. A. degree, 39 students; became teachers in mission schools 111; controlled parishes and churches, as Elders, 152; entered the seminary preparing for the priesthood, 92; joined the Jesuit Order, 17. Other statistics deal with the period from 1850-1900, or during a full half century, and give us the following results. As many as 1,650 students were registered on the rolls of the College, the number of graduates having increased to 70, while 500 became teachers and mission helpers, 117 entered the seminary, and 33 joined the Jesuit Fathers. The deceased for 50 years were reckoned at 330.

Programme and Teaching Staff.

The present day programme comprises a threefold department:—1 deg. A Higher Primary School, in which the Chinese language, literature and easy composition are taught; Chinese, and general history, geography, and the elements of Latin grammar. 2 deg. A full Secondary or High School Department comprising Chinese literature, modern style composition, the elements of philosophy, general history and geography, higher mathematics, physics and chemistry, modern languages (French and English), Latin grammar and easy extracts from Latin Authors, music, drawing, gymnastics. 3 deg. A Commercial Course for special students, wishing to engage in banking, railways, postal and telegraph work, Customs or general trading. English is principally taught in this branch of the College. In all three Departments, Catholic boys are instructed in Christian doctrine, apologetics, Bible and Church History, while non-Christians are given a course in Ethics and Natural Law.

COLLEGE FOOTBALL TEAM, No. 1, 1923-24.

THE PRESENT COLLEGE, OPENED JUNE 20, 1918 (NORTHERN FRONT.)

Throughout the year, sports, games and inter-collegiate matches are a regular feature of the College. From September last down to the Easter holidays, football matches were played against the Shanghai Public School, the Chinese Municipal School, Hanbury School, St. Xavier's School, the Franco-Chinese School, Aurora University, Nanyang Institute of Technology, and other Institutions both from the Settlements and the City. In almost all contests the College came off an easy winner.

The present-day staff comprises a President or Rector, two Prefects of Studies, one for the Foreign and another for the Chinese Department, Foreign and Chinese teachers. Among the former are some 12 Jesuit Fathers, who teach in the higher branches; the latter are partly Chinese Jesuits and lay assistants, some of whom have studied abroad, or graduated from Government Schools; a few even were former students of the College, now deemed capable of teaching the young generation.

Old Boys Association.

At the close of their educational course, students disperse to various places, some remaining in Shanghai, others proceeding to their native provinces, Anhui, Chekiang, Kiangsi, Hupeh, Manchuria, the Outports on the Yangtze, or even the provinces of the Far West. Despite this dispersion, many returned from time to time to visit their Alma Mater, and meeting others, as well as the younger generation, the idea was started to initiate an "Old Boys Association," in which all would meet occasionally, discuss mutual interests, help one another, and enjoy the presence of their former teachers. In 1921, a Committee was called, and decided to adopt the scheme. At the same time, it was resolved to hold an annual meeting at the close of June, or thereabout, and bring together all former students, who could possibly attend. The meeting was to open by a religious service, and conclude by a banquet given in the large guest-hall of the College.

Apostolic Delegate Presides.

The 4th annual meeting, which was to take place at the end of June, has been advanced, in order to send an invitation to the Apostolic Delegate and Catholic bishops, sitting in council, to attend. On Sunday morning, May 18, His Excellency, the Delegate, celebrated divine service and addressed the meeting. The singing was performed by the combined choir of Siccawei and Tungkadoo, while a former college student accompanied on the organ. At noon, all the members, number about 400, met at a banquet, enlivened by the strains of the Tusewei Band, and at which the Delegate presided, accompanied by 47 bishops, and several officials of the Council. At the close of the entertainment, President of the Association, Mr. Nicholas Tsu, thanked His Excellency and the Bishops for accepting the invitation of the members, and assisting at their annual meeting; he thanked also the Jesuit Fathers, their teachers, who brought the Light of the Gospel and Western Science to the Chinese Nation. Another speaker, Mr. Stanislaus Sen, dwelt on the splendid work of the Church, the numerous mission schools and higher educational establishments developed in the Shanghai Catholic Mission; we are all proud of this work, said the speakers, and feel that the Catholic Church has a large and prominent share in the educational progress of our country.

The Delegate replied briefly, thanking for the kind invitation extended to himself and the assembled bishops. China owed much to Western Missionaries, especially to the indefatigable labour of the Jesuit Fathers, both in the past and at the present day. The Siccawei Observatory is known the world over, and has wonderfully helped China and the trading communities of the Far East. The native clergy should also assist in the good work, and united with their Western brethren, labour for the best interests of their country and the Church.

The meeting closed by the presentation of a life-like portrait of the Rector, Rev. E. Beauce, S. J., founder and promoter of the Association. A picture of the Delegate, assembled bishops, guests and members was then taken, after which all dispersed, strengthened and encouraged by the growing success of the Association, and buoyed up with glowing hopes for the prosperity of their country.

WEDDINGS

Meyer-Schroeder

A wedding of interest to many Shanghai people took place on Saturday, when Miss Gunvor (Gunnie) when Austin Schroeder, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. W. E. Schroeder, and Mr. Helge Fugl Meyer, son of Mrs. Valgerda Meyer of Copenhagen, were married, the civil ceremony being performed in the morning by H.D.M.'s Consul-General, Mr. T. Raaschou, and witnessed by Messrs. W. Bos and P. Jesperson; and the religious ceremony, solemnized by Pastor Reichelt, taking place quietly at home in the early afternoon. A large reception, attended by over a hundred friends of the popular young couple, was held at the residence of the bride's parents, 17 Rue Corneille, the house being beautifully decorated with bamboo and white flowers and the bridal couple receiving the congratulations of their friends under a floral wedding bell.

The bride looked charming in an artistic gown of white satin crêpe, covered with tulle and filmy silk lace, the tight-fitting bodice trimmed with a real lace berthe and tiny cap sleeves. A girdle of orange blossom tied in a love-knot at the side encircled the waist and the long train was trimmed with tulle love-knots and orange blossom. A becoming "bonnet" arrangement of the bridal veil, which was worn with a wreath of orange blossoms completed the costume. The bridesmaids, Miss Edith Henry and Miss Iris Boyd, were gowned in apricot taffeta, made with tight-fitting bodices and bouffant skirts trimmed with georgette frills of the same shade arranged in apron style. The neck was furnished with narrow frills of georgette and silver flowers formed the corsage bouquets. Miss Henry wore a bandeau of apricot georgette with silver ribbon. The bride's mother wore a handsome fawn-coloured gown embroidered with copper-coloured beads, and a brown lace and straw hat.

Dr. H. Chatley proposed the health of the bride in a very felicitous speech, to which Mr. Meyer responded suitably. Mr. Schroder then proposed the health of the bridesmaids. Many beautiful presents testified to the esteem in which the young couple are held. After the reception Mr. and Mrs. Meyer left for Peking where the honeymoon will be spent. The bride's going away dress was of grey crêpe de Chine, accordion pleated, with a coatee of grey French pressed silk trimmed with red stitching and beads. With this she wore shoes and stockings of grey and a red and black hat. Mr. and Mrs. Meyer will make their home in 16 Route Henri Riviere after return from Peking.

Forde-Hutchison

Union Church was the scene of a very pretty wedding on Tuesday afternoon when Miss Catherine Ferguson Arthur Hutchison, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. James Hutchison, of Shanghai, and Mr. Frank H. Forde, son of Mr. and Mrs. Charles Forde, of Dublin, were married by Rev. A. N. Rowland, the bridal party moving up the aisle beneath arches of bamboo and white flowers. The bride, who was given away by her father, wore a charming gown of white georgette, trimmed with wide silver lace which banded the bodice and slanted across the skirt. The costume was cut on severely simple lines, cleverly draped, with the side train caught at the hip with a cluster of orange blossoms, these also forming a lovers' knot at the hem of the train. With this was worn a veil of real Brussels rose point, caught into a cap with orange blossoms, and the sheaf bouquet was of lilies and orange blossoms, combined with asparagus fern and tied with long white ribbons.

The bridesmaid, Miss Jessie McGeachie, wore a becoming gown of salmon pink georgette, with a picture Leghorn hat trimmed with pink roses, and a bouquet of pink roses. Three little nephews of the bride, Lewis, David, and James Porter, made a picturesque trio of pages in attendance. The bride's mother wore a handsome costume of grey georgette, elaborately trimmed with matching silk braid, a small black hat, and carried sweet-peas and forget-me-not. The bridegroom was accompanied by Mr. J. R. Weeks as best man, and the ushers were Messrs. C. W. Porter, B. W. Gale and A. E. Collins.

A reception, attended by many friends, was held following the ceremony at the residence of the bride's parents, 11 Jinkee Road, which was very tastefully decorated for the occasion, the colour scheme of green and white being carried out throughout the house. Mr. and Mrs. Forde received the congratulations of their many friends in a bower of bamboo and white roses, beneath a floral wedding bell. The wedding presents, which were many and beautiful, filled an adjoining room. The bridegroom's gift to the bride was an exquisite string of pearls and hers to him a gold wrist watch.

After the reception Mr. and Mrs. Forde left for their honeymoon, which will be spent in Manila. The bride's going-away costume was a smart orange crêpe de chine, trimmed with white, with which was worn a white crinoline hat, with small brim. trimmed with white grosgrain ribbon.

THE CHARITY BALL

America in Shanghai Entertains its Airmen

The American Charity Ball held at the Marble Hall on Wednesday was a great success. The arrival of the aviators was most opportune as the Ball was made an occasion for their reception. A large number of guests arrived early in the evening so that the halls, ball room and verandahs were well filled, when, about 11 o'clock, a reception line was formed in the Ball room and the aviators entered, preceded by young girls who scattered rose petals in their path. The band struck up "The Star Spangled Banner" and the guests were exceedingly enthusiastic in their welcome.

Every guest was given a dainty boutonniere. as he entered, for which there was no charge nor was any gift of money expected. The proceeds from the sale of tickets however, should ensure a very fine sum for charities and it was thought better to avoid the feeling that extortion was being used to raise money.

The ball struck an unusual note of informality—almost Bohemianism—that threw into even stronger relief the grandeur and spaciousness of Mr. Kadoorie's hall. The exterior of the hall was floodlighted with a battery of powerful reflectors set at intervals across the lawn, which made the terrace as bright as at full moon and attracted many of the guests by the promise of coolness so welcome on a June evening in the East

The terrace led on to a generous verandah which accommodated several hundred more guests, most of whom accepted the frequent invitation of the band to join in the dance. The ballroom is like no other in Shanghai. The floor is a perfect one, though it needs to be danced in; the walls rise to a nobly decorated ceiling far above, illuminated by three beautiful chandeliers. Rooms adjacent were set apart for mah jongg players, but were little sought after, though later in the evening the supper room adjoining was crowded.

Many prominent people and officials were guests of the American Association and American Woman's Club and acted as patrons and patronesses. These assisted in making the aviators welcome and entertaining them throughout the evening. A pleasant programme of various musical numbers was given —songs, violin and piano selections.

CORRESPONDENCE

DRESS AT HENLI

To the Editor of the
"North-China Daily News."

Sir,—Will you allow me a space in your paper?

At Henli Regatta on Saturday my sense of the fitness of things had a rude shock.

I am a woman, but not a prude, only I try to uphold the virtues for my sex. What are women coming to? And—what are men allowing them to become? Women in the past have been men's inspiration, and the poets' dreams. They associated them with everything beautiful, lovely, clean, good, and modest, with flowers, gardens, religion; motherhood, wifehood; scent, lace; peace and quiet.

A man threw away his smoke approaching a woman, and hid his drink before her, (proving by this, that smoke and drink belonged to his lowest nature!!). He was careful whom he introduced into his home—and to "her." He did not profane "it" or "her" with anything cheap, for she appealed to his idealism. What have women done? And what are they doing to-day to preserve this idealism—this God-given gift to men.

To-day men associate women with smoking, drinking, and with all the hundred and one sensible feelings of pleasure. Her qualifications to-day —are her figure, her walk, her skin and her dress. All artificial qualifications and nothing real.

Her mouth is dirty with smoke. Her stomach full of cocktails, or whisky—or both; her figure half naked, and her face painted.

Where is the beauty of her heart, her mind and her soul? Men do not respect her as their grandfathers did their grandmothers.

I saw an un-sexed woman at the Regatta wearing trousers. What was her object? The worst of it was, she was a mother, with two little girls to bring up, and example, they say, is the great teacher! If she could have seen herself, as others saw her, she would have hidden her charms beneath skirts. As she courted public opinion, appearing like that, the public—and I as one of them—are entitled to criticize in public. If she did not expect this, she should have worn the badge of her womanhood—skirts.

There were two other creatures there, rubbing shoulders with the natives going along the paths, with nothing on but their bathing suits. They had all the cheap notoriety they were out for.

Do women of this kind appeal to men?

Will any man be generous enough to say in writing, we don't mind looking at all we are shown, but we don't marry second-hand goods. I believe it would be doing a good act to let them know this, for I believe girls think this kind of thing appeals to men, and makes them attractive. And if you did mate with one of these unsexed creatures, what kind of offspring will they produce, and rear, under such depraved guidance?

It is up to the men to insist on decency of women in public places. and let them know it: or not to contaminate their own better natures by countenancing it: for to do so, is to pander to your lowest moral.

Even to say, you want all you can get, (it sounds manly you think), but it cheapens womanhood, and lowers man!

It is the men who must rebel, and allow it to be seen, that they object to this going back to nature. Nature is only beautiful under control.

Fine pioneers we are for our Chinese friends! I tell you, the Chinese women can learn nothing about morals from the European nations of to-day.

Even a ricsha coolie, in his childhood is more protected by his parents, than many of our children here to-day. Chinese men will do well to keep their women and children, and young men, away from the contaminating influence of foreign education and racial life as it is to-day.

I saw some other creatures at the Regatta, in boats, rowing and being rowed—their lanky limbs sprawling about in front of men rowing them, and the rest of their figures outlined in all its nudity—open to the public gaze.

Has modesty left our maids? Are they quite shameless? They are asking for all the trouble they get. If they are courting admiration, they are going the wrong way about it.

Men may like it, but they don't admire it. To tell you the truth: you are ugly and un-appetizing, dressed like that in a field, or a boat.

On a beach you are excused, and usually a towel coat is put on, when coming out of the water. You are what the Spanish call asquerosa, and had nothing to show, but your nakedness at Henli. (Perhaps some Spanish gentleman will be good enough to explain the word).

I enclose my card last, as I don't want my eyes scratched out,

Shanghai. June 2, 1924.

To the Editor of the
"North-China Daily News."

Sir,—It was a relief to see "An Old Correspondent's" letter in to-day's issue on the subject of "Unsexed Woman at Henli Regatta." I was there and saw the sights (!) "An Old Correspondent" has put into black and white the unanimous criticisms of the "sights" by the members of two houseboat parties consisting of married men, grass-widowers, and eligible bachelors. I have a mother, wife, and daughter and, while admitting myself to be far, very far, from perfect, can most truthfully say I am glad they were not at Henli.

I am, etc.,
Grass-Widower.

Shanghai, June 4, 1924.

To the Editor of the
"North-China Daily News."

Sir,—I think they were largely unthinking women and girls who so attired themselves at the Henli Regatta as to raise the torrent of indignation given expresion to in "An Old Correspondent's" letter. There may have been exceptions, but I prefer to believe that at least the large majority of those who exposed the "outline of their figures" did so with no shameful intent. I think that the resort to the comfortable bathing costume was dictated largely by a desire to rid themselves of the discomfort and inconvenience caused by the clothes they ordinarily have to wear. Really, the clothes we have to deck ourselves in are appalling and ridiculous, but seemingly we have to dress as everyone else does. What a pleasure it is to get out of them into a loose flowing garment, for instance. The Chinese certainly show more sense in the comfortable way they dress.

Perhaps the women complained of went too far by getting into tight fitting bathing costumes, but I think their motives were honest, being simply that they wished to be attired as comfortably as possible now that the restraint of town life was removed in the rural environment of Henli. But to these I would say that they should remember that these are not the days of Adam and Eve in their innate innocence, No, we now live in the age symbolized by the fig leaf. We all long for the day when that golden garden age of innocence will be restored as between man and man and man and woman—but it is not yet. And until that day dawns, we are told that appearances do count, that the appearance of evil must so far as possible be avoided and that we must abstain from meat (of itself unharmful) wherein our brother stumbles. We should try not to give occasion for quoting in defence of our actions "Honi soit. . . ."

The desire to live more simply and naturally at Henli, especially with those normally confined to a town, is sympathized with, but, women and girls, you must remember that for every one that finds honest pleasure in looking upon your graceful form, there are those men whose pleasure in these same graces is entirely dishonest and base.

To them the beauty of your outlined figure is a stumbling-block, and therefore it should be veiled from their gaze. When the day comes that the very springs of our thoughts are pure, then shall we take a true delight in your undraped human figure, but till then, to most men it is a snare and a deceiver unto evil and the better selves of us men would rather, women and girls, that you did not so appear before us.

I am, etc.,
Oarsman.

Shanghai, June 4, 1924.

To the Editor of the
"North China Daily News"

Sir,—As a visitor to Henli (that narrow strip of water entirely surrounded by gin!) during the recent Regatta I would wish to support the views of your correspondent of June 4, "An old correspondent."

With his, or her, permission I will quote the particular paragraph which, in my opinion, goes straight to the point. "There were two other creatures there, rubbing shoulders with the natives, with nothing on but their bathing suits. They had all the cheap notoriety they were out for."

"Creatures" is good! Before the words "bathing suits' add "skin-tight.' "Cheap notoriety' is putting it mildly. My own epithet would preclude the publication of this letter!

To the skin-tight bathing suit add a pair or silk stockings and high heeled shoes, then tell me for what purpose that bathing suit was donned! Ask some well known medical scientist why young women parade the river in boats and canoes dressed in skin tight bathing suits.

It is said that many of these ladies are wives and mothers. Certainly many of them were physically very attractive but why parade their charms for the benefit of the Chinese countryman?

It seems to me time that the Shanghai Rowing Club Committee posted a notice in their enclosure at Henli "Inadequately clothed females not allowed in the Club enclosure."

Anything more damaging to foreign prestige than the crowd of half dressed men and maidens on view in the Rowing Club premises at Henli last week-end cannot well be imagined. Thank God they did not include my wife, or my sister, or my daughter.

Trusting you will find room for this protest in your esteemed paper.

I am, etc.,
Bonzo.

Shanghai, June 4, 1924.

To the Editor of the
"North China Daily News"

Sir,—"An Old Correspondent" is certainly a creature with a most perverted idea of things, one of the type that still swears by red flannel and antimacassars and goes about the world virtuously spurning other people for not having the same tastes.

I admit there are girls at Henli who certainly merit some of "An Old Correspondent's" remarks; they appear every year in various and gaudy swimming costumes, but I am inclined to believe they have never been in water, save for the purpose of cleanliness, in their lives.

But fancy going into tantrums because one lady is seen wearing knickerbockers. I think the application in the letter is not only inappropriate but fundamentally absurd, it does not scan with the subject at all, for women in every age have worn men's garb when they fancied and it is certainly not new, by the least of means, to the "decadent" era of 1924.

Such a Stigginsy letter reminds me of another missive that appeared in your columns a long time ago, which I had sent to me when I was in England. This letter was a long, rambling piece of nonentity written by some lady who objected to ricsha coolies smoking cigarettes in their leisure moments, or words to that effect Till all these killjoys and dislikers of natural youth be exterminated it is good-bye to the "Brighter Shanghai" movement.

Enclosing my card.

To the Editor of the
"North-China Daily News."

Sir,—Three rousing cheers for the fair-minded, gentlemanly Editor of the "North China" and his approach to the question of woman's attire. The old Biddies of both sexes are always picking on the fashion of fig leaves we wear. It is within the memory of women that they haled us before the bar of eternal censure for wearing corsets, high-heeled shoes, dresses that bit the dust, dropsical sleeves and bustles! All pointed the way to perdition whither we sanely consigned them. But still the sour critics devour us because, forsooth, beneath these disguises we are women still. Isn't it too bad they can't unsex us utterly and make us fit to live in a world of putrid purists!

Thank you, kind sir. It is good to know there are still sane folk in this muddled world, where women sometimes dare to be comfortable.

I am, etc.,
Betty Graeme.

P. S. The writer has never been at Henli in her life, wears her hair and skirts long, and only dons the family pants when she rides abroad with the one and only man who admires everything she does—the finest man in the world—her husband. B.G.

THE JEWISH SCOUTS

To the Editor of the
"North-China Daily News."

Sir,—At the largest meeting of Scouters (active officers of the Boy Scouts Association, Shanghai Branch) that has ever been held in Shanghai since the inauguration of the movement here, I was requested last night to write you to the effect that the meeting unanimously agreed with the sentiments expressed in your leaderette commenting on the letter signed by Ricardo, relating to the Jewish School Troop and Pack.

With regard to the attack made by Englishman upon the Scout Council, which in this case "quite failed to do the fair thing" I would like to say that first there is no Scout Council to-day, its functions being carried out by the Executive Committee; that second the whole matter was very carefully discussed before a decision was made; and third the Boy Scouts Association is eagerly desirous of enrolling amongst its members Englishmen who take an interest in Scouts and Cubs, more particularly those who know how to play the game.

On behalf of the Jewish School Scouts and Cubs I would like to say that they obeyed their scouting orders and played the game well, as did all the other Scouts and Cubs, throughout the whole Jamboree and the Scout authorities were all highly gratified with the results.

I am, etc.,
F. C. Millington.
Commissioner.

THE COST OF HOUSES

To the Editor of the
North-China Daily News."

Sir,—In the issue of May 31 you stated that a three-roomed cottage could not be built for less than £500. Several lots of houses have been built recently for £350 to £400.

	Houses	Cost each
At Nuneaton	40	£403
„ Stockton	100	355
„ Chester	49	403
„ Bourne	4	403
„ Alnwich	24	380
„ Bridlington	20	398.9.2 (B. Class).

Last June a competition was held by the paper called the "Builder" on the cost of building.

The houses were designed by Professor A—F.R.I.B.A. Bedroom No. 1. was 15'-0" x 12'-0", bedroom No. 2, 11'-0" x 8'-5", bedroom No. 3, 11'-0" x 11'-0", also on this floor was a bathroom and linen cupboard. The living room was 15'-0" x 12'-0", sitting room 11'-0" x 12'-0", large scullery fitted with copper, stove, etc. Large hall, W.C., coal store and lobby. The price £1,197. 16. 8 per pair. The above houses are the type of houses which are being built in different parts of England and three years ago would have cost about £1.000 each.

Engineer.

Shanghai, June 2, 1924.

To the Editor of the
"North-China Daily News."

Sir,—Your remarks in to-day's issue must raise queries on this all important question.

Leaving the political side alone surely Labour can be entrusted to build good and substantial houses for its own supporters (the ones most in need). In 1919-1921 a four-roomed house, well built, cost anything from £1,000 to £1,400 within 40 miles of London, despite a "business" government and a subsidy of £280 per house. Compared with this £500 (£550 under the government scheme) seems more reasonable especially as that will be such as to be within reach of the poorer classes (the post war poor too).

Perhaps we could move the Shanghai builders and house agents to give us better value and leave English, Scottish and Welsh ratepayers to look after their own affairs. Rents in Shanghai are ridiculously high. Why? Labour is six times cheaper than at home and the real cost of material compares favourably with that in the United Kingdom. What would, even now, be rented at £50 a year there costs in Shanghai, say Tls. 75 per month, or say £125 per year!

Could not the Council be induced to take some action against those house agents (one a well known firm), who make a practice of letting a house in a number of flats. One, to my knowledge (I am requiring a small house and so investigated this) in the western district, had a monthly rental of about Tls. 110. This house has now been let as three flats with a rent of Tls. 50 each! Not even "hot and cold" or any fittings! A flagrant case of profiteering. Are we to remain at the mercy of such agents?

Mr. Editor, you have cause ready to hand to start one of the most popular and just campaigns in Shanghai.

Enclosing my card,

I am, etc.,
Unconverted Londoner.

P.S. May I question your figure of £200 for a specimen house (understood to be substantially built) erected at the Wembley Exhibition?

"THE HWA JAH'S CADETS"

To the Editor of the
"North-China Daily News."

Sir,—Rather late I got hold of the various articles that appeared in your esteemed daily on the above subject. In connexion therewith I think it might be of some interest to quote a remark once made to the writer by a distinguished Chinese Naval Officer. He put the matter very tritely.

"Those of our young men, that possess the necessary education to master the theoretical end of the profession, will never soil their hands in acquiring the requisite practical experience that goes to make up the finished Sailor. On the other hand the men brought up at sea, such as quartermasters, bosuns and pilots, will in but the very rarest instances acquire the theoreteical knowledge necessary to make him a successful Bridge-Officer."

'Nuff said!

I am, etc.,
Blue Water

Shanghai, June 1, 1924.

To the Editor of the
"North China Daily News"

Sir,—Noticing your leading article on May 21, re the cruise of this vessel, and the yarn her cadets have spun about the foreign officers:

May I as an old square—rigged sailor of 12 year's experience in sail from apprentice to chief officer, and 24 years in steamers from 2nd officer to master, express my views as to the conduct of the cadets of the Hwah Jah.

The first thing an apprentice in a sailing-ship was taught, in 1888, was obedience to his superior officers in all things, from sweeping decks to jumping overboard if ordered, and that without question. No cadet, if not amenable to orders, can expect to attain the rank of Captain.

Also, in my early apprenticeship days, we were taught that work was not lowering our dignity; to attain all the qualifications of a thoroughly practical seaman and navigator, one must commence at the lowest rung of the nautical ladder, and if there is the making of a sailor in him, when his apprenticeship is finished, he will soon attain his certificates and promotion accordingly.

The modern seaman, in the estimation of us ancient mariners, is not a seaman at all; the present day floating palaces, or even large cargo steamers, do not call for the resourcefulness which was required in the sailing-ship days. For instance, if a squall strikes a steamer, the officer on watch dodges behind a canvas screen, or gets into a wheel-house to keep out of the rain, but in my time an officer did not mind either fresh or salt water, being very often up to his neck for his four hours watch on deck, handling sheets, tacks, and braces, which he considered was all in the day's work.

Now as they say in China "Maskee,' the sailing ship is out of date, but as the cadets of the Hwah Jah expect some day to be commanders, my advice to them is, obey orders always.

Any further comment on this subject, the writer will be only too pleased to give any information whatever upon seamanship or navigation, for either sail or steam.

Enclosing my card.

I am, etc.,
Ancient and Modern.

THE GOLD MARKET

The Spread of Infections Diseases by Banknotes

Reporting from London on April 30, Messrs. Samuel Montagu & Co. state:—

The Bank of England gold reserve against its note issue on the 23rd instant amounted to £12,6,291,-545, as compared with £126,287,835 on the previous Wednesday.

Only a small proportion of the fair supply of gold available this week has been taken on Indian and Continental account. Gold valued at $5,950,000 has arrived in New York from Holland.

The following is from the "Times of India," under date of 12th instant:—

"A return to the standard of 1s. 4d. gold is what the majority of public opinion demands, so that money may flow into and out of the country when trade requires a movement either way, and weight is given to this demand by the latest pronouncement of Lord Meston, an ex-Finance Member of the Government of India, who is reported to have said that the 1s. 4d. gold rupee should be restored at the earliest possible moment, so that Indian trade could go ahead free from grave uncertainties, and that the Secretary of State should divest himself of every function that could safely be shed in the shape of the control of the currency of the country. The issue of emergency currency of 12 crores has far from met the situation this year and such issues are considered but palliatives in the absence of automatic currency laws, and as the country's trade expands and the demand for currency grows the hardship of the present arrangements will be felt in an ever increasing measure. What the country wants is a free inflow and outflow of gold at the pre-war ratio of 1s. 4d. gold to protect not only its commerce but also its industries, and the weight of opinion in favour of this ratio is growing not only in India but also outside."

Currency.

According to the medical correspondent of "The Times," an investigation into the comparative hygienic merits of paper money and coin has recently been carried out in Berlin. The results are published in the "Archiv fur Hygiene." In commenting on them the "Lancet" states that "infectious diseases may be spread by paper money more frequently than by any other article in use among the people." It was found that coined money is innocuous, owing to the self-disinfecting action of the metal itself, and because its small, smooth surface prevents the development of germs. "The dirtiest piece of copper is, from the standpoint of a bacteriologist, better than newly-issued paper money." In post-war banknotes for some time in circulation up to 143,000 bacteria were found. In pre-war notes the highest find was 3,000 bacteria. The post-war note is, of course, much more frequently handled than were the notes of the pre-war period. The notes manufactured of "laid" paper were the worst offenders, as germs tend to stick to them.

It is reported that a novel style of coins shortly will be issued in Spain. The pieces are to be composed of copper and nickel alloy in the form of a square with rounded corners. The denominations are to be 5, 10 and 20 centimes.

THE MAY WHOLESALE PRICE INDEX NUMBER

The Treasury Department's Bureau of Markets states that the total index number for Shanghai for May is 154.3 which is 0.5 per cent. higher than in the previous month but is 2.7 per cent. down as compared with the corresponding month of last year. Different tendencies are seen among the prices of commodities. For instance, cereals, other food products and miscellaneous goods all show rises, whereas textiles and metals are on the contrary. Among miscellaneous goods, fuels and industrial materials have the sharpest rise, but building materials mark decided falls. As the Dragon Festival is at hand, during which business houses customarily close accounts, local market prices are not likely to increase in the next one or two weeks.

The monthly figures since May, 1923, are given below:

THE SILVER MAARKET

Prospects of Falling Prices

Reporting from London on April 30, Messrs. Samuel Montagu & Co. state:—

The silver market continues quiet and without resilience. Eastern demand is only slight, and there is little difficulty in obtaining silver from America and elsewhere. China has sold moderate quantities.

Though the undertone keeps fair, the level is above Eastern parities and therefore, should selling pressure arise, the price might be disposed to fall, as it did to-day.

The silver quotations to-day for cash and two months' delivery are each 1/16d. below those fixed a week ago.

LOSS ON COPPER COIN

The "Chinese Economic Bulletin" states:—

Depreciation of copper coins in Shanghai, as based on the number required per dollar, is just now causing living conditions to become more acute for those who receive their wages in coppers. The extent of the depreciation may be judged from the fact that in April, 1923, 176-8/10 coppers were received as equal to $1 silver. The variation in 1923 extended from 158.5, the minimum in June, to 192.3, the maximum in April, 1924. A considerable percentage of those now in circulation are below weight. Public utilities, etc., do not distinguish, however, between coins of different weights. The Bureau of Currency, in June, 1914, established the official weight of copper pieces at 18 kuping candareens. The metal was to be 95 per cent. copper, 4 per cent. pewter and 1 per cent. lead.
